[H. OF R.]

solved, as between us and our public enemies, to stand by the country. I would have the country right, in all its controversies:

"Thrice is he armed, that hath his quarrel just."

But I must not suffer my own personal impression of the right or wrong of its cause to impel me to the abandonment of that cause. I shall give my vote, and if need be my voice, as I have hitherto done, to every appropriation which is asked for in good faith, and sustained by reasonable evidence of its propriety. And it matters not to me whether the money is to be expended on the banks of the Merrimac of the East or the Merrimac of the West. Still it is my country.

Entertaining these general views of the public service, acting upon them in the votes I give in this House, I aver that, even upon the liberal rules of appropriation which I advocate and observe, there will remain in the Treasury, at the expiration of the present year, a surplus equal to the whole revenue of ordinary years. To illustrate the fact, I subjoin the following estimate of the appropriations, probable or certain, of the present year, made conformably to the opinions I have declared:

Appropriations proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury, -	$17,515,933
Appropriations in addition to the above, in the bill for the civil and diplomatic service, -	607,250
Appropriations in the navy bill, -	537,521
Appropriations in the bill for the Indian service, -	1,165,332
Appropriations in the army bill, -	97,239
Advance to the cities in the District of Columbia, amount payable the present year, -	70,883
Appropriation for hostilities among the Seminoles, -	2,120,000
Appropriation for hostilities among the Creeks, -	500,000
Appropriation for raising volunteers and dragoons, -	300,000
Bill for the defence of the Western frontier, -	1,000,000
House bill, additional for fortifications, -	200,000
Appropriations for other objects in same bill, -	882,053
House bill, additional for civil service, -	52,684
Private claims, -	100,000
Miscellaneous works of various kinds, light-houses, beacons, Cumberland road, public buildings, say -	2,000,000
Add for other possible appropriations not enumerated, -	2,801,105
Total, exclusive of new Indian treaties, -	$30,000,000

Of this sum, there will remain at the end of the year, unexpended, not less than twelve millions of dollars. It exceeded eight millions the last year. It will increase in proportion to the increase of appropriations.

On the other hand, the execution of new treaties with the Indians will call for an appropriation to the amount of $6,259,241, which, for reasons heretofore stated, I do not consider it necessary to charge to the income of the current year.

Such is the result of my reflections on this important subject. I have treated it in good faith, actuated by a sincere wish to arrive at the truth, and especially to avoid all exaggeration as to the available surplus in the Treasury. The sum is large. It cannot be disguised or denied. No part of the surplus of 1835 can be reached by the expenditure of 1836. On the contrary, there is abundant reason to believe that, without speaking of unexpended appropriations, which cannot fall short at the end of this year of twelve millions, there will be an additional sum of unappropriated surplus of the revenue of 1836, to be added to the balance of credit from the last year.

I demand of the members of this House what is to be done with this great treasure? Shall it continue in the hands of the deposite banks, safe or unsafe, to be loaned by them for the benefit of individuals, yielding no advantage to the people of the United States?

We propose to you, on the one hand, the distribution bill. We say that, in principle, it is a just, wise, and proper measure. If it contemplates too large a distribution, diminish the sum. Leave in the Treasury all that is needed for the common defence and general welfare of the Union. Of that I would not touch a dollar. But the residue place in the hands of the States; restore it to the people themselves; let it be applied to the objects of local improvement, which may or may not fall within the scope of the constitutional power of Congress, but which are all-important to the prosperity and the strength of the United States.

If the distribution bill comes in conflict with the graduation bill, cannot the two objects be combined, thus reconciling and conciliating the rights of the old States and the interest of the new ones?

If neither of these things may be done, if it does not comport with the political views of the majority of this House to make an absolute donation of the surplus treasure to the several States—if there be a constitutional ingredient of this Legislature, not a member of the House, not a member of the Senate, whose possible action upon this subject gentlemen can suffer themselves to anticipate, so as to be affected thereby—then I ask the House whether this surplus treasure may not be placed in the respective State treasuries in the form of a deposite or loan? Such a measure would be infinitely less exceptionable than to have the Government of the United States come into the market as a great speculator in stocks, less than to retain the public treasure in the deposite banks at a clear loss of two or three millions of interest, perhaps in part of the principal; less than to squander it in mere idle wastefulness.

I believe in my conscience that a distribution of the surplus revenue ought to be made. The country requires it. The public interest demands it. I do not urge any plan for the disposition of the public money in the spirit of party agitation. Nay, if I sought a topic of party agitation out of this House, a means of rousing the just indignation of the people, I should wish for nothing better than to have Congress adjourn, by the will of the majority, leaving the public treasure dispensed among favored persons or corporations, to be used or abused at the discretion of the administration. Will the majority of the House give to the opposition such a manifest advantage? Will they not rather consult their interest and their public duty, by consenting to the passage of some law, either of grant or of deposite, which may place a portion of the surplus revenue in the control or custody of the respective States? I exhort them by every consideration of interest, I adjure them by every consideration of duty, not to suffer this session of Congress to terminate, leaving the public treasure unguarded, neglected, abandoned. Let us beware of this great wrong to the people and the States we represent.

With these remarks, it would have given me satisfaction to be able to close what I might wish to say on the subject of these resolutions. But there is one other topic which shows itself in the speeches of prominent friends of the land bill, and which I cannot pass unnoticed. I mean the suggestion that the North enjoys more than a due share of the advantages of the Union. It was very distinctly averred by the gentleman from Kentucky, who preceded me, [Mr. GRAVES,] as an argument in favor of the distribution bill, that the State of New York had received more of the public revenue than I know not how many of the States of the South and West, which he enumerated; that the North and Northeast were made rich by the public expenditures; in contrast with which was arrayed the liberality of the State of Kentucky towards the manufactures and commerce of the Atlantic States. The gentleman frankly admitted that he had not made any exact calculations on the subject. It would have been well, I think, had he looked into the figures carefully; because, had he done so, he would have ascertained that there is no foundation in fact for such grave charges in denial of the general and impartial value of the Union of these States.

I take leave to say we have heard something too much of the same tenor from the State of Kentucky, throughout the present session of Congress; and, if it were in order, I should say, in both its chambers. To me, a new member of the House, little versed, of course, in the details of its debates, few things have seemed stranger than the idea, so pertinaciously insisted on, that appropriations are to be made, not where the public service requires them, but in shares to the several States. At an early period of the session, after having heard such things more than once, a strong sense of their injustice drew from me a few observations, somewhat warmer, it may be, than gentlemen were accustomed to hear from the North. If I could suppose that, under the impulses of the moment, I overstepped the limits of manly controversy, I should be sorry of it. Certain I am, on ample reflection, and after deliberate investigation of the details of the question, that I did not go one hair's breadth beyond the truth, in the terms of condemnation which I applied to these reproaches on the States of the Atlantic, and especially the East. I spoke, to be sure, strongly, as I felt. Doubtless, members from other States are attached to their homes. So am I to mine. I can conceive that gentlemen should feel indignant, if they thought their State unjustly assailed: cannot they conceive that I should, also, if my State be unjustly assailed? Or is it imagined that members from the East are to kiss the rod that is raised to strike? Do so they who list. I desire friendship with every member of this House. But I have rights to maintain here, my own and those of my constituents; and I shall not shrink from any issue which their vindication may involve.

Deeming this question of the last importance, in its general bearing on the stability and tranquil action of the Government of the Union, I have taken some pains to probe the matter to the bottom. If the result of my inquiries were other than what it is, it would not be stated to the House. Some time since, a gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] presented a variety of calculations, tending to show that the North was favored, to the injury of the South. That gentleman was answered, and he will permit me to say, with all due respect, triumphantly answered, by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. EVANS,] the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GALLATIN,] and another gentleman from Maine, [Mr. JARVIS.] My view of the subject covers the whole United States. I shall demonstrate, by a detailed examination of the public expenditures in its various branches, and upon authentic documents, that there exists a striking equality in its distribution. How could it be otherwise? Witness the zeal and vigilance of members for the cause of their particular constituents. Bear in recollection the interest and the will of every administration to keep well, so far as it may, with all sections of the country. At any rate the fact exists. I shall show it, in terms courteous, but positive, as befits the consciousness of truth; and, sectional matter as it all is, I cannot but hope the effect will be to strengthen, rather than weaken, our common attachment to the Union.

All things done by man must have a locality. Whenever the Government of a country disburses money, it must be disbursed somewhere. Certain expenditures are, upon the face of them, absolutely and unequivocally national; as the charges of foreign intercourse, drawn and spent abroad. Others are apparently sectional; as the expenses of a land office in the West, or a light-house in the East. Now, it is natural that a measure local in name should be brought forward by local interests. It must be so, in the operation of local necessities, feelings, and knowledge. I cannot admit that because the members from a particular State, or tier of States, support a measure unanimously, the fact affords ground of presumption against a measure. Who should understand and advocate a thing, if not the members from the State most immediately concerned with it? As a member of this House, I lie under particular obligation to see to the welfare of my State. That is one thing for which we are severally sent here. Shall not the Representatives from the State of Ohio feel and act unitedly in the defence of their northern frontier? Shall not the Representatives from Alabama, Georgia, and Florida, take a deep interest in the measures necessary for the protection of their constituents against the hostilities of the Creeks and Seminoles? Surely. They support locally: we must not reject locally. Our decision should be national in its motives and scope, not sectional.

This whole doctrine of allotting out the public expenditures in shares is rotten to the core. Try it practically: strip it of all disguise, and apply it to any familiar fact. Suppose a bill before this House, proposing to appropriate money for the defence of the Southern frontier; and suppose members from the North to rise, under such circumstances, with the avowal on their lips: We cannot gainsay the propriety of this appropriation; there is flagrant war before our eyes, for the prosecution of which this money is indispensably necessary; but we will not grant it, unless you give us a corresponding sum of money to aid in the construction of such a canal or such a railway in our particular neighborhood. What would be said of this? What ought to be said? There is no language of censure, in the infinite combinations of human speech, which would be considered blasting enough for such a proposition. Yet the case put is but an obvious illustration of the doctrine, presented in the nakedness of its odious deformity. And I desire to tender to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HAMER,] my grateful estimation of the patriotic nationality of sentiment which he has manifested, in occasional reference heretofore to this topic of debate.

We legislate for a vast country, with its long ocean frontier, and its immense interior expansion. In that stupendous valley of the Mississippi and its tributary waters, the far-western city of St. Louis is, it may be, the geographical centre of the territory of the United States. Our country is destined, possibly, to become coextensive with the continent. I do not speak of this as what I wish; but as what, in the expansive progress of our institutions, it may be impossible to avert. Nature has impressed geographical differences on this wide-spread surface of the United States. Part of it lies on the Atlantic ocean; part on the Gulf of Mexico; part on the inland seas of the North; and part on the thousand offsprings of the great Father of Waters. Our country embraces every diversity of climate, of soil, of location, of productions, which the terraqueous globe affords. Our occupations differ, as our lines are cast here or there within it. The manufacturing and commercial industry of the East, the agriculture and mines of the North and centre, the planting of the South and the West, all contribute to swell the sum of our greatness. We differ in the quality of the labor we respectively employ. So many multitudinous causes go to complicate the interests with which Congress has to deal. Our legislation is to be founded on all these facts, combined, compared, compromised, with reference to the paramount value of the Union.

Times have occurred, in which one or another of the States thought the power of the confederacy pressed heavily on her interests or her principles. It has happened to Pennsylvania, to Virginia, to Massachusetts, to South Carolina. Times have occurred, in which some of the States have thought they had not their due proportion of the benefits of the confederacy. I freely admit that in two of the States of the West, especially, there has been comparatively little of the public money expended in improvements or public works of any kind, comparatively little advantage received under the land system of the United States. I mean Kentucky and Tennessee. It is equally true of one of the States of the East, to wit, Vermont. So far as regards Kentucky and Tennessee, the fact is owing partly to their being intermediate, historically speaking, between the old and new States; partly to their felicitous geographical position, and other natural advantages; and not least to the fact that neither of them is a frontier State. It is not, I am sure, ascribable to any sectionality of feeling or action on the part of the East towards the West. No such feeling ever did exist; no such action ever did occur. We of the Atlantic States may safely challenge a scrutiny of the political and legislative records of the country, upon such a controversy. It will distinctly appear, in the sequel of my remarks, that it is not the West as a section, in any grouping or aggregation of which the States are susceptible, but simply the two States of Kentucky and Tennessee, which have thus failed to partake in the direct local expenditures of the Union. And the error, committed by the gentleman from Kentucky, consists in putting the question sectionally, when there is no tincture of sectionalism, as between East and West, in the facts of the case.

New York, it is alleged, has received more of the public moneys than all the States of the South or Southwest! When this remark struck my ear, it raised before my mind's eye the image of that great State, its boundless enterprise, its magnificent canal which unites the waters of the lakes and those of the ocean, its numerous lesser canals, its railroads, its liberally endowed system of public education. I began to doubt all the familiar facts of contemporaneous history. Did the United States subscribe any of its millions towards the construction of the Erie canal? Did the United States contribute lands, enough for the seat of an empire, to the public schools of the State of New York? Some such things, it seemed to me, I had heard of as falling to the lot of other regions of country; but I had read or imagined that New York was the child, as the Spaniard has it, of her own works; that by her own hands and with her own materials she had built up the structure of her unrivalled prosperity; that she had herself set the example, unaided and alone, of the prosecution of public works of interior communication, on that vast scale, which her success came to render so common throughout the United States.

But it is no question of single States. There is an obvious fallacy in so treating it. To do justice to it, we should take into view sections of country, disregarding political lines, and looking only to geographical relations, or to distinct regions inhabited respectively by a population of congenial interests, occupations, and productions.

I throw together, in one group, the States of the North and East—Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York; New Jersey, Delaware, and Pennsylvania—ten; the States or Territories of the West—Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, Tennessee, Missouri, Arkansas, Michigan, Wisconsin—nine; those of the South—Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Florida—nine; and I proceed to show in what sums and proportions the public money has gone to each of these great sections of the Union.

By a calculation which I have before me, covering the period from 1789 to 1829, inclusive, it appears that there can be traced into the different States and Territories, excluding the District of Columbia, the sum of $119,455,187. Of this sum, $43,567,522, more than one third, went into Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Florida—one third in number, greatly less than one third in population, of all the United States. The plain fact needs no comment.

This calculation does not include the diplomatic charges of the Government, nor such portion of the charges belonging to war as evidently have no locality of expenditure. Nor does it include expenditures on account of the public debt; for the repayment of money to the public creditor, wherever he may dwell, is not an act of local partiality. Nor does it include pensions, which are the recompense of personal services and sacrifices, the debts of honor superinduced by war. If pensions were to be treated as local expenditures, it would give occasion to inquire how it happens that so large a proportion of the persons entitled to pensions reside in particular regions of the country; a course of inquiry which a Northern man need feel no unwillingness to pursue.

For the rest, the calculation is conclusive as to the whole question, so far as it is a question between North and South; unless, indeed, we adopt the idea of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] who, to arrive at a different result, reckons Maryland and Virginia among the States of the North. Such a position is evidently untenable. The doctrine would act fatally against itself, by the undue weight of relative population which it would cast upon the section of the North. It is contrary to the plain sense of the thing, also; since Maryland and Virginia belong to the South by the character of their labor and of their productions. They are essential parts of the slaveholding and planting interests. If, indeed, it could be admitted as a just and serious view of the subject, I should heartily welcome the Old Dominion among the States of the North. I am sure Virginia and New England have in the past time breasted shoulder to shoulder shock after shock, and should feel themselves cemented together by the blood of their fathers commingled in many a well-fought and hard-won battle-field, and by their common attachment to the Union. If there is to be a geographical line run through the constitution, I rejoice that, after all, it is not Mason and Dixon's.

It would be wearisome to run over all the details of public expenditure, in reference to the question under debate. Instead of this, I shall select, for detailed analysis, several classes of expenditure, which are those chiefly discussed, and which abundantly illustrate the whole subject.

I begin with the fortifications of the maritime frontier.

All the money hitherto expended on these fortifications has been distributed as follows: (Sen. Doc. 24th Cong., No. 203.)

Upon this table, it is to be remarked, first, that the entire system of which these fortifications form a part, was arranged in 1821, by a commission composed of General Bernard, Captain Jesse D. Elliott, and Colonel Totten. It was arranged under the auspices of a Secretary of War from the State of South Carolina, John C. Calhoun, and adopted by President Monroe. It is not the fruit, therefore, of Northern councils or partialities. Secondly, in that plan, the works to be constructed were divided into three classes. The works for the protection of Burwell's bay and of Boston roads were placed among the first in order of execution, chiefly because Norfolk and Boston were designated to be the great naval arsenals of the country; the one for the South, the other for the North. Certain works in South Carolina were placed in the second and third classes. Yet, by some under-current of causes, fortifications at Charleston are in an active and efficient state, while those of the Chesapeake are still incomplete, and those of Massachusetts bay almost neglected. A single ship of war might sail up and cannonade Boston or New York with perfect impunity. Finally, it should be borne in mind that the fortifications on the Gulf are essentially defences for the business and population of the West.

What fortifications have been completed? In the whole North, with its exposed coast, its numerous and wealthy cities, to tempt an invading foe, only two: Fort Hamilton and Fort Lafayette, at New York. In the South, four: Fort Washington, in Maryland; Fort Macon, in North Carolina; Castle Pinckney, in South Carolina; and Fort Morgan, in Alabama. In the West, five: Fort Pike, Fort Wood, Fort Jackson, Battery Bienville, and Tower Bayou Dupré, all in Louisiana.

We have two armories, one at Springfield, in Massachusetts for the North, the other at Harper's Ferry, for the South. In the public expenditures at each, there has been a very near approach to equality, it having been, at the former, from 1816 to 1834, inclusive, $3,411,765; at the latter, $3,230,884. (Ex. Doc., 24th Cong., No. 44, p. 365.) An armory is, doubtless, required at the West. The establishment of it has been under consideration for eighteen years. Why has it not been constructed? A Western man, at the head of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. R. M. JOHNSON,] himself tells us it is because of the inability of Congress "to reconcile contending interests as to its location." (House Reports., 24th Cong., No. 373.) "Contending interests" in what quarter? Of the East against the West? No! in the heart of the West itself; an edifying example of the mischievous effects of this narrow localism of spirit. I trust that, so far as regards this armory, the evil will not outlive the present Congress.

There is a like regard to the wants of the various parts of the country in the distribution of arsenals and of depots for arms, as appears by the following table: (Ex. Doc., 24th Cong., No. 44, p. 347.)

North.—Augusta, Maine; Watertown, Massachusetts;

Vergennes, Vermont; Watervliet, New York; Rome, New York; New York, New York; Frankford, Pennsylvania.

South.—Washington, District of Columbia; Pikesville, Maryland; Richmond, Virginia; Fort Monroe, Virginia; Augusta, Georgia; Mt. Vernon, Alabama; Appalachicola, Florida; Charleston, South Carolina; Fayetteville, North Carolina.

West.—Detroit, Michigan; Pittsburg, Pennsylvania; Newport, Kentucky; St. Louis, Missouri; Bellefontaine, Missouri; Baton Rouge, Louisiana. Two new ones, not located.

That is, seven in the section of the North and East, including Lakes Champlain and Ontario, and seventeen in the two sections of the South and the waters of the West.

Leaving the article of military works, I proceed to another local expenditure, that of light-houses.

There have been expended on light-houses, in the period from the organization of the Government to the end of the year 1833, the following sums: (Ex. Doc. 2d sess. 23d Cong., No. 89.)

Maine and Massachusetts,*	-	-	$961,292

			$1,836,182

Be it remembered, in anticipation of any remark as to the excess of expenditures upon the Northern division of the Union, that it is perpetually thronged, at all seasons of the year, with coasting and fishing vessels, plying along shore; that the registered seamen of the one and the other division are in the proportion of 5,442, to 1,010; (Ex. Doc., 24th Cong., No. 163;) and that of the entire tonnage of the country, about thirteen fifteenths belong to the ten first-named States. (Ex. Doc. 2d sess. 23d Cong., No. 187, p. 298.)

Now, to the vexed question of internal improvements. This expression is a very vague one, as we all know. In the action of Congress, it is applied to the improvement of the means of moving from place to place, whether in bays and ports of the sea, or rivers, or across the land by canals and roads. To what extent the constitutional power of Congress in this matter reaches, and especially what interior communications are to be deemed national and what not, is among the unsettled points in the construction of the constitution. The following table will show the amount expended within the several States on this class of public works, from 1789 to 1833, inclusive: (Ex. Doc. 2d sess. 23d Cong., No. 89.)

* I place Maine and Massachusetts together, because the expenditures cover the period when they were one State.

Several additions to and comments upon these tables are necessary to the full understanding of the facts.

Though Delaware lies almost wholly south of Mason and Dixon's line, I place it in the first column, because the money expended upon it has been quite as much for the benefit of New Jersey and Pennsylvania as Delaware. I place Louisiana in the third column, because much of the expenditures of the West have been for the improvement of rivers; and, in regard to this point, the interest of Louisiana cannot be separated from that of the great valley of the Mississippi.

It would seem, at first impression, that the proportion of public money expended in this way south of Mason and Dixon's line, as compared with the money expended at the North, was in the proportion of one to three, or, measuring it by the ratio to the gross population on each side of the line, one to two; that nothing had been expended in Maryland, next to nothing in Virginia. If it were so, it would be pertinent to refer to the constitutional opinions of the South in elucidation of the circumstance. But it is not the fact. To the sum of 573,917 dollars directly expended, we have to add, of subscriptions prior to 1834, the sum of 200,000 dollars to the Dismal Swamp canal, in Virginia, which stock is at a discount; $999,000 to the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, in Maryland, at a loss of more than a half a million, without reckoning later sums, appropriated to the same object; and $450,000 to the Chesapeake and Delaware canal, partly in Delaware, and partly in Maryland, which has no market value. If these things be taken into consideration, and especially if the calculation on both sides be brought down to the present time, the difference in favor of the North vanishes.

But the most interesting points of comparison as to this are between the States of the East and the West. Manifestly, the sum expended in the ten States of the North and East is much less than the sum expended in the eight States and two Territories of the West. I have omitted to reckon the subscription of $233,500 to the Louisville and Portland canal, because of the value of the stock; but if the contemplated appropriation to render that canal public should pass both Houses, it will add a million of dollars to the sum total of the column of the West. And shall we say nothing of the Cumberland road?

Down to the close of 1833, the cost of the Cumberland road was 3,723,530 dollars. To the same period, the total cost of internal improvements, fortifications, and light-houses, all together, in all New England, was but 3,506,751 dollars. Am I told that the Cumberland road unites the Atlantic and the West? So do the admirable public works constructed at her own expense by the State of Pennsylvania. So do the series of canals and railways, constructed or undertaken at the sole expense of the States of New York and Massachusetts, from the Lakes to Albany, and thence diverging to the cities of New York and of Boston. That it adds to the value of the public lands. So do these. That it is beneficial to the whole country. So are these. That it is a national work. Be it so, if you will. And are not the fortifications and other public works on the maritime frontier, by tenfold greater force of reasoning, national in every element that goes to constitute nationality?

To enter into every one of the details of this extensive subject would be irksome to myself and to the House. I abstain from doing it. The more you investigate the question, the more conclusively will you make it appear that all these complaints are fallacious in principle and unfounded in fact. It is the inside of a house, the seat of ease and comfort, finding fault that money is expended on the exposed outside, for the common benefit of the whole edifice and all its inmates. It is impossible, without some pretty radical change in the nature of things, to have a country which is all interior and no part frontier. That frontier has the advantage, if advantage it be, of the money employed in frontier expenses. And it bears the first brunt of battle. Would it not be immeasurably ridiculous for me to complain that the inhabitants of Massachusetts, peaceably pursuing their accustomed avocations, do not enjoy the privilege of seeing some millions of public money spent among them in the very pleasant way it now circulates in Florida? In a word, the expenditures of the frontier of the United States, whether applied on the Ocean, the Gulf, or the interior, are nevertheless expenditures for and of the heart of the country which they cover and protect.

Men of high public estimation have soberly affirmed in Congress, that so many millions, drawn from the West, are expended on other parts of the Union. Self-delusion can hardly go beyond this point. I have shown how and where the public money is disbursed. A word as to how and where it is obtained.

Our revenue from customs is a voluntary tax paid by the consumer of dutiable merchandise. In proportion to the general diffusion of wealth and competency, and to the habits of expense, characteristic of any part of the country, will be its contribution to this branch of the public taxes. It is obvious to perceive that the section of the North and East consumes far more of commodities subject to duty than either that of the South or that of the West.

Our revenue from the public lands has the appearance of coming from the West. It is notorious, however, that far the larger part of the purchase-money is provided by emigrants or capitalists of the Atlantic States. We are every day pouring out our population and our riches into the capacious lap of the West.

There is one other topic which it would be unjust, in view of both sides of the question, to pass over. I have submitted authentic details in regard to most of the fixed public works. Our marine hospitals on the seaboard are paid for by our seamen out of their own hard earnings, and have nothing to do with the subject. Some appropriations have been made latterly for the construction of custom-houses. The commerce of the country demands it. I can find many an offset for the cost of them, by looking into the disposition of the public lands. But our navy yards, and the current expenses of the naval service, which are of course on the seaboard, call for consideration. I suppose it must be through these current expenditures of the naval service that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. GRAVES] imagines that the section of the North and East is growing rich by the disbursements of the public money.

It is true enough that our navy yards are on the coast, either of the Atlantic or the Gulf. I suppose they would be of very little use on a mountain of the interior, very little in the midst of a prairie. What slight inequality there is in the fact that four of our seven yards are situated at the North, and only three at the South, has been the natural consequence of circumstances wholly independent of the action of the Government. Where is the mercantile marine built, owned, and manned? Who finds the ships which convey to market the vast productions of the South and West? It is the North, simply because the South has a local advantage in the character of its soil, which as it were extinguishes other branches of industry by its superior productiveness, as the sun does the light of the stars. Cotton-planting is so profitable, that ship-building and other manufactures, or even the production of the necessities of life, are comparatively neglected by the people of the South. Besides, every thing connected with ship-building is done cheaper at the North. It is not Government patronage which enables me to build a merchant ship at the North, and employ her at the South.

In the country, or section of country, where, the mercantile marine flourishes, there will the military marine flourish. You may transfer it to other localities, for great considerations of public good; you may create ports to receive it, where suitable ones were not provided by nature. Still, it is an exotic, sustained by cost and care; not a hardy plant, springing up spontaneously in its native soil.

Now, as to the current expenditures for the service of the navy. All articles of merchandise tend towards some great market, within the sphere of which they are produced. Their price has reference to that market. To obtain them on advantageous terms, a purchaser will go, as a matter of course, either to the place of production or to the place of market. This law of trade regulates the actions of private individuals, looking only to their own business. It applies to the purchases made by the United States, with this additional circumstance, that the Government buys on advertised proposals of contract. It does not go to the seller. It makes known its wants, and invites offers. It is immaterial to the Government where the contractor lives, where he collects the supplies that he furnishes, or where the profits he makes are to be invested or spent. The Government looks only to the quality of the article and the price; except that, as in duty bound, it seeks for things of the growth or manufacture of the United States, in preference to imported merchandise. It opens a free competition to every inhabitant of the country, whether he be of the North or the South, the East or the West. If the people of any State—South Carolina, for instance—do not put in for contracts, we are to presume it is because they do not produce the article wanted, or have other business that is more profitable.

Ay, but the still-reproached East, the ever-patient East! We, it seems, grow rich by the expenditure among us of the money of the United States. Absurd! We prosper, as we did before this Government existed, and as we should if it were to cease to exist in this hour, by the energies that are within us; by the properties of character which our sect and our fathers displayed in the overthrow of the monarchy of England, which brought them hither to this New World, and which marshalled them forward into the van of the battles of the Revolution.

I aver that the Government expenditures in the States of the East are not sufficient to exert any sensible effect upon their general industry or prosperity. Take an example, to show the truth of the case in the clearest light. Suppose you are to expend half a million of dollars in the construction and equipment of a ship of the line. What portion of the materials of that ship is furnished by the States of the East? Timber? No, that comes from Florida, and elsewhere at the South. Sails and cordage? Cotton is from the South, and hemp from Russia, or from the State of Kentucky. Copper, iron, lead? These are from Pennsylvania, from Wisconsin, or from foreign countries, except now and then a little iron smelted from bog-ore at the North. Flour? We import corn and wheat in vast quantities for our own consumption; we have none to sell to the Navy Department. Molasses, sugar, rice? None of these are produced in Yankee land. Pork and beef? They come to us from the great pastures of the interior, from the banks of the Ohio, from the State of Kentucky itself. To scarce any thing of all the costly materials and equipments of that ship can New England lay claim, unless it be a few white-pine spars and locust treenails, which are among the most insignificant of the items in the charges of her construction. Some things, however, our soil has contributed to the composition of the navy. We have given you the skill and science to shape and combine its inanimate materials, the productions of your forests, your fields, and your mines, and to form these into noble fabrics, which walk on the water at our command as things of life. We have given you the brave sailors, who man your gun-decks, and who, in the darkest hour of doubtful warfare, threw themselves into the strife, summoned back victory to your standard, and caused its star-spangled folds to fling themselves out in triumph once again to the breezes of their own blue heaven. These are the things which the East contributes to the navy of the Union.

In these remarks, I act wholly on the defensive. I deny the alleged fact of inequality in the distribution of the public expenditures; I deny the alleged causes or motives of the supposed inequality. There are two sides to this question. If I chose to do it, I could easily turn the tables on gentlemen, and from defence proceed to attack. Hundreds of times I have heard it complainingly said at the North—We pay for our lands, without any favors as to time, or reduction as to price, on the part of Government. No millions have been expended among us in the extinguishment of Indian titles. We have no profitable pre-emption speculations. No money by millions of dollars, no land by millions of acres, has been bestowed on us for aid in the construction of canals, roads, and railways. Our country is filled with common schools and the higher institutions of instruction, with no thanks to the rest of the Union; for not to us, as to the States of the West, has Congress given 9,030,469 acres of public land for the uses of education.

I denounce all such murmurs against the West, when I hear them in the mouths of my constituents at home; and I denounce all such murmurs against the North, when I hear them in the mouths of the members of this House. To the North I say: The five millions expended on the Cumberland road, the two millions of acres of public land, and the two or three millions of dollars in money, appropriated to similar objects, have been carried by the votes of your own representatives in Congress; that vast donation of lands to the new States of the West for the aid of education, like the perpetual prohibition of slavery in a part of the same region, was the large and enlightened idea of your own Nathan Dane; and I honor and applaud the patriotic forecast, and the generous liberality, which looked to the good of the whole nation, instead of shutting up the mind in the narrow limits of a single State. I am sorry that the same lawgiver did not possess a yet wider field for the operation of his ordinance.

To the West, in general, I say: You are mistaken as to the facts, when you suppose there is partiality in the action of the Federal Congress to your prejudice. It is quite the other way, as mathematical demonstration will show.

To Kentucky I say: The inequalities of which you complain are State inequalities, not sectional ones. Thus, we have spent in New Hampshire for internal improvements 35,529 dollars, in Vermont nothing; in North Carolina 197,573 dollars, in South Carolina nothing; in Kentucky nothing, and 859,124 dollars in Ohio. The simple juxtaposition of these examples of inequality proves that there is nothing sectional in the fact, unless you mean to hand over Ohio and Louisiana to the East, in the same deed, and by the same rule of transfer, which carry Virginia.

To every member of this House, whatever spot of the Union he represents, I say: Away with these local complaints; I am ashamed of them; they are unworthy of an American Congress. I have three sufficient answers for all such complaints. In the first place, it is immaterial to me where the money of an appropriation is to be expended. Is the appropriation constitutional? Is it required by the public service? These are the questions to be asked. In the second place, there is no just foundation for the complaints. I concur to the letter in the sentiment of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] that a union of States, such as ours, like the relations of private friendship, to be lasting, must be one of perfect equality. I say this equality exists to all practical purposes, on a fair and general view of the great sections of the Union. And if a State were to come here and say it could not be loyal without money, I would sooner spend money on it needlessly, lavishly, wastefully, ay, throw money away on it, than see it disaffected for want of expenditures within it, under the impression that it is unfairly treated by Congress or the sister States. Finally, whatever inequalities of this kind there might be, I say they would be counterbalanced a thousand-fold by the general benefits of the Union—the exemption of the States from domestic wars, border differences, impediments of intercourse—and their unity of force in foreign affairs. It is frequently said by gentlemen from the West, that the cost of Louisiana and Florida should not be charged to the receipts of the public lands, because of the political advantages of the acquisition to the whole Union. Be it so, but let the same rule be applied to other public expenditures. Remember that great objects cannot be attained except by the compromise and sacrifice of minor objects. Call to mind the strikingly pertinent observations of a celebrated statesman in reference to this subject: "All government, indeed every human benefit and enjoyment, every virtue, and every prudent act, is founded on compromise and barter. We balance inconveniences; we give and take; we remit some rights, that we may enjoy others; and we choose rather to be happy citizens than subtle disputants. As we must give some natural liberty to enjoy civil advantages, so we must sacrifice some civil liberties for the advantages to be derived from the communion and fellowship of a great empire." This consideration lies at the very foundation of a Union which, in its beautiful system, realizes the dreams of St. Pierre and Rousseau, of a continent confederated in the cause of civilization and peace.

In conclusion of all the statistical details with which I have troubled the House, I have these further facts to present. The electoral colleges of New England have supported Southern men for the chief magistracy of this nation three times unanimously, once with but one negative, again by large majorities—but from the organization of the Government to this day, only nine votes have been thrown by all the States south of the Potomac for presidential candidates north of that river. Add to which, the corresponding fact of one or the other of two candidates for the presidency, presented by the West, having been warmly supported by nearly the entire mass of the population of New England. I do not speak of this in reproach of the South or the West, but simply in vindication of the justice and fairness of the North.

Our country, with all its sectional diversity of views and feelings, is one. It is one in the rich, manly, vigorous, expressive language we speak, which is become the vernacular tongue as it were of parliamentary eloquence, the very dialect of constitutional freedom. It is one in the fame of our fathers, and in the historical reminiscences which belong to us as a nation. It is one in the political principles of republicanism which we feel and profess in common, no matter in what spot of earth our portion be cast. It is one in the substantial basis of our manners, in the warp, at least, of which the web is woven. It is one in the ties of friendship, affinity, and blood, binding us together throughout the whole extent of the land, in the associations of trade, of emigration, and of marriage. It is one in the general balance of interests and of business, arising from our mutual wants and the reciprocal interchanges of the products of our industry. It is one in our exterior relations, protected as these are by the honored flag of the Union. It is one in that glorious constitution, the best inheritance transmitted to us by our fathers, the monument of their wisdom and their virtue, under whose shelter we live and flourish as a people.

One we are in fact, one should we be in sentiment. To this great republic, union is peace, union is grandeur, union is power, union is honor, union is every thing which a free-spirited and mighty nation should glory to possess. To us all, next to independence, next to liberty, next to honor, be we persuaded that a cordial and abiding confederacy of the American people is the greatest of earthly goods. We, the several States which compose it, entered into it with conciliation to the people of our sister States in our hearts, and compromise of all secondary interests in our acts. Thus let us persevere, with the same emotions, fresh and bright as in the first conception, and welling forth in exhaustless abundance from our bosoms; feeling that, like the fabled fountains of Florida, they are capable to communicate matchless beauty and everlasting youth to this our beloved republic.

That, unlike other political societies, this will endure unchangeable forever, I cannot hope; but I pray to God, if, in the decrees of his providence, he have any mercy in store for me, not to suffer me to behold the hour of its dissolution: its glory extinct; the banner of its pride rent and trampled in the dust; its nationality a moral of history; its grandeur, a lustrous vision of the morning slumber, vanished; its liberty, a disembodied spirit, brooding, like the genius of the past, amid the prostrate monuments of its old magnificence.

And there is, in the burning chambers of the dread hereafter, no infinite of wrath vast enough for him, who, Eratostratus-like, to be remembered only for infamy, shall apply the torch of destruction to this fair Ephesian temple of our Union. That time, in some long, long future age, and that person may come, for the overthrow of our country. Accursed be the traitor, whensoever and wheresoever shall be his advent among us, like the spirit of evil, issuing from his realms of darkness to trouble the pure bliss of Paradise. To him that shall compass or plot the dissolution of this Union, I would apply language resembling what I remember to have seen of an old anathema: Wherever fire burns or water runs; wherever ship floats or land is tilled; wherever the skies vault themselves, or the lark carols to the dawn, or sun shines, or earth greens in his ray; wherever God is worshipped in temples or heard in thunder; wherever man is honored or woman loved—there, from thenceforth and forever, shall there be to him no part or lot in the honor of man or the love of woman. Ixion's revolving wheel, the overmantling cup at which Tantalus may not slake his unquenchable thirst, the insatiable vulture gnawing at the immortal heart of Prometheus, the rebel giants writhing in the volcanic fires of Ætna, are but faint types of his doom.

I speak plainly and strongly, as I feel, and without mincing my words; because I believe it to be the duty of every man, and especially of us, who are among the appointed sentinels of the constitution, to look well to these the issues of life and death to this nation. I do not, I cannot, I will not, believe that opinions, adverse hereto, exist any where within the bounds of the republic; and I would forestall their possible future up-springing. I would have our allegiance to the Union unshaken and unshakable; our constancy in the public cause, fixed as the north star in the firmament; our dedication to its interests, a vestal fire burning on with an unextinguishable flame forever. Here, in the eyes of our countrymen and of the world, with the muse of history before us to record our deeds and our words, let us, like Hannibal at the altar of his gods, swear eternal faithfulness to our country, eternal hatred to its foes. Show we that we are wedded to the Union for weal and for wo, as the fondest lover would hug to his heart the bride bound to him in the first bright ardor of young possession. We have not purposed to embark in this venture only to sail over the smooth surface of a summer sea, with hope and pleasure to waft us joyously along, but with resolved spirits, ready to meet, like true men, whatever of danger and vicissitude may descend upon our voyage, and to stand up gallantly for the treasure of honor and faith intrusted to our charge. Rally we, then, to the stripes and stars, as the symbol of glory to us, and the harbinger of liberty to all the nations of the world. So long as a shred of that sacred standard remains to us, let us cling to it with such undying devotion as the Christian pilgrims of the middle age cherished the least fragment of the cross; and let us fly to its rescue, when periled, whether by foreign or domestic assault, as they did to snatch the holy sepulchre from the desecration of the Infidel.

When Mr. CUSHING had concluded,
Mr. HAYNES rose and addressed the House as follows:

Whatever opinions may be entertained upon the subject now under consideration, it cannot be thoroughly and correctly understood without reference to the early legislation of the country, and the claims, so pertinaciously set up on the part of some of the States, that the waste lands held by certain other States were the common property of the Union. It is not here necessary to inquire at what period or by what State this claim was set up, as these facts may be readily ascertained by an examination of the journals of the Congress of the Confederation. Nor can it be for a moment apprehended that any attempt will be made to evade or deny the assertion that such a claim was made to these lands, as the common property of the Union, on the ground that they had been acquired by the common efforts and expenditures of that Union. Every one conversant with the history of revolutionary times knows that the ratification of the articles of confederation was postponed and suspended by several of the States, in the hope of coercing this concession from such States as possessed waste and unappropriated lands. Such were the apprehensions entertained of the effects to be expected from the delay of their ratification, as to call into exercise the efforts of our generous and powerful ally, the King of France, to induce the States which insisted most obstinately upon this prerequisite to waive their objections, and perfect the Union by ratifying the articles of confederation. Congress, from time to time, both for the purpose of satisfying the claims of the dissatisfied States, and for the further purpose of providing a fund for the payment of the debt of the Revolution, and for bounty to the officers and soldiers who entered the service for and during the war, urged the States to cede these waste and unappropriated lands. It may be true that a majority of the States never did recognise the claim thus set up for the Union, but it is equally certain that such claim operated powerfully to induce the several States which owned unappropriated lands to cede them, or a portion of them, to the Union.

In the preamble to the act of cession from the State of New York, of the 9th of March, 1780, the motives referred to are distinctly expressed in the following terms: "Whereas nothing under Divine Providence can more effectually contribute to the tranquillity and safety of the United States of America than a federal alliance, on such liberal principles as will give satisfaction to its respective members; and whereas the articles of confederation and perpetual union recommended by the honorable Congress of the United States of America have not proved acceptable to all the States, it having been conceived that a portion of the waste and uncultivated territory within the limits or claims of certain States ought to be appropriated as a common fund for the expenses of the war; and the people of this State of New York being, on all occasions, disposed to manifest their regard for their sister States:" "Be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, that the territory which may be ceded or relinquished by virtue of this act shall be and enure for the use and benefit of such of the United States as shall become members of the federal alliance of the said States, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever." Whether this cession from the State of New York conveyed anything or nothing to the Union, the motives which influenced it are alone to be considered, to induce the dissatisfied States to ratify the articles of confederation, which was not finally done until the 1st of March, 1781, and to provide a common fund for the benefit of the Union.

Following up the example, and in furtherance of the principle of New York, the General Assembly of Virginia, with certain reservations, did, on the 20th of October, 1783, pass an act ceding her territory northwest of the Ohio to the United States, upon condition "that all the lands within the territory so ceded to the United States, and not reserved for, or appropriated to, any of the aforesaid purposes, or disposed of in bounties to the officers and soldiers of the American army, shall be considered a common fund, for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the confederation or federal alliance of the said States, Virginia, inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bonafide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever."

The terms of the cession made by Massachusetts, on the 19th April, 1785, are "transfer, quit claim, cede, and convey to the United States of America, for their benefit, Massachusetts inclusive, all right, title, and estate, of and in, as well the soil as the jurisdiction," &c. Connecticut, by her act bearing date the 14th October, 1786, cedes "to the United States in Congress assembled, for the common use and benefit of the said States, Connecticut inclusive." North Carolina, by her act of cession of 2d April, 1790, cedes her waste lands, with certain reservations, "as a common fund, for the use and benefit of the United States of North America, North Carolina inclusive, according to their respective and usual proportion in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever." In like manner, Georgia, by her compact of cession, entered into with the United States on the 2d of April, 1802, after expressing certain other stipulations, declares, "that all the lands ceded by this agreement to the United States shall, after satisfying the above-mentioned payment of one million two hundred and fifty thousand dollars to the State of Georgia, and the grants recognised by the previous conditions, be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of the United States, Georgia included, and shall be faithfully disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatever." As the phraseology of the cessions from Virginia and North Carolina is somewhat peculiar, it may not be improper to show what was the mode of ascertaining the "usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure" of the several States of the confederation; although it may not be difficult to show that this particular mode of expression in no respect varies the character of the cessions of North Carolina and Virginia from those of the other States, nor can it be made the foundation for a mode of distribution differing in the smallest degree from that established by the cessions from the other States.

The eighth article of confederation prescribes the rule by which the requisitions upon the States for money shall be regulated, and is in the following terms: "All charges of war, and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defence and general welfare, and allowed by the United States in Congress assembled, shall be defrayed out of a common Treasury, which shall be supplied by the several States in proportion to the value of all land within each State, granted to, or surveyed for, any person, as such land, and the buildings and improvements thereon, shall be estimated according to such mode as the United States, in Congress assembled, shall, from time to time, direct and appoint." When it is remembered that the Congress of the confederation possessed no powers of taxation, properly so called, either direct or indirect; that the only mode of creating revenue was by requisitions upon the several States; that several of the States did, for a series of years, contend that the waste land, lying in any one of the States, was rightfully the property of the Union; that the ratification of the articles of confederation was delayed for the purpose of procuring, if possible, the recognition of this principle; that the first cession was made in reference to such claim, and for the purpose of facilitating their ratification; and especially, when we collate the article above quoted with the language of the various cessions, it would seem to be impossible to give such a strained construction to the plain import of plain language, as to derive for Congress, from the terms of any single cession, the power to distribute the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States.

But to be more explicit. The cession from Virginia, which, it is contended, conveys the power to distribute the money arising from the sale of the public land, conveys that land to the United States as a "common fund." The article of confederation above quoted declares that "all charges of war, and all other expenses that shall be incurred for the common defence and general welfare, and allowed by the United States, shall be defrayed out of a common Treasury." The Virginia cession provides that the land ceded shall be a common fund, for the benefit of the States, "according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure," and for no other purpose. The article of confederation provides that the "common Treasury shall be supplied by the several States," according to the standard therein directed. Both instruments provide the same means for the accomplishment of the same objects: a "common fund," a "common Treasury," to meet "the general charge and expenditure, which shall be incurred for the common defence and general welfare." In the one case, the "common Treasury" is to be raised by requisitions upon the respective States; and in the other, the "common fund" is created by the patriotic and distinguished liberality of a single State. Could it have been possible, without using the same terms, to have expressed an entire concurrence of purpose more perfectly than it is expressed in the article of confederation referred to, and the cessions from the various States, especially the State of Virginia? Other considerations enforce this view of the subject as conclusively as if it had been established by mathematical demonstration.

At the time the several cessions were made, no man ever dreamed that the sale of the public lands would ever furnish a fund for distribution among the States. The country was overwhelmed with debt; the Government had not the power to enforce the collection of requisitions of money from the States; and the strongest fears were entertained that the pressure of common danger being withdrawn, the arch of the Union would tumble into ruins. To meet the crisis—to "render the federal constitution adequate to the exigencies of Government and the preservation of the Union"—the convention was assembled in 1789, whose consultations resulted in the formation of the admirable constitution under which we now live. What were the exigencies of Government for which the convention was required to provide? The most important and pressing was the creation of a fund for the redemption of the public debt, by the adoption of such a system of taxation as might enable the Government to meet its pecuniary responsibilities without the delays, and vexations, and disappointments, and refusals, which had invariably attended the plan of raising revenue by requisitions upon the respective States. And yet, in this state of things, when the Government was bankrupt—when the States were resorting to the extraordinary measure of creating a general central Government, and giving to it the power of direct taxation over their citizens, and the entire control of their commerce, for the purpose of creating "a common fund" for the redemption of their common debt, and when scarcely any other exigency could have induced them to make such concessions—we are now gravely told that the "common fund," created by the cessions of portions of their public lands by the States, for meeting "their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure," and "for no other use or purpose whatsoever," was merely intended to enable this General Government to collect money from the people of the United States with one hand, and distribute it to the Governments severally with the other. And not only this, but that, in doing so, "their usual respective proportions in the general expenditure should be entirely disregarded."

Having very briefly and imperfectly adverted to the cessions of public lands from the several States, it is proper and necessary to inquire into the nature of the contracts by which other public lands have been acquired by the United States; and here it is not intended to follow the track which has been generally pursued by those entertaining the same views upon this subject. Much has been said of the comparative cost and revenue of the public lands. With great deference to the opinions of others, this is not believed to be the most correct view of the subject. It has already been shown that the cessions of land by the several States to the Union were intended as contributions to that "common Treasury" spoken of in the articles of confederation, to meet the "expenses incurred for the common defence," as expressed in the same article, and for "no other use or purpose whatsoever," as is expressly provided in the cession from Virginia. It is believed that as little difficulty exists in showing that the purchases from foreign nations belong to the same "common fund" with the lands received from the States of this Union. It is not necessary here to state an account of debit and credit between the land fund and tax fund, for the purpose of showing on which side a balance may preponderate, although such comparison may fall into a subsequent part of this inquiry. It will be sufficient to show by what means such purchases of lands were effected. No man at all acquainted with the history of this country can be ignorant that Louisiana was purchased from France, and Florida from Spain; nor that the first cost fifteen and the latter five millions of dollars, without estimating interest, difference of exchange, or any other incidental charge; nor will it be pretended that they were not paid for out of the public Treasury, out of that very "common Treasury" designed to provide for the "common defence" of the whole Union, as contradistinguished from its separate parts. How, then, can it be pretended that the money arising from the sale of the lands acquired by the purchase of Louisiana and Florida stands upon different ground, with respect to distribution, from money brought into the Treasury by taxation? Nor can this view of the subject be too clearly or strongly enforced upon the public mind.

The present constitution had for its object the perpetuity of the Union, and for that purpose conferred on the Federal Government certain powers, to be exercised for certain defined and specified purposes, and no others. Among these was the power "to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises;" and for what purpose? "To pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." The "common defence," "the general welfare" of the United States—that "defence" and that "welfare," which are "common" and "general" to the "United States" as a confederacy, as a whole, as contrasted with and distinguished from its several parts—not that vague common defence and general welfare understood by some to confer unlimited power of taxation and appropriation upon this Government, but such as may be provided for and promoted by the exercise of the powers definitely and specifically granted in the constitution, and by no other. If this view of the subject be correct—and it is not only intact, but believed to be intangible—it follows irresistibly that Louisiana and Florida were paid for out of the tax fund collected out of the pockets of the people for certain specified purposes; and, as an unavoidable consequence, that the public lands within their limits are bound, by every principle of law and equity, to stand in the place of the fund from which they were paid for. It then results in this: that this Government, for the better providing for the common defence and general welfare, appropriated a portion of the public money collected from the people in the purchase of stock, to be thereafter disposed of to the best advantage for the promotion of the objects for which the taxes were raised, and is therefore the trustee of the people for the faithful application of the proceeds of that stock for such purposes, and no other. It is useless to answer, that as the stock is worth more than the money it cost, the States are entitled, as bodies politic and corporate, to the profits, by a ratable distribution among them. The fund with which these purchases were made was not contributed by the States. It was contributed in the form of "taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," directly by the people. How, then, can Congress take a fund, or the proceeds of such fund, contributed by the people in their individual character, for certain definite purposes, "to provide for the common defence," &c., and distribute it among the State Governments? The thing is utterly absurd and impossible upon any fair constitutional principle. To close this branch of the subject, it is asserted, without the fear of successful contradiction, that as Congress can alone raise revenue by taxation for purposes common to the Union, and has appropriated a portion of the revenue so raised to the purchase of lands, that body is, to that extent, the trustee of the people, and bound for the faithful application of the whole trust property to the purposes and objects for which alone the money with which it was paid for was raised. This view of the subject is still more strongly enforced by the consideration that the whole of the public expenses, ordinary and extraordinary, including an amount of public debt exceeding four hundred millions of dollars, have been met and discharged exclusively by the fund raised from the pockets of the people by direct or indirect taxation. This assertion is not too strong when we advert to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of the 28th of April, 1836, by which it appears that, by a fair statement of the account current between the tax fund and the land fund, technically so called, by the returns rendered up to the 18th day of the same month of April, the balance due the land fund was only $3,016,961 68, not much more than one tenth of the sum now claimed to be subject to distribution for the years 1833, 1834, and 1835. What show of justice, then, would there be in such a scheme of distribution, by which the money collected from the people, and paid for public lands, shall be squandered, when received back again from the sale of these lands, among the Governments of the States of this Union? The catchword has been, that as the public revenue had accumulated greatly beyond the necessary wants of the Government, let it be returned to the people again by distribution. Of all the humbugs created in this age of invention for ministering food for political ambition or pecuniary cupidity, this is the most preposterous and absurd. Distribute money among the people, forsooth! The scheme is to distribute it to the regularly organized State Governments. It need not be said that the intention is to corrupt these Governments by giving them an interest at war with the best interests of the people, but it requires no exercise of the imagination to perceive that such would be the inevitable result.

Already have we heard it more than whispered, from a quarter most ominous, that if the revenue shall be so reduced by this notable scheme of distribution as to produce a deficiency in the Treasury for defraying the ordinary expenditures of the Government, the duties on wines will admit of augmentation, and those on silks be augmented or restored, according as they are now subject to or free from duty.* But what is the plan of distribution now proposed for our adoption? As before stated, instead of returning money to the pockets of the people from whom it had been previously collected, it contemplates dividing it among the State Governments. The cession from Virginia provides that the land shall constitute a "common fund," according to the "usual proportions of the States in the general charge and expenditure, according to the rule established by the articles of confederation." The federal constitution, in changing the mode of creating and collecting revenue, retained a rule analogous to that of the articles of confederation by which direct taxes should be apportioned among the States—the rule of federal numbers. While the bill under consideration proposes to distribute according to this rule, it is not until fifteen per cent. have been previously secured to the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Alabama, Missouri, Mississippi, and Louisiana, and to those at the Northwest, the benefits of the expenditures already made in building and repairing the Cumberland road, without any charge or deduction, except the nominal reimbursement from the two per cent. fund originally set apart for its construction. It is true, the federal constitution has set up no standard by which money or other favors shall be distributed among the States; and this is of itself sufficient to show that no such distribution was ever intended by it. But if the rule of direct taxation is settled, invariable, and, as far as may be, equitable between the States, it may be fairly concluded, that if, under any circumstances, a distribution of public money among them should ever be made, it would be regulated by the same standard. It is again asserted, that no rule of distribution of money different from the one established for regulating direct taxation could possibly be consistent with the constitution. But in addition, it is fearlessly asserted that, as the constitution is a grant of defined and specified powers to carry into effect objects equally definite, the power sought to be exercised by this bill is totally repugnant to its most obvious principles. It has been asked, what shall be done with the redundant revenue with which the Treasury is now overloaded? To the comprehension of a plain understanding there does not seem to be much mystery in the matter. If the land fund is sufficient to meet the necessary expenditures, repeal the whole of your taxes. If not sufficient, repeal a part of them. If more than sufficient, repeal the whole of the tariff, and curtail the sale of the public lands, by limiting it to actual settlers, and to actual settlers alone; and, in connexion with this latter subject, establish an equitable system of graduation in the price, according to the period which the land has remained subject to entry at the minimum price established by the Government.

* In Mr. Clay's last elaborate speech upon the bill for distributing the proceeds of the land sales, he is understood to have said, that if, in consequence of the distribution proposed, there should not be money in the

It might not be difficult to expatiate upon the general course of public affairs, not only since the commencement of the present administration, but from the adoption of our present form of Government; but it is not now considered necessary.

On one topic of general discussion within the last three years, a single remark may not be inappropriate. Believing, at the time the subject was first investigated in Congress, that the change of the deposit of the public money from the Bank of the United States to the local banks was, if not the wisest, among the wisest acts of General Jackson's civil administration, subsequent experience and observation have strengthened and confirmed that opinion. And I now as confidently believe, that if the Bank of the United States had held the control of the large amount of public money at the time its charter was about to expire, which would have been in its possession if the fiscal agency of the Government had not been previously taken away from it, the local banks would have been crushed, and a scene of pecuniary distress and ruin created, such as the wildest imagination would scarcely be able to conceive.

Treasury to meet ordinary expenditures, the duties on wines and silks might be restored or increased. This is ominous, but it is not the only circumstance going to show the connexion of his scheme, and the scheme of Mr. Calhoun, with the continuance, and, if necessary, the increase of a high tariff. It is sufficient to refer to the fact that the scheme to distribute dates with the "compromise" tariff act of 1833, intended by Mr. Clay, and so stated by him, to save, not to destroy, the protective system. If the scheme of distribution, in either form, as presented by Mr. Clay or Mr. Calhoun, shall be carried, my life on it, the tariff will be increased and perpetuated.—Note by Mr. H.

Mr. DUNLAP said, as the bill from the Senate embraced the object contemplated by the resolution under consideration, and as the time was near at hand for proceeding with the orders of the day, he would move to postpone the further consideration of the subject before the House until Monday next, at which time he should move to appropriate the three hours which would otherwise be devoted to the continuation of this debate to the consideration of the Tennessee land bill.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved to lay the resolutions of the Kentucky Legislature, together with the instructions, on the table.

Mr. STORER asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. SPEIGHT, in view of the importance of the motion, proposed that there should be a call of the House; which was agreed to.

After proceeding a short time with the call, Mr. MERCER moved that it be suspended; and after some conversation between that gentleman and Mr. SPEIGHT,

Mr. HANNEGAN remarked that he hoped the call would be proceeded in, and that they should have a full House, as the motion which he had made was intended by him to be a test vote on the subject of distributing the proceeds of the sales of the public lands.

The motion to suspend the call was lost, and the roll was then called through, as were also the absentees, when it appeared that 190 members were in attendance.

Mr. HESTER moved to suspend all further proceedings under the call; which was agreed to.

Mr. MANN, of New York, appealed to the gentleman from Indiana to withdraw the motion, as he desired to make a few remarks on the subject before the House.

Mr. HANNEGAN could not withdraw the motion.

Mr. ADAMS called for the reading of the resolution of instructions; which being done,

Mr. McCOMAS desired to know whether it was intended that the motion to lay on the table should be a test question on the propriety of distributing the proceeds of the public lands.

Mr. HANNEGAN repeated that he had made the motion expressly for the purpose of testing the sense of the House on the subject alluded to.

The motion to lay the resolutions of the Legislature of Kentucky, and the instructions moved by Mr. WILLIAMS, on the table, was then decided in the affirmative as follows:

So the whole subject was laid on the table.

The hour of one having arrived,

The SPEAKER announced the special order.

MR. LOVE moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of calling the States for petitions; lost.

MR. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, moved to take up the resolution from the Senate, fixing a day for the adjournment of Congress.

MR. HUNTSMAN called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

MR. CAMBRELENG hoped the gentleman from Kentucky would withdraw his motion. The best way to bring the session to a speedy termination was to persevere in transacting the public business, without wasting time in motions to suspend the rules.

MR. WILLIAMS declined withdrawing his motion; when it was negatived: Yeas 98, nays 89—two thirds being necessary.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

On motion of MR. CAMBRELENG, and in further execution of the special order of the 26th of January, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (MR. MANN, of New York, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill "making appropriations for certain fortifications of the United States for the year 1836."

The question pending being the motion of MR. CAMBRELENG, to amend the bill by inserting an item of $700,000 for the armament of the fortifications—

MR. FORESTER resumed his remarks, and set out by a review of the land bill. He then adverted to the course of MR. Van Buren upon former occasions, on the subject of internal improvements, the Bank of the United States, &c.

He examined that principle of the majority party, which said that "the spoils belong to the victors," which was an anti-democratic doctrine, and one of the most abominable federal maxims ever advanced. It was making the voice of the people give way to the voice of corruption. It might be New York democracy, but it was not the kind of democracy which prevailed in Tennessee. There it was held that the rule of democracy was the rule of the majority alone. The caucus system was another of the principles of the New York democracy; a principle he declared to be at war with the constitution. He described the manner in which he himself had been nominated to the Baltimore convention. Nine individuals out of ten thousand, at Nashville, had met and nominated him, and the nomination was afterwards approved of by some fifty or sixty more, and he paid as much attention to it as he should to the whistling of a bird. It was said the principle of the caucus system was indispensable to keep the party together. Why, carry out such a principle, and the election of a king might be justified under it. He again denounced it as one of the most dangerous of the federal doctrines, and tending to the most alarming inroads upon the liberties of the people. He then adverted to the loss of the fortification bill. He said he saw the chairman [MR. CAMBRELENG] of the committee of conference on that occasion when he returned, and asked him if they had agreed; and that gentleman informed him that they had, and that he was only waiting for an opportunity to make the report to the House. He was, however, astonished just after, to see the same gentleman get up and protest against that very report from being made, on the ground of there being no quorum in the House. He remarked upon the extraordinary manner in which the journal was kept at present, by the protest of Messrs. GLASCOCK, ROBERTSON, and GARLAND of Louisiana, containing their reasons for not voting on the abolition question, being now spread on the journal. Every other member had an equal right, and the journal might be filled in this way. He then referred to Judge White's letter to John Ross, and said that Judge White had been consulted by Ross as a lawyer, and that his letter was a legal opinion. When the question of State jurisdiction came up, Judge White reiterated the same doctrine contained in that letter, that, quoad the United States, the Cherokees were independent; but that Georgia, being one of the original States, she had supreme jurisdiction within her territorial limits. The one was a legal opinion, given on consultation in the character of counsel, and was confined to the question of sovereignty between the United States and the Cherokees; the other was his constitutional opinion as respected the latter people and the State of Georgia. There was, then, no inconsistency between the two documents.

MR. F. then adverted to the subject of the surplus revenue. He had made a calculation, and he found that all the bills before Congress at that time, if they should pass, amounted, exclusive of the French spoliation claims, to an appropriation of about twenty-three million of dollars, say twenty-five million of dollars, and this would inevitably leave a surplus in the Treasury. To say that to return a people the money that belonged to them would corrupt them, was absolutely ridiculous. This was the argument of the gentleman from Georgia [MR. HAYNES] that morning, and it was the strangest he had ever heard from any man. The manner in which Congress had been in the habit of voting away the public money was far more corrupting. He censured the mode of members voting books to themselves, perhaps to the value of a thousand dollars each; and he had always condemned it.

On the subject of the deposit banks, he reviewed the course of the House on the resolution of MR. WISE, in resisting an inquiry into the connexion of that "traitor and perjured scoundrel," Reuben M. Whitney, with those banks. It was due to the Secretary of the Treasury that this investigation should have been had, in spite of the defence made of him by the gentleman from New Hampshire, [MR. PIERCE], that that officer was above public opinion. What the facts were, MR. F. knew not; but it was due to MR. Woodbury, and due to the country, that the charges made on the floor of that House, by one of its distinguished members, should have been met. He would say no man was above public opinion, not even General Washington himself, in his day. It was a despotic doctrine to say that any man was above public opinion, where "a King could do no wrong." After dwelling on these topics for some time, he concluded; and

Mr. PICKENS obtained the floor, and said he would move that the committee rise, though, if it was desired, he would proceed.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, said it was evident there was not a quorum present, and he asked that the Chair count the committee.

The Chairman counted, and reported only fifty-one members present.

Mr. MERCER said a quorum was doubtless within the Capitol, and he would take that opportunity of sending to the Chair an amendment to the amendment, authorizing the President of the United States to expend so much of said sum as he may deem expedient for the purpose of establishing a national foundry. Mr. M. (Mr. PICKENS having given way) made a few remarks in relation to his amendment.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, was in favor of the object of his colleague, but he would suggest some limitation of the amount to be appropriated for the purpose, say one hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. MERCER replied that a limitation was hardly necessary, inasmuch as money laid out for cannon was just as valuable to the country as if it was preserved in gold or silver coin. He again entered into a brief statement, showing the necessity of the Government having a foundry of its own, and thereby the insuring of the manufacture of a good material. He preferred leaving the sum to be expended to the discretion of the Executive.

Mr. PICKENS said it was not agreeable to him to trespass upon the attention of the committee, and he trusted he never could be induced to do so except from considerations of duty.

Mr. Chairman, this debate has taken a wide range, and doctrines have been advanced and sentiments avowed, against which I feel bound to raise my most solemn protest. The chairman of the Committee of "Ways and Means" [Mr. CAMBRELENG] withdrew an amendment on a former bill embracing the same principles, but declared that he would consider the whole debate as open upon the present occasion.

However, before I proceed to reply to what has been advanced by other gentlemen, I propose to make a few observations on the general principles which shall govern my vote on the bill immediately under the consideration of the committee.

As to appropriations towards those fortifications calculated to give efficiency and protection to our navy, I perhaps would be inclined to go as far as most gentlemen. I am in favor of those that are important for these purposes, and no other, so far as the Atlantic coast is concerned. I look upon it as one of the most idle and visionary schemes that has ever been conceived, to attempt a military line of fortifications on our Atlantic coast, similar to those which European Governments have adopted. Our population, comparatively speaking, is sparse, and we have a coast equal in extent to the whole western coast of Europe. Under these circumstances, our resources would not justify an attempt to encircle ourselves with a system of fortifications on a plan similar to those which more populous and far less extensive countries have adopted. Besides, we have no border Powers against which it may be necessary to protect ourselves. We are remote from all other Powers, with an immense and increasing commerce. Our physical position, and all the circumstances with which we are surrounded, proclaim a navy to be our only system of enlarged national defence. Our expenditures for fortifications ought to be made exclusively with a view to give protection and energy to our navy. With our extensive coast, you may make fortifications for land defence, and have your system, as you may suppose, perfect; but give your enemy ascendancy upon the ocean, and they will land their forces at whatever points they may think proper. No commercial country can rely for defence upon any thing but a well-regulated navy.

Our true policy of defence is to increase and strengthen it by judicious points of fortification, so as to enable us to protect our whole coast by a stronger naval power than any nation would be able to concentrate against us. With this view, and looking to the natural division of our coast into four great bays as it were—the first from Passamaquoddy to Cape Cod, the second from Cape Cod to Cape Hatteras, the third from Cape Hatteras to Cape Florida, and the fourth to the Sabine—I would say that extensive navy yards, with efficient fortifications, should be established at the most suitable points between these different capes, so that an ordinary naval force, with brave and enterprising men, could easily defend the whole frontier, and at the same time protect our commerce. For instance, I would have such a navy yard with fortifications at or near Boston—the same at or near New York—then at Norfolk and the mouth of the Chesapeake—the same at Charleston—and then at Pensacola, for the defence of the Gulf, and the commerce of the West. I would place these points on the best and strongest footing, equal to any in Europe, and make little or no expenditures on any other points, so far as our Atlantic frontier is concerned.

It is all idle and visionary to attempt to place our coast in a perfect state of defence by stationary fortifications; this can alone be done by those that move upon the face of the deep. There is scarcely any fortification but what can be passed under favorable tides and winds, and it is a military maxim that there is none but what can be taken. Look to those that were erected at Antwerp, with so much skill and labor, on the same plan of Fortress Monroe, and which Bonaparte himself pronounced impregnable, and what was the result? The French battered them to the ground in twenty-four hours. The truth is, that for an invading force on land we must at last rely upon "high minds and brave hearts," with bayonets, and not fortifications. Besides, sir, the genius of our institutions is at war with a standing army. But extend your visionary and wanton schemes of fortifications, and they call for an increased force to keep them in repair. Sir, I rejoice to say that I believe the majority of the officers of your present army are men worthy to be trusted with the liberties of their country. But increase your military points, and call for a corresponding increase of men, and then place all under profligate and ambitious rulers, and there is no patriot who will not tremble for the consequences to his country.

Mr. Chairman, there has been a great change in the condition and resources of our country within the last few years. Under the application of steam power to our coast and rivers, remote sections have been brought together, and the energies of the community have been condensed. Our weakness, arising from a sparse population, has been to a great extent overcome. If this be the effect of steam as applicable to the water, what must be the operation of things under the tremendous schemes that are now in progress to bring the interior West to the seacoast by means of railroads? I would rather have one railroad running from our coast into that brave and enterprising country, for the purposes of defence, than all the fortifications your overflowing Treasury can erect. For military purposes, heretofore, communities have been strong in proportion to the denseness of their population. But the recent triumphs of invention and art over nature seem likely to develop new energy and resources, and may change the whole scheme of military defences in an extensive and widely populated country. Under these views, I shall never vote for any fortification that cannot be shown to be necessary for the strength and support of the navy. I would desire to have but few points, and place them on the most liberal and substantial basis. It is nothing but a wanton waste of the public money to attempt to embrace too many interests, and cover too many points.

Fortification Bill.

But, sir, I will now look at the operation of this system in another point of view. While you have been expending, for the last twenty years, millions upon millions in certain sections of this Union, other extensive sections have been, to a great extent, entirely neglected. When my colleague, [Mr. THOMPSON,] some weeks since, with so much ability, demonstrated the unequal operation of your naval appropriations, he drew but a just picture of this Government in all its fiscal operations. As to our navy, I am disposed to make some allowances for appropriations heretofore, from the fact that our tonnage has been owned in, and our large commercial transactions have, in a great measure, taken place in those sections where the demand and supplies for a navy and its appendages were naturally called for. But we have now reached a new era in our affairs, when other sections and other interests must be attended to. Heretofore your Government has been profuse in its expenditures for the defence of those portions of your country which you boast of as being naturally the strongest, while you have neglected those portions which you have proclaimed to be the weakest. Is this the sound policy that should direct the energies of a fostering Government to protect equally the exposed points of a united people?

Let it not be supposed that we complain of the unequal disbursements, merely for the dollars and cents involved. No; it is because the operation is deeply connected with the great principles of liberty. As a people under one Government, we present a different state of things from any other people. We are one for certain great purposes, and separate for others. As far as the pecuniary and fiscal transactions of Government are concerned, it is not to be disguised that we have sectional interests differently affected. As far as the States are concerned, we have in each peculiar sentiments, habits, and feelings. To preserve these is the very essence of our separate independence and existence. No people can be free and independent who are habitually and systematically excluded from the favors and benefits of the Government that acts upon them. Let it become fixed, as a settled policy, that the West and the South are only to feel this Government in its exactions, while other sections are to feel it in its disbursements—let it be known that we are to be converted into Roman provinces, from which you are to collect treasure and wealth to be distributed amongst those who may be styled "Roman citizens"—and then, sir, if such a system is to last—if this state of things is to be continued, you will soon see, under it, our industry and enterprise droop and grow dull; you will see our spirits wither and die; genius will turn from lofty aspiration; our people will lose their burning feeling of patriotism; and from manly independence we will tamely sink down to become serfs and vassals under a mighty empire, where even the very boundaries of the States will be lost and forgotten amid the ruin and desolation thrown over a broken and disheartened country!

It is useless and idle, at this period of the world, to talk about liberty, so far as it may be identified with personal rights and individual protection. These stand secured, and are, to a great extent, consecrated in the feelings and institutions of every civilized community on earth. In those great struggles which ended in the overthrow of feudal barbarism, the contest was for individual and personal liberty. But since the combination of the Holy Alliance, together with all the improvements and schemes of modern society, every thing seems to tend towards an amalgamation of all Christendom into one system of organization, and the great contest now is for the political independence of separate communities. This view becomes deeply interesting to us as independent States. An habitual exclusion of any portion of the States of this confederacy from the fiscal benefits of this Government, and power over its action, must end in a sacrifice of their political independence. Hence it is, that political power becomes deeply identified with political liberty. A people to be free must feel that they are so.

Compare these great principles with what now actually exists and what has existed for the last twenty years. In that period of time, this Government has collected $420,000,000, and after throwing out of the calculation the $130,000,000 which have been appropriated for the payment of the public debt, we then have left $290,000,000, of which $210,000,000 have been disbursed in the middle and Northern sections, while only $80,000,000 have been disbursed in all the other sections.

Let not gentlemen suppose that the West and South are factious, when they oppose this system of disbursements. No! they see involved in it the highest interests and even the liberties of their country.

I come now to what has been advanced by others in the progress of this debate. The chairman of the "Ways and Means" observed that the revenue system which this Government had adopted for the last twenty years was the most unjust and oppressive that was ever adopted by any civilized Government. In this, sir, I agree with him. He also said that the commencement of this system was the tariff of 1816. To a considerable extent, I agree with him here too. But when he came to assert that the "compromise bill" was the consummation of that system, I confess I could not exactly understand him. There are principles in this bill which by no means receive my approbation. The gentleman spoke of the evils complained of from the surplus in the Treasury, and intimated that if it had not been for the "compromise," a system would have been adopted which would have reduced the revenue now down to the wants of the Government. All this sounded very well from the gentleman in one part of his remarks. But when he came to another part, where he was attempting to defeat the "land bill," or any other just distribution of this surplus amongst the States, I confess I was astonished to see the gentleman labor so hard to prove that there was and would be no surplus.

He entered into a long calculation to show that there would be no more than the wants of the Government would require. At one moment, he denounced the "compromise" as producing the evils of the surplus, to show how much better others could have done for the country; and then, when he desired to retain what was in the Treasury from a distribution, he attempts to prove that the same "compromise" has produced no surplus beyond what the Government will actually want. I leave the gentleman to reconcile this palpable absurdity and contradiction in his argument, if argument it can be called. But, sir, this contradiction was not more astonishing to me than the reasoning by which he jumped at his conclusions. He spoke loudly on the "ebbs and floods" of importations and exportations; and from something connected with these "ebbs and floods" which he knew of, he asserted that two years hence our importations would not exceed $40,000,000, and upon this our imposts would yield $10,000,000 of revenue.

Fortification Bill.

[H. OF R.]

[Here Mr. CAMBRELENG explained, and said that he meant the dutiable articles would not exceed that amount, but admitted that the importations would amount to $150,000,000.]

Mr. PICKENS resumed, and said he did not so understand the gentleman before. But if the gentleman admits that our importations will equal $150,000,000, I am totally at a loss to perceive how he comes to the conclusion that our customs will then yield only $10,000,000. The system is biennial in its reduction, and then only amounting to ten per cent. If the whole importations are $150,000,000, unless the proportions vary entirely from what they have been heretofore, the dutiable articles must equal 66,000,000 of dollars, and this must yield a revenue of 17,000,000 of dollars, instead of $10,000,000. No, sir; with our increasing and wide-spreading population, stretching itself over the exuberant valleys of the Mississippi—the vast schemes of internal improvements developing the resources of the interior—industry and enterprise, invigorating the remotest quarters of our land—all, all, proclaim the increasing means of a great people, with corresponding wants and demands. Under this prospect of things, I should be induced to think that in two years more our importations would reach 170,000,000 of dollars, and that our customs would yield $18,000,000. Your exports in cotton alone, for the year ending on the 1st of last October, sold for $73,000,000, and this year they will probably reach near $90,000,000. This was the article which, in the plenitude of your wisdom, you pronounced over-produced three years ago, when we raised less than ten hundred thousand bags, and sold it for less than nine cents, and you declared that production had then outrun demand. Last year we raised above 300,000 bags more, and sold it, notwithstanding your over-production, for sixteen cents. No man can foretell the developments of this country under a wise system of free trade. No man can foresee the immense increase of importations and exportations of a free and unrestrained people, with the freshness of the virgin wilderness before them.

The gentleman cannot make the surplus vanish by figures. Even if all the reasonable expenditures that have been officially asked for be made, we will have, on the 1st of January next, at least $46,000,000 of surplus in the Treasury, supposing the public lands to yield $17,000,000; and many put them as high as $25,000,000. Good faith and prudence demand that this should be deposited, not in the corporations of the States, but in the treasury of the separate States themselves, in proportion to their federal representation, they being responsible for the payment. This would give us the faith and credit of the States instead of the banks. But of this, and of the gentleman's argument on the "land bill," I will say more on another occasion.

The gentleman, in his calculations to reduce the surplus, has placed $7,000,000 to be appropriated for Indian treaties, and in this I suppose he is correct. He also put down $5,000,000 for the Florida war. Mr. Chairman, I will not say that this is too much, but I will say that it is four times as much as it ought to have been. I will here take occasion also to say that this is one of the most disgraceful wars that has ever occurred—disgraceful in its origin, and of no credit to those who have had the termination of the first campaign. I am rather induced to believe that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] has given us the true causes of this war. It is not improbable that it was engendered by iniquitous authority given to agents and others, who, under the vile pretext of seizing fugitive slaves and purchasing others before the emigration of the lawless savages could take place, attempted in some instances to seize even the children of their chiefs for bondage and sale, and then committed imposition and outrage until suffering nature could bear it no longer. I forbear to say more at present, for I may be misinformed, and I trust, for humanity, and for the honor of our Government, that I may be. But I will say, that whatever may or may not have been the treatment of the Indians, I believe that many of those who have volunteered to defend your border have been, to say the least, treated with coldness and neglect. I do not stand here to complain for them. What they have suffered and borne, they have borne without a murmur, for the honor and character of their State. But representing, as I do, perhaps as many of these spirited men as any other gentleman, I take occasion to say that they volunteered their services, not, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] sneeringly says, because it was to them "fat business," but to defend your exposed frontiers, after this Government, from neglect and injustice, had involved us in a cruel and merciless war of plunder and murder. These very men who have so honorably sustained your stars and your stripes, were from amongst those whom your Government press here, and its pensioned bands, have denounced for the last two years as traitors to their country. And what has been the fact? While they have gone forth to encounter hardship and exposure in vindication of your honor and your power, those who, some years since, were so eager to exhibit their patriotism by volunteering in a civil war of extermination to be waged on their own brethren, have made no move in this recent war to let off the exuberance of their spirit, but have kept back in that silence which belongs to their servility. After all that our citizens have done in this unfortunate savage war, it ill becomes the officer you placed there to command them, considering that he had but recently come fresh from the fields of his triumph in manœuvring and strategy—I say it little becomes him to cast a sneer over them as "volunteers," and not "good troops."

But, sir, to return. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] to exhaust the surplus, has put down $10,000,000 for the war in which we will be involved with Mexico on our Southwestern borders.

Mr. Chairman, to say the least of it, this declaration, coming from one who bears such a relation to this House and country as the gentleman does, was as imprudent as any thing could well be. Every thing relating to the affairs of Texas involves questions of the deepest and most delicate interest, and it does not become us at present to say or do any thing that may lead to embarrassment. I trust there will be no war to which the gentleman alludes. Whatever may be the power or policy of those Governments that are in their nature unlimited, I hold that, under our constitution, which we are sworn to defend, with its limited trust powers conferred on us for the interest and benefit of this people, we have no right to go into a war except purely for self-defence. There are certain great moral obligations which should ever bind Governments as well as individuals, and which, particularly under our peculiar institutions, should never be forgotten on any occasion, no matter how tempting. A war with Mexico, for conquest, would lead to a conflict with European Powers, the end of which it would not be easy to foretell. I have as much cause to feel sympathy as most gentlemen, for I had the companion of my boyhood—the friend of my maturer years—brave, chivalrous, and daring to the highest degree, inhumanly butchered in the fall of the Alamo. But I shall never suffer the feelings and sympathies of my heart to prompt me, under impulse, to do any thing calculated to involve others in consequences the most serious, unless under a case of clear justification.

But, sir, whatever may have been the calculations of gentlemen, the recent glorious and triumphant victory gained to the arms of Texas has entirely dispelled them.

H. of R.]

Fortification Bill.

I deprecated debate heretofore, because I feared that it might lead to consequences calculated to embarrass the negotiating power of this Government. I frankly avow that it is an object near and dear to my heart, to acquire Texas for this Union. Sir, I desire this, not, as has been said, to extend the boundaries of slavery, but for the purpose of extending the boundaries of liberty. Who is there so cold and heartless that he would desire to limit the confines of this great and growing republic? If even all the nations of Christendom were anxious to adopt our constitution, and cover themselves under its principles, is there a man here whose heart would not beat, and whose eye would not kindle with joy, at the anticipation of such an event? And who is there so narrow and contracted that would not extend our union and protection to those who are our neighbors, who speak our language—identified with us as they are in interest and in feeling—who went from our fire-sides and from our altars, who are our own brethren and relatives? Who is there among us that would turn his hand upon the hardy enterprise of a brave and daring people?

Yes, sir! they are ours by position; ours by all the sympathies of our nature, ours by all the bonds of interest; ours by all the ties that can bind man to his fellow-man. I desire their union, not because it would strengthen the slaveholding States—I scorn to place it upon any such narrow grounds—but because I desire to nurture with our fostering care a noble empire for the free, just now quickening into life; because I desire that our banner may float aloft, and that the whole race of civilized man shall sleep in peace under its broad and benignant folds.

Mr. Chairman, I come now to examine some of the abstract doctrines which fell from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELEN,] and which I heard with profound astonishment. The gentleman, after speaking of the triumphs of the democracy, proclaimed that he hoped the time was soon coming when the people would declare, in language not to be mistaken, "that no legislation should bind posterity." Sir, if this sentiment had been uttered only by the colleague of the gentleman on my extreme right, [Mr. MOORE,] it would have excited in me no attention, for I took that gentleman's wild declamation to be better suited for the "loco foco" party in the streets of New York than for the halls of legislation; but coming as it did from the chairman of the "Ways and Means," who from his years and experience may be supposed not to speak without reflection, it is a doctrine which deserves the most serious attention of this country. I am aware that this doctrine claims for its origin high authority—authority which in my opinion has been looked to with full as much reverence as it deserves. I am aware that it has recently been promulgated in an ingenious pamphlet from Ohio against all corporations, and that it is openly preached in the Northern and middle sections of this Union, where in all probability it will soon become the popular doctrine of the day.

What, sir! no legislation bind posterity! Push this doctrine to its consequences, and where does it lead to? What becomes of your public faith? What becomes of your national honor? Let it be known that those treaties which bind you in your intercourse with the nations of the earth are to be disregarded and defied by the whim, the interest, or the ambition, of the ascendant party of to-day, and we must then necessarily be excluded from civilized society. No legislation bind posterity! What bore us in glory and in triumph through the war of our Revolution, but that legislation which bound posterity to redeem the debt incurred to sustain your armies upon the field of battle? What sustained us through the second war of our independence, but the power to pledge the resources of this nation for the great purposes of self-preservation? Is this Congress to do nothing that can bind those who are to come after us? Go back at once and tear up your declaration of independence itself—scatter into a thousand pieces the parchment of your constitution, and substitute, in the place thereof, the shouts of a mob proclaiming their triumphs of to-day, or the power of a lawless multitude waving over a blood-stained land the sceptre of anarchy to-morrow. No legislation bind posterity! Where is faith? Where is honor? Where is public law? Where is public morality? Sir, this is a doctrine at war with peace, policy, and honor. It breaks down all that is venerable, virtuous, and consecrated, in the institutions of civilization itself. If this be the doctrine that the gentleman and the party with which he is identified intend practically to enforce in this country, I can tell him, that when he attempts it, a hundred thousand plumes will wave over a hundred thousand lances, couched to vindicate all those sacred rights which have been acquired under the plighted faith of this Government.

But, sir, the gentleman dropped another remark that struck me with peculiar force. He asserted that the time would soon come when the Government should sell the public lands to none but emigrants who were actual settlers. Where is the right under the constitution by which this Government would attempt to exclude any class of free citizens from purchases of the public domain? Where is the right by which you shall claim to distribute it amongst a particular class? If it be intended by this to feed the appetite and minister to the desires of that class who may have no peculiar ties or interests to bind them to the place of their nativity—if it be intended to catch that class who move through the land from one end to the other, having no home, and feeling for no country—then it is vile agrarianism. Has it come to this, that a man is to be excluded from the benefits and privileges under this Government because, by industry, economy, or enterprise, he should be so fortunate as to accumulate property, or because he may happen to be associated with others who have? Are citizens whose ties and interests may bind them to reside in one State, to be excluded from holding a freehold in another?

If this system of selling alone to a certain class be intended by the gentleman as an equal division of the public domain, then he should remember, that when the Roman people came to receive their distribution from the public granaries, they became prostituted and debased. When their conquering generals came loaded with the spoils of devastated provinces, and were enabled to deal out bread and bounties to this class or that class, then, through bribery and corruption, they bought their way to power over the prostrate liberties of their country.

But the gentleman made another declaration, which I confess filled my heart with the most gloomy forebodings for the future. After speaking of the bloated state of things in the country at present, he concluded by declaring that "the whole nation was now one common gambling house!" Considering the position he occupies in this House, and the relation he bears to the dominant party that now rules this confederacy—considering that, from his residence, he must be intimately acquainted with the secret springs of speculation and commerce—I confess I heard this solemn declaration with no ordinary emotions. This nation one common gambling house! And who made it so? Let those who hold the reins of Government answer this awful question. Mr. Chairman, next to the omnipotence and omnipresence of that superintending Providence that moves upon the affairs of the world, there is no power that exercises so great an influence over the feelings, the sentiments, and the very nature of man, as the Government that acts upon him, and those who administer its authority. Let an individual become abandoned and profligate, and the consequences of his vice and iniquity are for the most part confined to himself, and those immediately around him. But let those who hold in their hands the destinies of a great people become corrupt and lawless—let them trample over the great fundamental principles of the Government—let them become ambitious and profligate—and the consequences are felt in the remotest circles of society; the highest and the lowest come under this tremendous influence. Look over the world and see its fairest portions, where civilization, art, and refinement, once held their soft and mingled sway, now laid low in ruin and decay. Go, walk by the broken columns of the Parthenon, or stand on the grave of Miltiades—go and visit the tomb of Virgil, or the villas of Tully—and why is it that you hear no longer the voice of the orator, or see no more the poet and the warrior? Is it because the uplifted hand of God has forever blighted those fairest portions of his creation? No, no; it comes from the iniquity of corrupt, fallen, ambitious man. It is his usurping hand that has laid these fair regions low, and made a degenerate, desponding, and broken-hearted people.

Fortification Bill.

[H. OF R.]

And, sir, when it is now announced that our "nation is one common gambling-house," let those who sit on the seats of power tremble for the future. They may pass through this world, and receive its applause; they may proclaim in triumph that they have received the approbation of their country, and when the gnawings of a guilty conscience shall be felt, they may pour upon it the sweet unction that rises from the huzzas of a passing mob; but when they shall have gone through these scenes, and shall come to that last sad day when the secrets and recesses of the human heart shall be laid open before a tribunal that is never deceived and that never errs; when they rise before the searching eye of an avenging God, then let the question be asked, who made this nation one common gambling house; and, if I mistake not, you will see them quake and tremble as did Babylon's corrupt and revelling crew when they beheld upon the wall the handwriting that announced their guilt and proclaimed their destiny.

Mr. Chairman, I propose to examine, who "made us one common gambling-house." Another gentleman from New York [Mr. McKesson] took this occasion to pass a eulogy upon the present administration. He also exhibited the claims of the different candidates for the presidency, making all merely sectional, except one, who stood upon broad and enlarged principles, that embraced the whole Union—who stood pledged to carry out the principles of the present administration. And this gentleman, at the conclusion of his remarks, with quite as much modesty as discretion, thought proper to read us a lecture on parties, deprecating all party topics, as not to be drawn into discussion on this great bill of so much interest. Yes, sir, this Pharisaical party, who arrogate to themselves all virtue, and thank God that they are not as other men, have the effrontery to call upon us to hold our peace, while they stand pledged to carry out the principles of the present administration! Let us briefly look back and see what are these principles.

One of the first avowals of principle was the indirect pledge made by the President in his famous letter to the Tennessee Legislature, in which he laid it down that no member of Congress should be appointed to office during his membership, and for two years afterwards. The next great pledge made in the canvass was that no man should be dismissed from office for opinion's sake. This principle was indirectly avowed by the war made upon those who were supposed to have done so. Then came the celebrated inaugural, in which reform! reform! stood out in bold relief in every line. The "Augean stables were to be cleansed." Now, I hold that the public pledges which a man makes before the world are as binding upon him, by all the principles of sound morality, as his pledged honor in private; and he who would wantonly disregard the one would violate the other. Those public men who notoriously set at defiance all the pledges that they have ever made, go very far to set an example well calculated to produce looseness of morality and general profligacy, all tending to make the nation a common "gambling-house," where falsehood and treachery hold a triumphant sway.

What has been the fact with reference to the first pledge, to which I have alluded? More members of Congress have been appointed to office than under any three administrations since the commencement of the Government. And as to dismissals from office for political opinions, I have only to state the remarkable fact, that in all the administrations of this Government up to the present, all the dismissals together amount to only seventy-four, while in this administration there have been upwards of nine hundred; and two hundred and thirty of them important officers. Is this the principle the gentleman [Mr. McKesson] would advocate? As to the reform pledged in the inaugural, we have had it. This modern reform has come over us, with all its blessings. True, there has been a change, but it has only been a change from those who were in office, to the vilest and most lawless crew that were ever raised up under the dispensations of Providence to scourge a degenerate and ungrateful people. Sycophancy and servility have taken the place of all the heroic and manly virtues. The rooks, together with obscene birds, have perched themselves in the high places of the land, and we sit here beneath, surrounded daily with their filth and putrified corruption. Office-holders (now become miserable dependants) and office-seekers infest every turn and corner; and let it be known that any man has influence, from his being the tool of those who have patronage to confer, and he is overwhelmed with the bowing and cringing of these slaves and beggars. Crowds of miserable hungry beings creep and crawl, in the darkness of midnight, through the hidden recesses and gloomy avenues that lead up to the throne of royal favor. These creatures, generated as they are in despotism, are pervading the country and becoming more loathsome than the creeping lice or "slimy frogs of Egypt" ever were in the days of God's judgments. This, sir, is the reform with which we are blessed.

Mr. Chairman, we cannot shut our eyes to what we see passing around us. The Government is virtually changed, and the people seem to be sinking into acquiescence. The dismissal of the first cabinet, upon the notorious principles involved, was an open avowal that arbitrary will should govern even in private circles. The war waged upon all the constituted authorities of the land—upon the Supreme Court, upon the Senate, and even at first upon this House, because they were favorable to a recharter of the United States Bank, and then the appeals constantly made to the people as one aggregate mass—all, all, announced, in language not to be mistaken, that the constitutional republic of States was to be broken down, and that a simple democracy of brutal numbers, with an elective and unlimited monarchy, was to be raised over the ruins.

The President has habitually, through flattery, appealed to the passions and prejudices of all that is ignoble and low in society, to sustain him in his reckless career upon the institutions of his country. In this he has pursued the course of all those who have intended to usurp the liberties of the people. Cæsar, when he crossed the Rubicon, did it to bless the people and preserve the laws. He refused the crown that was urged upon him, and then took royal power to please the people. By what authority is it that the President makes his appeals to the people, as contradistinguished from the laws and constitution of his country? He was elected, not by a simple majority of the whole, but by majorities from the States. Every principle in the constitution is against making this a simple majority Government. It was made, and can alone be altered, by States. The States are equal in one branch; and even the representation in this House is differently modified from different States. Change this state of things, and convert it into a simple unmixed democracy, and you immediately raise one interest in society in deadly hostility against another, which must end, as all simple democracies have done, in a dictator or an elective but unlimited monarchy. To restrain the Executive interest in all Governments, there must be created some independent and antagonist interest in society, which shall be habitually felt in the practical operation of the Government. You have wisely abolished the aristocracy of the old world; but unless we substitute for it, in the action of this Government, the territorial interests of the States, to be felt in full effect through a co-ordinate branch, we have improved nothing on English liberty. The Executive, without this check, necessarily becomes the source of all honor and power, and absorbs all other interests.

Is this not the fact now? Is there a practical man here who does not know that the Executive is at this moment the controlling and unrestrained power of this confederacy? Is it not proclaimed with triumph that he has a majority in both Houses? Where, then, is the practical check?

I maintain, sir, that the Government, in fact, is changed, and has become absolute? Look at the history of the times, and doubt it if you can! Some two years since the President issued a proclamation for the open purpose of bringing down civil war upon an independent State of this Union. This extraordinary document declared that the States "were not and never were at any period sovereign and independent." This assertion was directly in the face of all history, for the declaration of independence itself announced that "these colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States." The second article of confederation declares that "each State retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence." And yet, notwithstanding this barefaced falsehood, what was the result? This instrument, by which the sovereignty, pride, self-respect, and independence of the States were cloven down by a single dash, was received amid hallelujahs; and the very States that were disgraced by it, instead of calling up the spirit of the entombed constitution, bowed down in subserviency, while the whole nation, by universal acclamation, seemed to join in the modern apotheosis of its nominal author. Is there any man now, who looks back coolly, that does not believe this to be the proclamation that changed the republic?

And here let me refer to an instance, as illustrating the change of the times, and to show that the whole country, the high and the low, are sinking under delusion into the universal "humbuggery" of the day. Last summer I observed an account of a large meeting in the refined, polished, and hospitable city of Boston, called to attend the ceremony of presenting their distinguished and intellectual citizen with a silver cup, on which was inscribed "the defender of the constitution." Who sustained the principles of the proclamation? who embodied them in the "force bill?" who carried that measure through, and placed it on the statute book, consecrating the usurpation of all power in the hands of the Executive? This "defender of the constitution." And it is remarkable that he, in the very speech in which he returned his thanks, declared that the constitution was virtually changed, and that all power was now in the hands of the Executive. I refer to this scene merely to show that even the intelligent and educated are falling under the delusions of the day; and if they be so blind, what must be expected from others who bask in power and live by deception? I hope there is no man now, who can look back upon these two measures to which I have alluded, and then see what he now knows to exist around him, without learning some impressive and solemn lessons as to the downward career of the republic.

But to return. While triumphal arches were raised, upon which was inscribed "the principles of the proclamation, the principles of New England"—while he whose life had been an open war upon all law was receiving in the halls of universities the flattering unctious of "doctor of the learned laws" poured upon his head—what was the remarkable fact? He was then actually penning the order for the lawless seizure of the whole treasure of the nation.

Considering the state of things, this was a sagacious and profound move, and those who planned it well understood the downward progress of events, and the recorded history of liberty. Usurpation upon usurpation had been perpetrated. The great principles of the constitution had been subverted. This measure was absolutely necessary to sustain the power that had been acquired, and to transmit it to a successor. It diverted public attention from what had been done. Despotism and usurpation, in other countries, rely upon the sword and a standing army to sustain themselves; but, from the nature of our institutions, they are compelled here to rely upon leagued banks, money, office-holders and office-seekers, bribery and corruption. Lawless power here relies upon deception and fraud, while elsewhere it relies upon force.

I question very much whether, in this country, we can ever have even the privilege of an appeal to revolution. Each State has its own peculiar local interests and peculiar public opinion. This almost forbids all system and concert of action; and he who is at the head of affairs must have little talent indeed, if, with his tremendous power and patronage, he is not able to play off one part of the community against the other. But there is another cause which I fear may prove fatal to the prospects of liberty. I very much doubt whether even a reform can ever take place. With our immense system of credit, extending itself into all the ramifications of the community—with our seven hundred banks pressing down upon all the secret springs of society, and transacting business upon calculations made for the future—I say I doubt whether, under this vast and complicated system, the various interests of which no man can fathom, whether even reform can ever take place. All those who may be directly or indirectly (and who is not?) interested in this stupendous system would prefer to acquiesce under a despotism rather than to run the hazard of a change from reform or revolution.

Those who seized the moneyed resources of the nation well knew the resistless power they were to wield, controlling as it does, directly and indirectly, at least one hundred millions of capital. Other people have to submit to the sword drawn over them by a conqueror, who may at least have the manliness of courage to command some respect; but we have to submit to a mean and infamous despotism, sustained by a moneyed power, controlling, through bribery and corruption, all that is abandoned and profligate in society. No wonder that "the whole nation is one common gambling-house."

Let us now look to a more recent event, as distinctly marking this great change in our Government. And on this point I will take the facts as stated with so much spirit by the gallant gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. Wise,] and which I have never seen the slightest pretence to deny. I allude to the last night of the last Congress, when scenes occurred of the deepest importance to the liberties of this country. It was then that the President, with the first officer of his cabinet, and the second officer of the Government, came into the dark recesses of this Capitol, and, through his vile minions and miserable tools, defeated a measure of vast importance, before this House, for the notorious purpose of waging a popular war upon the Senate. Cromwell went into the House of Commons, at the head of armed men, and ordered its dissolution. But here, sir, we have a President who comes not like a soldier, but at the head of his servile courtiers and sycophants, and practically asserts his ascendancy over both branches of our Legislature by management and duplicity. Is this our independence under the constitution? Is this the check that we were designed to exercise by the provisions of that noble instrument? Where is the spirit of our forefathers? Better, far better for us to be "dogs, and bay the moon," or "toads, and feed on the vapor of a dungeon," than to hold our seats here only to disgrace the memory of those who have gone before us. I know that we are apt to become indifferent and callous under the habitual contemplation of evils which seem almost to forbid a remedy. And it is from this that liberty is lost. We sit here and see things which we have not the courage or manliness to resist.

What is now passing before this country in the history of the day? An attempt is now openly being made to expunge the constitution, and drag down the Senate in humble penitence before a master, for having dared to express an independent sentiment. If this succeeds, it will be the consummation of our downfall.

Sir, I am aware that under certain circumstances an individual may desire that his crimes should be expunged from the memory of man—I am aware that there are those who would desire to convert the whole earth into one universal pandemonium, only that they might become prominent from their very iniquity, and reign triumphant from their very guilt. But I am totally at a loss to understand the feelings that could prompt any human being to desire to see a whole body of men, intended by our ancestors to be exalted and independent, bowing around the throne of a lawless and reckless man, bearing in their hands the constitution to be burned, that the smoke thereof may rise to satiate his vengeance and appease his wrath. Sir, it is, it is the reign of Cæsar, and we are cowards, dastards, slaves, if we submit to this state of things, and shall deserve to have our children raise before us their little hands, and shake their manacles, saying, thou did it! thou did it!

Mr. Chairman, I have said that this is the reign of Cæsar. Sir, I have read the history of the Roman people to little advantage, if I am to be deceived at this late day in what I see passing around me. We are now where that people were when the empire was to be divided between Anthony, Octavius, and Lepidus. Cæsar had folded his robes and perished under the dagger of Brutus. And although we may have none at present with the fine talents and acquirements of Anthony, yet we have many with his private profligacy and abandoned principles. As to Lepidus, I need only point to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. R. M. JOHNSON;] but, as he is a member of this House, I forbear to trace the parallel at present. The beardless Octavius had done nothing to identify himself with the glory and the honor of his country, but he became prominent from the fact that he was supposed to inherit the sympathy that was then running so strong in favor of the fallen Cæsar. Wary, artful, and sagacious; he saw his position, and made the most of it.

We too have a modern Octavius, who, winding his way under the robes of royal favor, proclaims himself the true and anointed successor, pledged to carry out the principles of his master. What other earthly claim has the Vice President to his present position, except that he is supposed to be the chosen favorite of him who has trampled over the liberties of his country? The gentleman from New York [Mr. McKEON] has declared him to be the only candidate who has claims upon the whole Union.

For the present I pass by an investigation into his political principles, and shall only refer to one document, which speaks a language not to be mistaken, and develops the feelings and the nature of the man—which writes his history and his character more fully than all the volumes that can be composed by a flattering biographer. No man can read it without knowing its author. It is a letter written from London, in answer to a committee in New York, who condoled with him for his rejection as minister to the court of St. James. I will read from it the following extract in relation to General Jackson:

"In testimony to my public conduct, they are pleased to speak with eulogium of me, as contributing, while in the cabinet, to the success of the present administration. That signal success, I feel called upon to declare, is pre-eminently due to the political sagacity, unwearied industry, and upright, straight-forward course, of our present venerated chief. All the humble merit I can claim is, that of having exerted myself to the utmost to execute his patriotic and single-hearted views, and of having sacrificed all personal considerations to insure their success, when threatened with extraneous embarrassments. That my exertions were arduous, painful, and incessant, I may, without vanity, assert; whether my sacrifices have not been repaid with unmerited detraction and reproach, I leave to my countrymen to determine. Still I shall ever regard my situation in that cabinet as one of the most fortunate events of my life, placing, as it did, me in close and familiar relation with one who has well been described by Mr. Jefferson as "possessing more of the Roman in his character than any man living," and whose administration will be looked to, in future times, as a golden era in our history. To have served under such a chief, at such a time, and to have won his confidence and esteem, is a sufficient glory; and of that, thank God, my enemies cannot deprive me."

Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly aware that many a man might have uttered such sentiments without any extraordinary degradation. If they had come from one who had forever retired into private life, it would have been of no great importance. If they had come from one who was humble and lowly, and had received private favors from a benefactor, it would have attracted no attention. But coming as they did from one who was artful and sagacious—who had fixed his eye on the first offices of his country, with an ambition that has never varied—who was gazing with eagerness for partisan support—I say, sir, that under all the circumstances of the case, they are base, vile, degraded, and degrading sentiments, which no freeman ever conceived in his heart, and none but a flatterer ever uttered. If I am to have a leader, in the name of all that is lofty and honorable, let him be one who has the feelings, the independence, the heart, of a man. If I am to follow, let it not be one who cringes before, and fawns upon, the hand of a master. Every feeling of my soul revolts with scorn and indignation at such sentiments.

But, sir, look around, and what is the glaring fact in the history of the day? These sentiments have had their weight. Is not the whole patronage and power of this Government, at this moment, wielded for the open purpose of rewarding their author? Is it to be disguised that the Baltimore convention assembled to nominate a successor under the dictation of the President? Is there a man, who has sagacity to perceive consequences, that doubts it? Let those things succeed, and it is idle to talk about a free Government. We may have the exterior of freedom, but it will be a whitened sepulchre, fair and beautiful to look on, but full of corruption and rottenness within.

I commit no man nor no party, but I here take opportunity to lay down the doctrine that he who comes into power under such circumstances, comes in, to all intents and purposes, as much a usurper as if he had come in by the sword of revolution. Such a Government is to be obeyed merely from political expediency, and not constitutional obligation. What difference, in fact, is there between a Government brought upon the country by presidential dictation, fraud and patronage, and one forced upon us by the arms of a conqueror?

In those countries where the succession may be fixed by the hereditary laws of the land, where things have grown up from time immemorial, and become the fixed principles of the constitution, a people can make claims to freedom, if the succession take place consistent with their institutions. But in this country, where we have a written constitution, every line of which maintains the freedom of the elective franchise, from the highest to the lowest, if we submit to dictation or appointment, directly or indirectly, from any earthly power, we are slaves in feeling and in fact, and shall deserve our destiny.

The janissaries of Turkey could at one time bow-string a sultan, and enthrone his successor. A Roman despot could at one time make his horse a consul, while his degenerate countrymen cowered beneath the imperial eagles waving along the lines of prætorian bands. Cromwell anointed himself as one prepared to be a martyr, and called upon his round-head followers to baptize him in the blood of Charles I, that he might come out a saint fit to wear the robes of a dictator, and claim the sworn allegiance of a deluded and enslaved people.

True, we have no janissaries--no prætorian bands--no army of the commonwealth, as yet. But we have what is meaner, baser, and more degrading--we have a hundred thousand office-holders and office-seekers--moneyed corporations from one end of the Union to the other--we have the patronage of this Government and the power and popularity of the President--all, all acting together in concert, and devoted to the sole object of appointing a successor, and transmitting ill-gotten power to those who will fawn to receive it. I care not what may be the principles to be avowed by such an administration, I make open, uncompromising war against the mode and manner of appointment.

How long are these things to last? Are they to be borne by a free people? Think you that one half of this great nation is forever to be ruled over by the other half, upon such principles as these? Think you that the intellectual and virtuous of a great people are forever to be trampled over and spurned by ignorance and brutal numbers? No, sir; it is not nature to bear it. The worm that crawls in the dust will turn when tread on. And shall man, rational man, sink himself lower than the vilest of creation? Sir, if these things are to be borne, go first and tear from the pages of history those leaves which transmit to posterity our glory and our honor--go first and gather together the declarations of our independence, and make of them a bonfire--go first to the graves of our gallant dead, harrow up their bones, and scatter to the four winds of heaven their dust and their ashes--tell our little children these men are unworthy to be remembered, and their deeds to be imitated; we must then do more--change the very names of our own children--ay, we must change their very natures--turn back the current that now runs warm from their hearts, and run it into new channels--pull down the star-spangled banner, and trample it in the dust beneath your feet--then, and not till then, shall we be prepared to wear in peace the chains of slaves and the livery of bondmen.

Mr. Chairman, I am aware that I have uttered sentiments ill calculated to suit the public ear. I know, sir, that I have uttered sentiments which forever cut me off from all hope of favor from this Government, or with those who are destined to control it. But I stand here to speak the truth to my country. What is a man born for? Is it that, through deception and sycophancy, he may wind his way to power? Is it that, for the day, he may catch passing popularity, that miserable mushroom thing which springs up in the moisture and darkness of night, only to wither and die under the beams of the noonday sun? No, sir; man lives that he may live hereafter, in the hearts and affections of his countrymen, for having vindicated their interests, their honor, and their liberties. This, in my opinion, is the highest destiny that awaits an earthly career.

When Mr. PICKENS had taken his seat,

Mr. UNDERWOOD obtained the floor, and moved that the committee rise; which was decided in the negative: Yeas 49, nays 87.

Mr. UNDERWOOD then rose and said:

Mr. Chairman: The debate which has grown out of the amendment proposed to the bill under consideration has embraced almost every topic connected with the policy of the Government and its administration. Parties, the press, the conduct of the Executive, the proper system of public defence, the surplus revenue, the propriety of distributing it among the States, the public lands, and a variety of other subjects, have been brought before the committee in the progress of the discussion. I do not propose to notice all that has been said deserving, as I think, the severest reprehension; but, sir, I feel the duty which I owe to those who sent me here to utter on this occasion what I believe to be their sentiments and their opinions on some of the great questions of this debate.

In relation to the parties into which the people of this country are at this time divided, I have a few remarks to make. The old landmarks which distinguished the federal and republican parties have been destroyed. The federal party of 1801 were overthrown because of the opinion, justly entertained, that they were disposed to enlarge and extend the powers of the General Government beyond the limits of the constitution. The alien and sedition acts, passed by the federal party, constituted the evidence upon which their condemnation was based. The contest between the federal and republican parties was one for the establishment of great principles of government. The republican party triumphed. I rejoice in its success. In the progress of events, those who succeeded as heirs to the political inheritance left by the republicans of 1798 and 1801 deemed it proper to change the name of their party. They assumed the appellation of the democratic party, with a view to express and enforce the idea of a complete identity in feeling and interest with the great body of the people. Under this name, those who elected our present Chief Magistrate have acted and been known. But, sir, with the change of their name from the republican to the democratic party, they have changed their principles; and, if we are to know their creed from their conduct, they are now the political worshippers of an elective despotism. Those who lead the party have violated every promise made to the people; and their idol, the President, has, in his conduct, utterly disregarded most, if not all, of his avowed principles.

In the present aspect of our political affairs I recognize but two parties. The separation between them is marked by strong and obvious lines. One of these parties ardently desires to elevate and improve the moral, intellectual, religious, and physical, condition of society.

Fortification Bill.

[H. OF R.]

Devotion to equal laws, and opposition to artificial differences and distinctions, such as result from unjust and partial legislation, constitute the creed of this party. Its members would open the avenues which lead to wealth, to fame, to all the heights of human glory, and allow every citizen, no matter how humble his origin, to enter for the race, untrammelled by legal impediments. With this party, intellectual and moral worth, patriotism, and talents, are sought after, when office is to be conferred. The members of this party neither ask nor desire any exclusive privileges. They are opposed to all laws conferring advantages or benefits on one or more individuals, which are denied or withheld from the people at large. They desire to see no other distinctions among men than those which result from greater industry, more care, superior natural endowments, and higher moral qualities. Such distinctions are founded in the nature of things, and produce differences enough among men, without the aid of human laws, favoring any one class or set of men at the expense of others.

The other party feels but little solicitude for the moral, intellectual, religious, and physical improvement of their race. Judging from the conduct of the members of this party, we should be led to the conclusion that they deemed it proper, if not commendable, to play upon the prejudices and credulity of mankind, to secure any personal profit or emolument. Their professions frequently seem to proceed from correct principles, but their practices prove that the sound doctrines they preach, and the clamor made in their propagation, are nothing more than a component part of a cunningly devised system of popular deception, by which the unhallowed schemes of corrupt ambition are made to prosper, and the interests of the country at large are sacrificed. The members of this party constitute a banditti in search of "spoils." Judging of others by the suggestions and feelings of their own corrupt hearts, they are ever ready to attribute the basest motives and designs to those who oppose them; and, with a view to prostrate all opposition, it is a part of their policy to endeavor to overwhelm their adversaries by defamation and lies. They purchase the venal with office and gold, and intimidate the honest by proscription. Such a party is not properly designated by any party appellation heretofore known, and I shall take the liberty of giving them a name suited to their grovelling purposes and infamous principles. Sir, it should be denominated the sop party, because those who compose it resemble Judas Iscariot in this: that they will sit down at the same table, and dip in the same dish, with their master, and then rise up and betray him for thirty pieces of silver. No confidence can be reposed in them; for they are altogether sordid, selfish, and unprincipled.

That there is such a party in this country, at this time, no one can doubt who will attentively examine and consider passing events. I will not affirm, nor do I believe, that all the members of this party, those who co-operate in prosecuting its worst measures, are acquainted with the extent, the height, and depth, of the wickedness of their leaders. Paul, the apostle, at one time, sincerely thought he was rendering God service by persecuting unto death the disciples of Christ. There may be pure motives in performing deleterious actions.

Party power and misrule have not yet obtained a complete ascendancy over public opinion. Some respect is yet paid to any strong demonstration of popular sentiment. But, sir, the cunning of party has devised a plan to give tone and direction to the sentiments and opinions of the people. The device consists in the use of a pensioned press, devoted to the interests of particular men, and feeling no sympathy for the community. Every species of misrepresentation and falsehood in regard to measures, and every sort of detraction and slander in regard to men, are printed and published for the purpose of deceiving the people and controlling the elections. Corrupt politicians use corrupt editors for the purpose of corrupting, deceiving, and ruling the people. These editors, without the least shame, will accept a bribe in the shape of patronage from the hand of power, and then turn and vilify those whom they have eulogized, and, with the servility of slaves, flatter those whom they have abused and cursed. It is their vocation to endeavor to bring suspicion and odium upon every one who will not worship their idol; and hence it is that a corrupt and bribed press teems with the grossest calumnies against the purest and best men of the nation. Sir, I regret that this House has been deemed a fit place, by many members of Congress, to vindicate themselves against attacks made upon them in the newspapers. I do not consider this the proper place to notice the falsehoods which editors may print and publish with a view to ruin my reputation; and I regret that any gentleman, in the course of this or any other debate, should have deemed it proper to consume time by noticing the statements of the Globe. I would as soon think of descending to the level of a polecat, and waging war with that animal. In such a contest, however successful a man may be, he is very apt to remain in bad odor, even with his friends, for a long time after it is ended.

Mr. Chairman, the people of the district I represent understand the tricks of political knaves, played off through the instrumentality of a corrupt press. The press, when honestly conducted, is truly the palladium of liberty; but, when prostituted to subserve the base purposes of a sop party, it becomes a formidable engine of tyranny. The chief who suborns and uses a corps of scandalous and calumniating editors thereby evinces to the world his infamous means and his reckless corruption in using them.

I shall now call your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the surplus revenue, and the propriety of distributing it among the States, in proportion to their federal population. Upon this subject three questions present themselves: 1st. Is there any surplus to distribute? 2d. Has Congress constitutional power to distribute it? 3d. Does good policy require its distribution? I propose to answer these questions in their order.

Upon the first point I shall be very brief. The lucid remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] have satisfactorily proved the existence of a large surplus, and I will not fatigue the committee by going over the ground which he has travelled before me. According to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, there was in the deposit banks, to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States, on the 1st day of April, 1836, the sum of $33,294,024 08. If the accruing revenues, during the last three quarters of the year, should be equal to the expenditures, then that sum might be distributed among the States, without injury to the operations of the General Government. Will the money daily coming into the Treasury supply the demand, and meet the daily disbursements necessary to be made?

In the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, presented at the commencement of the session, he required for the service of 1836 the sum of $23,133,640. Admitting that this sum should be increased to $26,000,000, in consequence of the Indian wars prevailing in Florida, Alabama, and Georgia, then we should ask, will the revenues of the year supply that sum? We know, from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the amount of revenue received during the first quarter exceeds $10,725,000; at the same rate for the three remaining quarters, the total revenue of the year will exceed $42,900,000. Deduct the sum of $26,000,000, which may be required for the service of the current year, and there will be a balance left, of the revenue accruing in 1836, of $16,900,000; which, when added to the balance remaining in the Treasury on the 1st of January last, of $21,169,455, would produce a surplus of $38,069,455 on the 1st of January, 1837, without taking into consideration the $7,000,000 of stock in the Bank of the United States. But, sir, if it be conceded that the revenue of 1836, for the three remaining quarters, will not, in any one of them, equal that of the first quarter, then, I ask, how many millions will it fall short? For such is the state of things, that you may deduct millions, and yet be able to distribute among the States thirty millions of the surplus. I do not admit, however that there will be any material diminution in the revenue during the balance of this, or in many years to come. There is danger to be apprehended, and great danger too, from the number and condition of the six hundred banks which cover the country from Missouri to the Atlantic, and from Maine to Louisiana. The great disparity between the paper circulation and the amount of specie in their vaults is such, that a sudden panic may burst the bubble, and reproduce the scenes of 1819-'20. But the disastrous consequences of such an event, however lasting and fatal to the hopes and fortunes of particular individuals, would only give a temporary shock to the onward movement of this young and growing nation. The nation, as heretofore, would soon recover from the effects of such calamity, and the customs and public lands would again replenish our Treasury to overflowing.

It has been said that the progressive diminution of duties on imports, under the compromise act of 1833, will lessen the amount of revenue; and it has been predicted that the sales of the public domain will greatly decline in a few years. I do not believe these predictions will be verified. In the first place, a diminution of the tax or duty on an article does not necessarily produce a corresponding diminution of the revenue. The amount of revenue depends upon the quantity of dutiable articles consumed; and as goods are sold cheaper in consequence of lessening the duties, the consumption will be greater, and thus an increased consumption will more than balance the decrease of duty. Turn your attention, Mr. Chairman, for a moment, to the great West: ask yourself what is it now, and what was it during the last war? At that time, the whole, a few districts excepted, might be considered a wilderness, in comparison with its present condition. The farms newly settled, in many instances, did not yield a support for their owners and their families. The dwelling-houses were log cabins, and comfortable stables, barns, and out-houses were not to be seen. In this state of things, whenever the labor of clearing and cultivating new land produced something for sale, after subsisting the family, the money arising was necessarily expended in erecting more comfortable dwellings, barns, &c. Thus there was nothing to spare for the merchant, or to purchase articles of foreign growth or manufacture, upon which more than half our revenue is raised. How is it now? Vast multitudes, by their industry and labor, have placed themselves in comfortable houses, upon productive farms, well provided with every convenience, and yielding them annually, in surplus grain, or tobacco, or cotton, or live stock, a handsome income. No longer compelled to expend it in clearing lands and building houses, they can now afford to treat their wives and daughters and sons with foreign articles; and the West now proves what has been found to be true in all ages, that people who have money, and who are not restricted in its expenditure by an overruling necessity, will use it to gratify their appetites and taste for luxuries and dress. The consequence is, an immense increase in the consumption of foreign merchandise; and hence our Treasury will be kept full to overflowing, notwithstanding the gradual diminution of duties on imports. In proof of the now large and increasing consumption of the West, only look at the heavy business done upon the railroads and canals connecting the Atlantic ports with the Mississippi valley; and behold the increasing hundreds of steamboats which are now actively engaged upon the waters of the West. Sir, a survey of the condition of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, in the Atlantic States would equally denote the continuance of a full Treasury. Everywhere we behold industry prosper, generating and accumulating wealth. The inevitable result is an increased consumption of foreign productions, upon which the amount of revenue depends.

In regard to the sales of public lands, there will be no decrease in the quantity sold, so long as profitable investments can be made by purchasing them. Those who own small tracts in thickly settled neighborhoods, and which can be sold at high prices, will find it their interest to sell out, and emigrate to the new States and Territories, where they can with the money get as good or better land, and ten times the quantity. So long as the value of lands in the new States and Territories is increasing at the rate of from ten to one hundred per cent. per annum, capitalists will purchase, rather than invest their funds in stocks or in trade. The tide of emigration to the new States and Territories, the demand for the productions of their fertile soil in market, and the profit which can be realized in a short time from a good farm, will operate as permanent causes to produce an annual increase in the value of lands in the new States and Territories. Men of discernment understand all this; and hence the large purchases of public lands made during the last year will be continued through the present, and probably for years to come. Nothing can arrest this course of things but the entire change of the present land system, or the derangement of the currency, and the general pressure for money which may result from the breaking up of the excessive issues of bank notes. I have no expectation that either of these causes will affect the sales of land during the present year. Let them operate when they may, no argument can be thence drawn adverse to the distribution of the existing surplus revenue among the States.

The conclusion to which my mind has arrived is, that there exists a large surplus, and that it will continue to accumulate, notwithstanding the constant drain going on to sustain all the necessary operations of the Government.

Can Congress constitutionally distribute this surplus among the States? I will not contend for the power to impose taxes, with a view to raise money for distribution. Such an object does not seem to me to fall within the scope of the delegated powers of the constitution; but where taxes have been imposed in good faith, for the purposes of the constitution, and Congress finds at its disposal a large surplus which it cannot expend with propriety in accomplishing some purpose of the constitution, I do not perceive any reason why it may not be divided out among the States. If it be not wanted for the use of the Government, it would certainly be competent to return it to those from whom it had been collected, if they could be ascertained. A poll or direct tax, levied under the expectation of war, may be released, in case of the sudden adjustment of the dispute without war; and so, if it had been actually collected, and, in consequence of the settlement of all difficulties, the Government no longer wanted the money, it could not be a violation of the constitution to return the money to those from whom it had been received, and who, from the nature of the tax, could be known with certainty. But in the case of money arising from customs, and which is paid directly to the Government by the importing merchant, and afterwards reimbursed to him by the consumer, the Government cannot return it, when it is not

Fortification Bill.

wanted, to the citizen in person; because there is no means of ascertaining the persons who paid the money, and the sums paid by each. As that is impossible, why may not this Government place the fund in the hands of a trustee, to be used for the general benefit of those who cannot be individually designated, but who are known as a community to have furnished the money? There is no reason against it. In the selection of a trustee in such a case, the State Governments, for reasons too numerous and obvious to mention, should be chosen. There is no sensible distinction between returning money not wanted to those who are known to have paid it, and placing money in the hands of a trustee for the benefit of a whole community, who advanced the money under circumstances rendering it impossible to ascertain what portion came from each individual. The question of constitutional power is the same in both cases.

But, sir, there is, in my opinion, a great deal of difference between the money arising from the sales of public land and that from the customs; and were I to concede that the last could not be constitutionally distributed among the States, I should still deny that the first stands upon the same ground. It is a common error to regard the money arising from the sales of public lands as so much revenue received from taxing the people; and I have heard it contended that the price of the public lands should be reduced, in order to lighten the burden of taxation! A dollar and a quarter received for an acre of land sold is no tax on the purchaser. He gets the value of his money. He is as rich, and generally more so, after parting with his money, as he was when he had it in his pocket. Suppose you disband your regiment of dragoons, and sell the horses belonging to the Government; must you take half price, lest you should inflict onerous taxes on the purchasers? Suppose you sell ground purchased in New York or Boston, on which to erect custom-houses, or ground purchased for a light-house, because you wish to change the site, or because you have no further use for it; is it necessary to take half the value of the property, in order to escape the charge of cruel taxation? Where is the difference between these cases and the sales of your public domain; There is none. Our land system is an exchange of equivalents, in which the advantage, if any, is uniformly on the side of the purchaser. May we not give the lands we own to the States, without violating the constitution? The language of the second clause of the 3d section of the 4th article of the constitution is this: "The Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory or other property belonging to the United States." We have already given millions of acres to the new States, (which will appear more at large in a table I shall hereafter present,) and no one has imagined that the constitution was violated by the donation. We have stipulated with the new States to allow them, respectively, five per cent. on the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands within their limits; and we have passed laws directing the payment to them of three parts of the five per cent. so allowed. I have heard no voice raised against the propriety of these proceedings upon constitutional grounds. The former practice of the Government is an assertion of the power not only to give away the lands, but the money likewise arising from their sale. Can it be said, this is constitutional in regard to the new States, but unconstitutional in relation to the old?

My preceding remarks apply to the constitutional question, unconnected with any special and particular consideration which should influence the judgment of the committee; but, sir, there are reasons to be drawn from the acts of the States ceding their right to large portions of the public domain to the General Government, which place the propriety of distributing the money arising from the sales of land thus ceded beyond all doubt. Virginia and Georgia ceded to the General Government much the largest and most valuable portion of the public lands, excluding those acquired by the purchase of Louisiana and Florida. Virginia ceded hers in 1784, before the adoption of the present federal constitution. Georgia ceded in 1802. The purposes for which the cessions were made were indicated by nearly the same language in the conveyance of each State. The deed executed by Thomas Jefferson, James Monroe, and others, on the part of Virginia, uses the following language: "That all the lands within the territory so ceded to the United States, and not reserved for [certain uses mentioned,] shall be considered as a common fund for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the confederation or federal alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions to the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever." By the confederation, the common Treasury was to be supplied by the several States, in proportion to the value of all lands within each State, granted to or surveyed for any person, and the improvements thereon. As the States were to be charged in proportions, to be fixed by the relative value of their lands and the improvements thereon, I have heard it suggested that the rule should be the same for distributing among the States the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, especially that ceded by Virginia. I admit, if the expenditures of the Government were now defrayed by taxes imposed and assessed upon lands and the improvements thereon, according to the above rule, and no revenue were collected from any other source, that we should be bound to observe the same rule in distributing among the States the money arising from the sales of land ceded by Virginia; But when the Treasury is not filled by taxes imposed on land, or upon the people of the States, according to the relative value of land and the improvements thereon within the States, I deny that the rule given in the articles of the confederation, by which the Treasury was to be supplied, is the rule by which the distribution is to be made. The deed of cession by Virginia does not refer to the rule for filling the common Treasury as prescribed in the articles of the confederation, and then declare that the uses and benefits secured to each State in the land ceded shall be proportionate to the contributions of the States under that rule. Instead of that, the deed of cession declares that the States shall participate in the use of the land, "according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure;" not as then fixed by any given rule, but leaving Congress thereafter free to apportion the benefits, so as to make them correspond with the burdens imposed on the States. That such was the intention of Virginia in the act of cession, is too manifest to need further remark; and, as there is nothing to direct the partition of the benefits according to a rule then fixed, we are now at liberty to carry into effect the liberal and benevolent design of that State, according to its spirit, and to make the apportionment with a view to the burdens imposed by the existing system of taxation. Under this view of the subject, what ought the rule to be? By the constitution, direct taxes are to be levied on the people of the States according to federal numbers. Indirect taxes, or duties on imports, are burdens upon consumers; and, as it is reasonable to conclude that the States consume in proportion to their federal numbers, a division of the lands, or the money arising from their sale, according to federal numbers, will do equal justice to the people of all the States, and accomplish the object of Virginia. Her deed of cession imperatively demands such a division, because there is no other way by which you can give each State a proper share of the benefits derived from the public lands since the national debt has been wholly discharged. You are bound to use the fund for the benefit of the States. They are capable of managing the fund for themselves, and are willing to relieve you of the trust. Why not, then, hand over the estate to those who own it, and who are laboring under no disability? The States are not infants or lunatics. They require no guardians or trustees.

Under the articles of confederation, the lands ceded by Virginia and Georgia were accepted for the purposes I have stated. The confederation was bound to dispose of them for the uses mentioned, and the 6th article of the constitution of the United States declares that "all debts contracted, and engagements entered into, before the adoption of this constitution, shall be as valid against the United States, under this constitution, as under the confederation." We are therefore bound to respect and comply with the engagement made relative to the lands ceded by Virginia before the adoption of the constitution. The second clause in the 3d section of the 4th article of the constitution saves and recognises the claims of Virginia and every other State to an interest in the public land, and leaves the subject to abide the principles established under the confederation. Under that clause, Congress has power "to dispose of" the land, and good faith requires such disposition as was contemplated by the ceding States. The money arising from the sale of the land may be "disposed of" as the land itself. Converting the land into money facilitates the disposition of the land in regard to the ultimate objects to which the land itself must be applied. There is no distinction between the money raised by the sale of the land and the land, in reference to the constitutional power of Congress in disposing of them. If you can give the land itself to the States, so may you give the money for which you sell the land, and so may you give the crops and rents which issue out of the land.

I am done, Mr. Chairman, with the question of constitutional power. A committee of this House (and I believe of the Senate likewise) has reported that we can receive the bequest made by Smithson. If millions are placed in your Treasury by donors and testators, restricted indeed is your power if you cannot make gifts as well as receive them. But, in regard to the public lands, the people of the States ask for no gift; they demand what belongs to them; what they have purchased and paid for with their money and their blood; what was theirs by conquest and by treaty; and that which is now theirs in a strictly legal sense—this Government being nothing more than the stakeholder for their use and benefit. I will now proceed to show that every consideration of policy requires a distribution among the States of the surplus millions in the Treasury. The policy of the measure will be best shown by inquiring how the States will use the money if they get it; and how you, sir, and those associated with you, will use it if you keep it.

First. How will the States use it? They are now (or most of them) borrowing money for the purpose of improving their internal condition. They are engaged in constructing railroads and canals, in Macadamizing turnpikes, and rendering their rivers permanently navigable. The progress already made in such works, and the benefits already derived from them, have stimulated the States to put forth all their energies in completing improvements heretofore commenced, and beginning new works which cannot fail to promote the public welfare. Those States which folded their arms, and did nothing to open and improve the channels of commerce and intercourse which nature had furnished in magnificent rivers, but which were useless in consequence of some trifling obstructions—States which seemed never to have conceived the idea of creating a channel of trade and travel entirely artificial—have been roused from their lethargy by the prosperous examples around them. They now see that they are doomed to perpetual inferiority, unless they create for themselves the same kind of facilities which have elevated their neighbors, and poured in upon them a flood of prosperity. The farmers of the West are no longer content to break down wagons, kill horses, and fret and curse in a rencounter with a mud hole; they are no longer content to place their produce upon the margin of some river, and there let it lie until a freshet enables them to take it to a distant market. Sir, I speak for my constituents, (and I believe it is true in regard to the whole West,) when I say that they are determined to have the same advantages which other people enjoy, and that we feel that we have intelligence and energy enough to accomplish what other people have accomplished. Kentucky and the West have embarked in making rivers navigable, in making railroads and canals; and, to go on with the work, we have found it necessary to borrow money. The State I in part represent has authorized her Governor to contract for $2,000,000; other Western States have borrowed much more. Now, sir, if you will distribute $30,000,000, the share which Kentucky would receive, according to federal numbers, will exceed $1,500,000. This, with the future dividends of the surplus which may hereafter accrue, would enable Kentucky to complete her public works without paying interest on borrowed capital, and would avoid the necessity of imposing taxes upon her citizens. The money arising from the sales of public lands may, in all time to come, be regarded as a surplus for distribution, unless war or some other great national calamity should afflict us; for the revenue derived from customs and other sources will be equal to meet every useful expenditure which the Government ought to make. What would you think of a farmer, Mr. Chairman, who desired to improve his estate, and who should borrow money at a high interest with which to do it, when he had his chest full of dollars owned by him, and which he might use without paying interest to any one? A strait jacket and a lunatic asylum should be his portion. And yet, sir, such conduct is a fair illustration of the conduct of the present Congress, if we fail to divide among the States the surplus millions in the Treasury. We behold the States, in every direction, borrowing at interest to carry on their public works; and we sit here playing the dog in the manger over surplus millions. The real or pretended scruples of the President, and his unintelligible distinctions between national and not national works, between that part of a river above and that part of the same river below a port of entry, and his ready exercise of the veto power, have paralyzed the action of the General Government in regard to internal improvements, except in the most partial manner. When the broad and liberal system, sanctioned by former administrations, has been broken up, and when we see the people of the States taking it up, and determined to progress with it, we should give them the means which belong to them to go on with the work. If you will do it, I shall be reconciled, in a great degree, to the destruction of the system as a part of the business of this Government.

Only think, for a moment, of the great works which the States would accomplish with the money. New York might even surpass her splendid Erie canal, by the construction of her contemplated railroads and ship canals. Indiana and Illinois, following the example of Ohio, would soon unite the waters of the lakes with those of the Mississippi. Charleston and New Orleans might, in a few years, be connected with Cincinnati and

[H. OF R.]

Nashville by railroads; and my constituents might see their rivers improved to the highest navigable points, and their towns and villages connected with those rivers by railroads.

I will not dwell upon the great works which the States might, and probably would, construct with the money. Every one knows that agriculture, commerce, trade of all sorts, and the whole business of life, would be beneficially affected by the execution of that system of improvement which this Government has thrown aside, and which the States have taken up. The statesman who, when he has it in his power, refuses to secure these blessings to the people, will meet their indignation, and will feel the remorse consequent on the knowledge that he deserves it.

But, sir, I would not limit the States in the uses and objects to which they might apply the money. They might, if they chose, appropriate it to the education of their children. Some of the States would probably apply at least a portion of it to that object; and I would not only sanction it, but desire it. I regard the system of common-school education, which prevails in New England and your own State, Mr. Chairman, (Mr. MANN, of New York, occupied the chair,) and which carries the knowledge of letters to the humble tenants of the houses of the poor, and enables them to read, to write, and to cipher, as one of the first blessings among the multitude enjoyed by the people of the republic. Sir, I do not say too much in its behalf, when I declare that life, liberty, and property, cannot be secure where ignorance prevails, or where ignorance rules. A foolish, uninformed people will become a prey to intelligent knaves. Despotism is the consequence; liberty is stricken down, lives are sacrificed, and property rifled. Mr. Chairman, I am indebted to an uncle's charity for what education I received, and I feel sensibly for the condition of those children whose parents are unable to help them. There are thousands who will become useful citizens, and some throw a lustre upon humanity, if our State Governments will lend a helping hand in due season. Sir, it is no uncommon thing to see instances of unassisted genius in the humble walks of life, by the force of innate power, stimulated by the freedom of our institutions, irradiate the gloom of birth, and become intellectual lights of the world. Sir, we ought to glory in assisting, directing, and developing, the faculties of the rising generation, who will soon occupy our places. The State should be the parent of the destitute, and bring them up for their country.

We know, Mr. Chairman, the many useful and glorious purposes to which the States would apply the money if they had it. Let us inquire how this Government will use it, if it be not distributed. We can only predict the future, by considering the present and the past. We have no assurance that you will do better hereafter than you have heretofore done. I will undertake in a few words to prove, by stating undeniable facts, that you will use the surplus millions in the Treasury and the public lands for improper and partial purposes.

Congress has heretofore appropriated and expended $5,307,721 18 in the construction of the Cumberland road; $2,763,006 33 having been expended in the States of Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Maryland, and the residue in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. By compact with these three new States, two per cent. on the nett proceeds of the sales of public lands, in their respective limits, is to be applied in making roads leading to those States; and three per cent. is to be paid them; making five per cent. in all. The whole amount received for the sale of public land prior to the 1st day of April last (no matter where the land was situated) amounted to $63,649,784 91; five per cent. on which is $3,482,489 25. It thus appears that, instead of laying out only two or five per cent. on the nett proceeds of the sales of land situated in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, in making roads for them, Congress has actually expended on the Cumberland road $1,835,231 93 more than five per cent. on the whole sum received for the sales of land in every part of the United States.

What right has this Government to expend for the benefit of these States so many millions in road-making, and deny to Kentucky a pittance for a like object? And yet this has been done. President Jackson, upon the pretext that the Government ought not to unite its funds with those of individuals, and become copartners in stock, and upon the ground that the Maysville and Lexington road was not national, puts his veto upon a bill making an appropriation to aid in its construction. I cannot turn aside to demonstrate the futility of such attempted distinctions, nor will I stop to deprecate the election of a man as his successor pledged "generally" to follow in his footsteps. I will proceed to exhibit other evidences of partiality in past legislation, giving the new States advantages over the old, in regard to the uses and benefits drawn from the public lands, for which it will be difficult to find any warrant in the deeds of cession creating the trust, under which the General Government holds the title.

The following quantities of land have been granted to the new States for the purposes specified, to wit:

	Acres.
For the use of common schools	10,631,817
To aid in constructing roads and canals	2,446,951
For seats of Government	28,989
For colleges and academies	484,320
Total donations in land	13,592,077

The land thus given, at the minimum price of $1 25 per acre, would bring $16,990,096. There is no doubt that these lands at this day are worth higher fifty millions than sixteen. But take the minimum estimate, and add to it the amount expended upon the Cumberland road, and you will have an aggregate exceeding twenty-two millions of dollars, which the new States have obtained from the General Government, in land and money! I ask you, sir, where will you look to find any such benefits conferred upon the old States? I know the answer. It will be replied, that the donations to the new States were made with a view to enhance the value and increase the demand for the lands retained by the Government. But I also know that the increased value of the public land, in consequence of these donations, has not been a title of the value of the lands given to the new States. Perceiving how prodigal of favors Congress had been in respect to the new States, and thinking that Kentucky, although she had no land belonging to the United States within her boundaries, might justly claim the title and name of a new State, (being the first-born of the Western sisterhood,) I proposed, on a former occasion, that $500,000 should be appropriated, to be placed in the hands of, and expended by, the board of public works in Kentucky, in improving the rivers of that State. My proposition was instantly voted down, and I fancied that I read in the looks of some members from the public-land States, which have already received their millions, the language of exultation. They seemed to me to consider my motion as the offspring of impudence, rather than the result of a just claim on the part of Kentucky to a participation in the benefits which Congress may and ought to confer without the least partiality, among the States. Sir, you have given money and lands to the new States, and pre-emptions and floats to their citizens, until they have become as spoiled children, and presumptuously claim dominion over the public lands and their proceeds. There is now a bill before Congress to appropriate $600,000 for the further extension of the Cumberland road, and you can scarcely mention the subject of the public lands, without being told that you ought to graduate their price, and, after a few years, give all which are not sold to the States in which they are situated. It is high time for the old States to apply the rod of justice to these spoiled children, and put an end to their arrogant pretensions.

Let us consider for a moment the propriety of the new scheme for disposing of the public lands, and especially that of reducing the price, and then selling them in limited parcels to actual settlers only. I pronounce the scheme unjust, partial, speculative, and fraudulent, and will prove it in a few words.

It is unjust, because it is notorious that there are millions of acres of unsold land worth more per acre than the price now fixed as the minimum. By reducing the price, the difference between the present price and that to which it may be reduced will be so much given away by the Government to the future purchasers of public lands. You are bound by every principle of justice to sell these lands for their value; and so far as you take less than their value, to that extent do you enrich the purchaser and defraud the people at large, for whose use you hold the lands in trust.

It is unjust, again, because by it you sell as good land, at a smaller price, to the new settler, than you sold to the old settler many years ago, and who had to encounter much greater difficulties in making his settlement than settlers of the present day experience.

It is partial, because such a system would only benefit the agricultural classes. Professional men, merchants, mechanics, and manufacturers, who carry on their business in cities and villages, would be excluded from purchasing lands on which to settle themselves or their children, in case they should change their pursuits, or be compelled to emigrate at a distance from the places where they long resided, and where their friends and connexions live, to find vacant lands on which to settle. We should allow the merchant or mechanic who settles upon a lot in a new village of the West to purchase his quarter section in the neighborhood as soon as he is able to pay for it.

It is partial, again, because it gives the citizens of the States and Territories where the public lands are situated, great advantages in acquiring those lands over the citizens of the old States. Those who are already settled on their own lands in the new States might erect cabins on the adjoining public land, and, by moving a few hundred yards or a mile, be entitled to settlement rights upon as good land as that they now occupy at a diminished price. It is this advantage which would put it in the power of the citizens of the new States to select and settle the best lands, before the citizens of the old States could get ready to commence a journey of exploration, that has caused the deafening clamor from the new States in favor of graduation and settlement rights. Not content with growing rich faster than any people ever did, I fear they look with a covetous eye on the delightful lands owned by the public in their neighborhood, in violation of the tenth commandment. The only ground upon which to escape is, that land owned by the Government is not the property of a "neighbor;" and upon such a plea, the loose morality and worse religion of some people justify them in filching from the Government whatever they can get.

It is speculative, because it would enable rich speculators to obtain large quantities of the best lands upon lower terms than they now can. Such speculators could and would furnish settlers to any number out of the foreign paupers annually imported into this country, and who, by our naturalization laws, are converted into citizens before they understand the nature of our institutions, or the blessings conferred by regulated liberty, and the evils resulting from licentiousness. Speculators would get such persons to settle the land, and take their bonds for titles; and, to prevent it, you would be compelled to violate one of the first principles of freedom, to wit, the right of contracting, and to prohibit settlers from selling their lands for a limited time, or altogether. A report from the Treasury Department shows that there were forty-eight thousand seven hundred and sixty-four foreigners brought to this country in the year 1835; and I suppose hundreds, if not thousands, came to us through Canada, of whom there is no account given.

It is speculative, again, because it allows a continued series of settlements and sales; so that when an individual has lived the prescribed time on a tract, he will sell it and settle another; and so go on through life, if he pleases. If, to prevent this, you provide that no man shall have more than one settlement, then if he is forced by necessity to sell it, or if he is sold out by execution, he can thereafter acquire no more of your public land, unless he gets it second-hand, although he may retrieve his fortunes and be able to pay you for a home. You force such a man to be a renter for life, or to purchase second-hand, at a high price, or to violate your law and play the swindler.

The new system contemplated is fraudulent, because it enables any one to swindle the Government, and obtain a tract of land in each State and Territory where there are public lands, notwithstanding the law may limit them to one settlement right. This will be done by moving from State to State, and Territory to Territory. Who will follow and detect the fraud? It will be nobody's business, and it will not be done.

It is fraudulent, again, because it leads to litigation and perjury in contests about the priority of settlements, where a millseat, or a site for a town, or a first rate tract of land, is the prize contended for. Every bad passion which can agitate the human breast will be excited by such a contest.

In conclusion, on this new land system, permit me to remark, that the same system which might answer very well in the non-slaveholding States will not answer to the South. Give a non-slaveholder a quarter section, and you give him more than he can use. But a slaveholder, who has a gang of fifty or a hundred negroes, cannot do with less than one or two sections. Will you give to the non-slaveholder a great deal more land than he can possibly use, or will you restrict the slaveholder to a quantity not half enough to carry on his operations upon? The idea of ceding the refuse lands to the States, if they are worth any thing, would, if carried into effect, be a palpable violation of the trust conferred on you by Virginia and Georgia, and the obligation you have assumed to dispose of the lands for their benefit, in common with the other States. I am willing to sell swamps and hills at less than the rich farming lands are sold for; and as soon as the good lands are sold, we will fix the price for the bad.

Sir, the whole scheme had its origin with "scurvy politicians," who believed that the people were simple enough to be gulled and corrupted by it. They and their scheme alike deserve the contempt of honest men.

Let us return, Mr. Chairman, to the manner in which this Government will use the money, if it be not distributed among the States. Sir, it will be kept in pet banks, to increase political power, to favor sectional interests, and to make fortunes for those who wear the collar, and who are ready to bark up any tree for a sop. Your President, Mr. Chairman, made war upon the Bank of the United States. By his veto he refused to permit it to be rechartered. He told the people, before his re-election, in his veto message, dated July 10, 1832, that "a Bank of the United States is, in many respects, convenient for the Government and useful to the people." In the same message he said, "That a Bank of the United States, competent to all the duties which may be required by the Government, might be so organized as not to infringe on our own delegated powers, or the reserved rights of the States, I do not entertain a doubt."

He said, "Had he been called on to furnish the project of such an institution, the duty would have been cheerfully performed." Mark the idea! the "duty" of the President to furnish "projects" of laws to the representatives of the people! I will not stop to inquire what part of the constitution prescribes that duty. As a quietus to the whole subject, the President said, in the same veto message of the 10th of July, 1832, "A general discussion will now take place, eliciting new light, and settling important principles; and a new Congress, elected in the midst of such discussion, and furnishing an equal representation of the people according to the last census, will bear to the Capitol the verdict of public opinion, and, I doubt not, bring this important question to a satisfactory result." Oh, what an admirable display of republican virtue! What a modest suggestion of a perfect willingness to abide by the "verdict of public opinion," as it might be handed in by a new Congress on its arrival at the Capitol!

But lo, the sequel! The President was re-elected in the fall of 1832, and qualified for his second term on the 4th of March, 1833. The new Congress, elected under the last census, and which was to "bear to the Capitol the verdict of public opinion," could not meet under the constitution and laws, as they then stood, sooner than the first Monday in December, 1833. Dates are often important things. Did the President wait for its arrival, and then abide by, and conform to, its "verdict?" No, sir, he did no such thing; but, with characteristic faithlessness to the expectations he had excited by his apparent devotion to public opinion in the veto message, on the 18th of September 1833, a little more than two months before the meeting of the "new Congress" to which he had appealed, in a paper read to his cabinet, he declared: "Whatever may be the opinions of others, the President considers his re-election as a decision of the people against the Bank;" and thereupon he usurped the power of deciding a question which the law had expressly given to the Secretary of the Treasury, and assumed the responsibility of removing the deposits, thereby seizing upon the money of the people. To cloak these proceedings with the semblance of legality, he removed Mr. Duane, and appointed Mr. Taney, so that the removal of the deposits, upon paper, would appear to be his act, when, in truth, it was the act of a dictator, who, according to law, had no right to command or order it to be done. Sir, what was the secret motive for all these doings? Why did the President affect to know beforehand what "verdict" would be given in, and proceed, contrary to all the forms of law, to enter judgment and decide the controversy before the jury had been empannelled? By the by, his new Congress never could be brought to a direct decision upon the matters involved, and shamefully evaded giving any verdict approving or condemning the proceedings of the President, which superseded their action in bringing the question of a or the national bank "to a satisfactory conclusion."

Why, I repeat, has the Bank of the United States, the best institution of the kind that ever existed, been destroyed? I am convinced that the true reason for it is, that the directors were too honest and independent, and refused to become the tools of the Executive and the agents of the party. The correspondence which the examination of the bank elicited, in reference to the branch at Louisville, Kentucky, more than the correspondence in regard to the branch at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, and both taken together constitute the basis of my belief. The deposits were removed to obtain power, and to gratify a malignant temper.

The experiment has failed most signally in securing a better currency for the people; but it has succeeded most admirably in securing more power to the party. Sir, if the President had obtained the mastery over the bank, and prostituted it to vile party purposes, he could only have gotten the control of a capital of $35,000,000, and a debt due not exceeding $70,000,000; but, by the change, he has obtained an influence and a control of the capital of the pet banks, amounting to $43,690,980 28, and a debt due them of $101,625,817 09. Our surplus millions, deposited in these pets, are used by them for the benefit of the stockholders, the Marquis of Caermarthen included, although a foreigner and of the nobility? The President can prostrate and bankrupt the whole concern at a breath. He has only to call on them to pay what they owe the Government, or to determine on a second removal of the deposits, and they are ruined. Think you, sir, that they will not court his favor, and be obedient to his will, so that they may make money and avoid destruction? I will lay before the committee the condition of things in the three deposit banks in the city of New York on the first day of March last, or as near that day as returns could be had; and we shall perceive ground for many serious reflections, and may thence learn the operation of the whole system:

Situation of the deposit banks in the city of New York on the 1st of March, 1836.

	Capital.	Loans and discounts.	Domestic exchange.
Bank America,	2,001,200 00	4,562,086 73	477,041 73

There was due to the above banks by other banks the sum of - - $3,256,001 99

There was due to other banks by the above banks the sum of - - 674,854 36

On this sum the deposit banks of New York might charge interest - 2,581,147 63

To ascertain the aggregate productive capital, or that which may be made so, add loans and discounts - 14,398,134 12

$20,318,571 80

Thus, by the aid of the public money deposited in these three banks, they are enabled to make a profit on $20,318,571 80, when their capitals together only amount to $6,051,200, and when their specie on hand is only $3,470,764 69. The amount of their specie is the extent of their wealth in reality; but as Government favorites and chartered monopolies, their three millions are increased to twenty! No wonder, sir, that your people of New York, and especially your city stockholders, should be willing to perpetuate this system, seeing they are so handsomely rewarded by it. Besides, the heaviest deposits will be made for ages to come, under this system, in the New York city banks, because the largest amount of revenue is paid and collected in that city. Now, suppose the President should, to punish these New York pets, and with a view to reward the banks in Kentucky for political services, (should they be base enough to make the arrangement,) order the $10,000,000 of public money in the New York banks to be transferred to Kentucky. Is it not clear that the $10,000,000 could not be paid upon demand, and would there not be great danger of producing unparalleled desolation among the debtors of those institutions, if it did not extend to the whole country, by the rigid enforcement of such an order? Sir, I should but exhaust myself, and fatigue the committee, by tracing in detail the evils of the present miserable system in relation to our public money. Let us break it up by dividing the money among the States.

Unless we distribute, much of the money will, hereafter, as heretofore, be applied to extravagant and sectional purposes. You have already appropriated near $1,000,000 for a custom-house in New York. My intelligent and indefatigable colleague, [Mr. C. ALLAN,] who has been in correspondence on the subject, has received authentic information that the marble for the building alone will cost $349,085. You have appropriated $350,000 for a custom-house in Boston, and refused to adopt an amendment which I offered, proposing to limit the total expenditure to that sum. How much more than the sums already appropriated, these two palaces, constructed for the decoration of the cities rather than for any business purpose, will cost, no one can conjecture. You have, during the present session of Congress, got up a South sea bubble, and have appropriated $300,000 to send out a naval expedition in search of Symmes's hole, or some unknown islands, whereon to catch seals! You have a Treasury building to erect in lieu of that consumed by fire, and, judging from the extravagance manifested in the cases of the custom-houses, you will probably spend a million and a half in building your Treasury. When all these splendid palaces are erected, your officers who tenant them will require salaries proportionate to the magnificence of the buildings, and you will be called on to pay their servants in livery from the public chest. Sir, this is not a mere fiction of the brain. Although you allow President Jackson a salary of $25,000 a year, you have granted $1,500 to pay a secretary for signing the President's name to land patents—a duty which the secretary does not perform, if my judgment is correct, founded upon the difference in the handwriting of the names of the President and secretary in several patents which I have recently received from my constituents. Thus the secretary gets the whole salary, no doubt, and does only half the work the law requires him to do; letting a clerk write the President's name, while he writes his own only. Our former Presidents could find time to sign their own names to patents; but General Jackson is probably fully occupied signing new commissions to fill vacant offices occasioned by his removals, and the other duties of his station. I have seen, in the documents laid before me, that you pay the President's gardener $1,000 a year—just as much as a talented circuit judge receives in Kentucky. Going on at this rate, it is not at all improbable, if your candidate for the presidency succeeds, we shall see a salaried tailor attached to the establishment at the White House. There is a precedent, I am told, in New York, which shows that some of her officers may draw on the public Treasury for mending breeches.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot repress my indignation when I reflect upon the extravagance and folly which are stamped upon your appropriations, and when I see the glorious purposes to which the money might, and ought, and would be applied, but for the degrading misrule and degeneracy of those in power. The character of the times has changed. Instead of taking a common-sense view of things, and honestly applying our surplus means to the improvement of the country, by which all ranks and classes would be benefited, we are giddy with conceptions of magnificent domes and geographical discoveries. Our thoughts, like the fool's eye, are roaming to the verge of the earth after adventures and fame, while we neglect practicable things of vast importance at our doors. The hearts of politicians have become corrupt. Office and power are sought after for the sake of money, instead of the noble, and benevolent, and patriotic purpose of doing good; and in the selfish scramble for the division of the "spoils," the disgrace, if not the overthrow, of our institutions will surely take place. Our best remedy will be found in divesting this Government of the means of corruption and prodigality, by placing the surplus at the disposal of the States. If the money be not distributed, it will not only be used for such improper purposes as I have mentioned, but you will pour it out upon chimerical projects, which you will attempt to palm upon the people, and to render popular under the captivating yet delusive pretext of public defence. The party to which you belong, Mr. Chairman, understand the value of a popular name as well as any set of men that ever lived; and they can wear out a good name, and render it odious, as soon, too, as any set to be found in the world. A Jackson democrat is a name that has nearly closed its career. It took well; but I doubt whether, with all your coaxing, you can get the collar fastened on the necks of the people, with the brand of "Jackson Van Buren democrat" upon it. Sir, you must take the collar off, to engrave the new title upon it; and my word for it, there is great danger that you will never be able to put it on again. The people are opening their eyes to the deceptions which have been practised upon them by false professions, and you will never be able to put on new halters, if you let them loose by taking off the old.

Some of the bills of this session, purporting to provide for the public defence, would be more properly denominated bills to squander the public money. Such is the bill, in part, now before the committee. It proposes to allow the President to purchase new sites for fortifications, and appropriates a large sum to that object, with others, and does not pretend to prescribe how much ground shall be purchased, nor in what place, nor at what price. We thus surrender the salutary control which, as representatives of the people, we ought to exercise, and confer an unlimited discretion upon the President, who may make purchases of land upon the seaboard or in the mountains, in New York or Nashville, just as it may please him. I will vote away money for no such object. Before I will vote the money, I must know where the land is situated, what it is wanted for, and what it will probably cost. At one time, in the early part of the session, it almost seemed to be the determination of the majority of this House to convert the whole line of seacoast into one continuous breastwork, and to mount it with cannon. Nothing less grand and stupendous than a Chinese wall around the empire seemed to meet the elevated conceptions of the Military Committee. The number and magnitude of their fortifications upon paper gave ample scope for the imagination; and we saw with fancy's eye embrasured castles looming through old ocean's mist, from Passamaquoddy to the Balize. But, sir, this enchantment, conjured up to deplete the Treasury, has vanished under the wave of Secretary Cass's wand. His common-sense report has exposed to ridicule the silly idea of fortifying every hamlet, village, and inlet, upon the seaboard; and, in all time to come, I trust that our statesmen will limit their ideas of seaboard fortifications to the protection of our naval stations and principal cities. To render these impregnable to any assault, I would grant any sum. After that, our surest defence is in the stout hearts and strong arms of our countrymen, and the ability to concentrate them, and all the implements and munitions of war, with rapidity, at any threatened or invaded point. Only construct the Charleston and Cincinnati, the New Orleans and Nashville railroads, and you will accomplish more for the defence of South Carolina and Louisiana than fifty or a hundred millions could effect, if expended in building fortifications along the seashore. An invading enemy, whose object was plunder or conquest, would land and pass into the interior, where there was no fort to annoy him. The railroads would enable us to throw an army from Ohio, Kentucky, or Tennessee, upon the enemy, before he had time to gain a foothold. As the surest and most effectual means of defence, therefore, good policy requires us to distribute the money, so that the States may construct those works, which will aid our military operations beyond measure. Permit me to strengthen these suggestions by reading the opinion of one of our most distinguished military men, taken from a letter addressed by General Jesup to Mr. Shriver, relative to the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, and published in 1824. The general says: "How important soever internal improvements, such as roads, canals, and bridges, may be, in a political and commercial point of view, I am persuaded they will be found still more so in relation to the military defence of the country; for the military power of a nation consists not so much in a numerous population and great resources, as in the capacity which it possesses of concentrating them at assailable points with certainty and rapidity. If this proposition be true, (and I hold it to be undeniable,) it inevitably follows that the nation having the best system of internal improvements, all other circumstances being equal, will be more powerful than any other, particularly in wars of defence, because it can place at any point on the frontier a greater force and a larger portion of supplies, in a given time, than its antagonist." The letter proceeds, and, by conclusive reasoning, places the truth of the above positions beyond all doubt.

My esteemed colleague [Mr. C. ALLAN] has furnished me with the aggregate amounts of the various sums proposed to be appropriated by the bill now under consideration, and two bills presented by the Military Committee for the construction of new works, the foundations of which have not yet been laid. The bill now before us, and the amendments thereto, propose to appropriate $3,772,058; and the two bills from the Military Committee propose to appropriate $2,503,800. Thus we are, and will be, called on to vote for $6,275,858 for fortifications in one year, during the same session, unless the able report from the Secretary of War shall arrest us in the midst of our madness. Sir, you cannot spend judiciously a fourth part of the money. You cannot get the materials and laborers. Sir, you cannot, in the remainder of this year, spend a tenth part of the money, unless it be corruptly wasted. The average appropriation for fortifications, since the year 1816, has been annually about $700,000. The estimate for 1835 was $439,000, and in 1836 we have schemes before us which call for $6,275,858! Heretofore the appropriations for naval purposes averaged about $3,500,000 a year. The naval bill this year amounts to $6,255,307. Sir, I was startled when my colleague communicated these facts to me. They point to a settled purpose of squandering the millions in our Treasury in visionary projects, rather than have them distributed among the States! My only hope, sir, is, that the people will hold their representatives accountable for these monstrous abuses!

I have noticed, Mr. Chairman, in the course of this and other debates during the session, that the advocates of what I believe to be a most chimerical system of fortifications have enforced the propriety of adopting their plans by representing the nation as destitute of the means of resisting aggression or prosecuting war. I propose to show, by contrasting our situation in 1811, just preceding the declaration of war against England, with what it now is, that those who represent us as weak and defenceless greatly err, if they do not calumniate their country.

which generates such speeches. But again: only look at the manufacturing ability of the country to clothe an army, and compare it with the state of things during the war of 1812, when our soldiers were freezing for want of comfortable blankets. I saw it stated in a newspaper paragraph, a few days since, that in 1808 there were not ten bales of cotton spun by machinery in the United States; while, in 1835, there were spun 216,880 bales. I present these facts, Mr. Chairman, for the consideration of statesmen. They will have their influence with those of all parties, whose intellectual pinions can elevate them above the filthy level of a brawling politician. I throw them out for the contemplation of the eagle who can soar in the heavens, and explore the wide expanse of earth and moving things below him. Your tomit, who hops and flutters in the circumference of a brush heap, and exultingly twitters over a crumb which has fallen from the table of executive patronage, can have no conception of things so vast and important.

Suppose, Mr. Chairman, you pass the bill under consideration, just as it is, and all other bills upon your table appropriating money for fortifications, what will come next? I need scarcely say that forts are useless unless mounted with cannon; that cannon are harmless things unless charged with powder and ball; and that forts, cannon, powder, and ball, are all good for nothing unless managed by skilful men. Men cannot garrison your forts and live upon the wind. They must be fed, and clothed, and paid their wages. When you build a few scores of new fortifications, the next thing will be to increase your standing army, in order to man the guns and take care of the forts. To accomplish all, there will be many fat jobs to let; contractors will grow fat; and there will be a new field of patronage, in which the President will feel his power in appointing new officers, and no doubt he will use it to the best advantage for the good of the party. But, sir, whose money will pay for all these things? Who will be taxed to keep up the establishment, after the money arising from the sale of the public lands is all spent! for it cannot last always. Your constituents and mine will then have to bear the burden. I do not intend, if I can help it, that it shall ever come to that; and I shall vote against every entering wedge, knowing the truth of the old adage, that "an ounce of preventive is better than a pound of cure," and knowing that if these things are once saddled upon the people, they will never be able to get clear of them.

I have been a little curious, Mr. Chairman, to find out the opinions of others upon the subject of distributing the proceeds of the sales of the public land among the States; and I have noticed the conduct of individuals and of public bodies with some anxiety. There are three parties; and it would be amusing, were it not for the painful solicitude generated by the magnitude of the interests involved, to inquire minutely into the motives of the parties, and to trace the various circumstances by which they are influenced. Pennsylvania, Kentucky, and many other States, come out openly, and instruct their Senators and request their Representatives in Congress to favor the measure; while most, if not all, of the new States take the opposite course. Why this difference? Trace it to its source, and you will find that Pennsylvania, &c., act upon the idea that the fund belongs to all, and that justice and sound policy require its distribution; while the new States look upon the distribution as calculated to deprive them of the great advantages they have heretofore derived in donations from this Government; to cut off the cherished hope of having the lands ultimately ceded to them; and to break up the harvest of speculation, which they are endeavoring to mature by graduation and pre-emption laws. The State which you in part represent, Mr. Chairman, the State of New York, at present occupies an equivocal position in regard to the distribution. Let me read you what your former Governors thought and said upon the subject of distributing the surplus revenue. Here it is:

From Governor Clinton's message, January 2, 1827.—

"As, however, the General Government is possessed of the national domains, and has exclusive authority over the most productive sources of revenue, I believe that the power of distributing the necessary funds among the several States, for objects of public improvement, ought to be incorporated into the constitution, if not recognised as already in existence."

From Governor Throop's message, January 5, 1830.—

"In a very few years, the national debt will be paid, and as but a small portion of the revenue will be consumed in conducting the affairs of the Union, within the constitutional limits, and as there are no prudential reasons for continuing the duties to a certain extent, there can be no valid objection to the distribution of the surplus revenue among the States, to be disposed of at their discretion."

From Governor Throop's message, January 4, 1831.—

"I submitted to the consideration of the last Legislature the propriety of taking measures to procure a distribution of the surplus revenue of the United States. * *

* I esteem it of sufficient importance to renew the suggestion, and press it earnestly upon your consideration."

Following the recommendations of Governor Throop, in March, 1831, the House of Representatives of the New York Legislature resolved, unanimously, "That the surplus revenue of the United States, beyond what shall be deemed by Congress necessary for the expenses of the General Government, and a proper provision for public defence and safety, ought to be annually distributed among the several States, according to their population, to be estimated in the manner pointed out by the second section of the first article of the constitution, for the apportionment of representatives and direct taxes." But how does New York stand now? Judging from the speeches made by yourself, Mr. Chairman, and others of her representation on this floor and in the Senate, she has veered about, and is now opposed to the distribution. Why the change! It is said, and I fear with too much truth, that your object is to hold on to the money, to aid in the election of a President; and not to interfere, at this particular time, with the policy and schemes of the new States, for fear of losing votes. Sir, if I had the election of a President more at heart than I have the welfare of the country, I would rejoice to see Congress adjourn without distributing the surplus. Every body knows it is in the power of the New York party to do it; and every body knows, if it fails, that your party will be the cause of its failure. If you do not make the distribution, the people will be convinced, beyond a doubt, that you are influenced by corrupt motives, and the people will blow your candidate "sky high," with the breath of their indignation. Sir, if you wish to elect Mr. Van Buren, you had better let the States have the money. Withholding it from them will lose you more among honest men than you will be able to gain among knaves by the use of it. If that be not its operation, then I despair of the republic. It is destined for destruction.

In the course of this debate, I noted many very exceptionable remarks made by those who have preceded me. I thought, at the time, if I said any thing, I would reply to them; but I find it is impossible. I must come to a close, and leave many things unnoticed which ought to be held up for public condemnation. I am constrained, however, before I sit down, to notice a few observations which have fallen from different gentlemen in the course of this latitudinous debate.

And first, Mr. Chairman, in regard to yourself: You took occasion the other day, another bill being under discussion, to charge those in favor of distribution with an unwillingness to vote money, even to defend the country against Indian massacre, because, as you said, we wanted to divide the "spoils," and take home our respective shares to our constituents. How did you know, sir, that our hearts were so eagerly bent upon the division of the "spoils?" It is a common rule to judge others by ourselves, and I am not sure but you have felt its influence in the present case. Had you any right to impute improper motives to us, from any vote we have given? Have we not been prodigal in voting supplies to suppress Indian hostilities? Sir, as much as my constituents want a portion of this money to aid them in their public works, they would not take a dollar of it for that purpose, when it was needed to save the lives of women and children from the scalping-knife and tomahawk. They would scorn me, as an unworthy representative, if I refused to make proper appropriations for public defence. It would be no justification to tell them I had secured a division of the money. Their indignant answer would be, we wanted no division under such circumstances; you ought to have applied the money in saving the lives of the people. Sir, your insinuation was neither creditable to us nor to yourself. You had no more cause or right to make it, than I have to charge you with exultation whenever you hear of Indian butcheries, because such things afford you suitable opportunities to raise a panic, and plausible pretexts to vote away millions; and thus enable you to reward your friends by throwing the money into their pockets, instead of dividing it among the States, to be applied to works of internal improvement, to education, or any thing else the States may please.

Sir, I have voted, and mean to vote, for every appropriation necessary to suppress Indian hostilities, and to defend the seaboard. After doing all that, there will still be a large surplus for distribution; and it is our duty to apply it in promoting other great interests of the country. In regard to these Indian hostilities, I believe that the administration is blameable for their existence. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] took occasion to condemn the President for his anti-nullification principles in reference to his State. I should not have introduced that topic; but as he did it, I take this occasion to say that, if I am correctly informed, the President was a nullifier of the first water, of the South Carolina school, at one time, and, while of that faith, wrote a complimentary letter to Mr. Hayne, praising his nullification speech; and, moreover, sent them under his frank, printed in gold letters, to his friends! However that may be, it is certain that the President, to this day, continues to be a decided nullifier in Georgia and Alabama, abrogating Indian treaties, treating with contempt the decision of the Supreme Court, allowing these latter States to rule the Indians by laws they do not understand and have no hand in making, and permitting Georgia to seize upon and parcel out the Indian lands. Sir, you may trace the wars in the Southwest to the President's nullification, and to the oppression which he has tolerated, and which it was his duty to prevent. The Indians have been driven to madness, and they are breathing vengeance. But, sir, I will not go into the causes of the war for the purpose of refusing money necessary to bring it to a successful termination. If a man's house is on fire, the first thing to be done is to put it out; and after that, then to find out the incendiary and punish him for the crime. I am for putting out the torch of war which blazes in Florida, Georgia, and Alabama, in the first place; but I am also for keeping in view those errors in doctrine and since in practice which have brought the evils upon us. We shall learn wisdom and justice by so doing. The President will find some excuse, probably, for his anti-nullification in South Carolina, and his ultra-nullification in Georgia, about as satisfactory as his distinction between that part of a river above, and that part of the same river below, a port of entry!

One remark more, and I am done. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. CAMBRELEN] said some days since that the distribution of the surplus money among the States would corrupt them. The charge is calumny upon the States. Have they been corrupted by the large sums they have borrowed, and are borrowing? No, sir; the motive which induces them to borrow is founded in a virtuous, lofty patriotism; the uses to which they apply the money borrowed prove their fidelity and honesty in promoting the public good, and afford a certain guarantee that placing in their possession that which they demand as a right, and not as a favor, will not corrupt them, but make this Government a great deal better.

Before Mr. UNDERWOOD had concluded his remarks, as given entire above, he gave way for a motion that the committee rise; which was decided in the negative: Yeas 50, nays 71.

Mr. WISE renewed the motion that the committee rise, Mr. UNDERWOOD having given way for that motion.

The vote on this motion was, yeas 51, nays 55; and no quorum voting, the committee rose, and reported that fact to the House.

A motion was then made that the House adjourn, upon which the yeas and nays were ordered; and the question being taken, it was decided in the negative: Yeas 66, nays 69.

Mr. ADAMS moved a call of the House; upon which motion the yeas and nays were ordered, and the question was decided in the negative: Yeas 45, nays 95.

So the motion for a call of the House was overruled.

Mr. SUTHERLAND moved to suspend the rules, so as to make the bill the order of the day for to-morrow, at 11 o'clock; which motion prevailed: Yeas 110, nays 19.

And then the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, MAY 24.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. ADAMS rose and remarked that he had asked the consent of the House several days since, to permit him to offer two resolutions, calling on the President for information. He had not been successful, and he now asked the consent of the House to submit the resolutions to which he had referred, and also to permit him to state, in a few words, the reasons which had induced him to offer them.

The resolutions were read for information, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, copies of any overture made since the 3d of March, 1829, by his authority, to the Government of the United Mexican States, for the acquisition, by the United States, of any portion of the territories of Mexico; and copies of all correspondence between the two Governments relating thereto, and upon any question of boundary existing between the United States and Mexico.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, a copy and translations of any law, decree, or ordinance, of the Mexican republic, abolishing slavery within the territories thereof, which may be in the possession of the executive department of the United States.

Objection being made to their reception,

Mr. ADAMS renewed the request that he might be permitted to assign briefly the reasons why he had proposed the resolutions.

This was also objected to, when Mr. CHAMBERS, of Kentucky, moved to suspend the rule to enable the gentleman from Massachusetts to make the statement which he desired.

Mr. HUNTSMAN inquired whether the subject was divisible. He would hear the gentleman in reference to the first resolution, but not upon the second. He had no objection to the adoption of the former resolution, and he had reason to believe that the President would promptly give the information desired by it.

The CHAIR said the proceeding was irregular, and that the motion was not divisible.

The motion of Mr. CHAMBERS was then negatived without a count.

Mr. ADAMS then moved to suspend the rules to enable him to offer his resolutions, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, said, as the motion was not now subject to amendment, he wished to give notice that, if the rule was suspended, and the resolutions submitted, he would move to amend the first by inquiring also of the President the present condition of Texas, its political organization, and his opinion of the expediency of the recognition by this Government of its independence.

Mr. HUNTSMAN hoped, if it was practicable, that the motion to suspend the rules should be taken separately on each resolution. He was in favor of the first, but opposed to the second resolution. He had reason to know, and did know, that the President was ready to answer at any moment.

Mr. ADAMS, in order to accommodate the gentleman, would vary his motion, so as to suspend the rule to enable him to offer the first resolution.

The question was then taken, when there appeared: Yeas 82, nays 68. So the rules were not suspended, two thirds being necessary.

ABOLITION REPORT.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of Mr. PRICKNEY, from the committee on the subject of the abolition of slavery.

The immediate question pending was the motion of Mr. ROBERTSON to recommit the report to the same committee, with instructions to report a resolution declaring that Congress has not the power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. ROBERTSON, who was entitled to the floor, addressed the House in continuation of his remarks, but the morning hour having expired, Mr. R. resumed his seat without concluding.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to go into Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CHILTON ALLAN moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of taking up the bill to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands in the United States, and for granting land to certain States, with the several motions pending to commit the same.

Mr. A. said that he would renew this motion from day to day, if he could get the floor, and would call upon his friends to give the yeas and nays. It was his desire to bring the House to a direct vote on the bill, that the question might not be dodged.

On this question the yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, it was decided in the negative: Yeas 72, nays 108.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, for the further consideration of the bill making appropriations for certain fortifications.

Mr. UNDERWOOD resumed and concluded his remarks, as given in preceding pages.

Mr. CHILTON ALLAN called for the reading of the original amendment of Mr. CAMBRELENG; which was accordingly read, together with the amendment to the same offered by Mr. MERCER, authorizing the establishment of a national foundry.

Mr. A. then moved an amendment, providing for a reduction of the salaries of all the Government officers, including members of Congress, to the amount of 25 or 33½ per cent.

Mr. ADAMS suggested that it was not in order to move another amendment to an amendment, thus accumulating one upon another.

Mr. MERCER remarked that, as his amendment seemed to embarrass the gentleman, [Mr. ALLAN,] he would withdraw it.

The CHAIR decided that the amendment was out of order, because the subject specially assigned for the day was appropriations for fortifications; and because, under the rule of the House, no amendment could be proposed essentially different from the subject under consideration.

Mr. ALLAN then addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Chairman, being in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and the grant of the money of the people for the supply of the Government, and the proposition for retrenchment which I have had the honor to offer, being the subject of consideration, the conduct of the Government in all its departments, as well as the propriety of reducing its expenditure, are relevant and proper topics of discussion in this present debate.

The effort that has been made to curtail the freedom of speech, and to exclude amendments from the appropriation bills, during the present session, is one of the most remarkable signs of the times.

From the earliest date of British liberty, free discussion was allowed on money bills. The public purse being in the hands of the Commons, was the great principle of English liberty. It was the effectual engine by which the Commons maintained the authority of the people in the Government, and restrained the power of the King. The supply bills have ever been the field upon which the battles between liberty and power have been fought. Yet, in the American republic, when power is thrusting its eager hands into the pockets of the people, their representatives are rebuked for resistance, and denounced for the exercise of the birthright of every freeman. But as we have already bountifully supplied the demands of power with millions, we have at length arrived at the point where, by common consent, it is agreed to be a fit and proper occasion for a full and free expression of opinion on our public affairs.

Having on another subject given my views on the surplus revenue, the national defences, and the course of the present administration, at present, before I proceed to the consideration of the plan of retrenchment, I will confine myself to a desultory glance at general principles and practices, and arguments, which the public good requires should be exposed.

Sir, in self-defence, I feel it to be my duty to describe the organization of this House, the mode of proceeding, and the effect of the previous question. All this is so very different from legislative proceedings in Kentucky, that it is necessary the people there should be made acquainted with the course of business here, to enable them to judge whether their immediate representatives have done their duty.

In this I do not intend to cast any individual censure on the Speaker of the House, for he has treated me on all occasions with courtesy and politeness; in the appointment of committees he followed party practice. In the Kentucky Legislature, every member can introduce any proposition, or get leave to bring in a bill on any proper subject he may desire, and can have a committee appointed favorable to the proposition, so that its friends may make it in as perfect a form as they can before it is brought before the House; and there the yeas and nays can be had, and the people be informed how every member voted. This is fair legislation; every portion of the people fairly heard, and responsibility fairly secured, in conformity with the ancient reasonable law of parliamentary proceeding.

Fortification Bill.

Here, by our rules, no member can get leave to bring in a bill; the business of the House has all to pass through and receive the sanction of the standing committees. These standing committees, appointed at the commencement of every session by the Speaker, upon strict party principles, are the channels through which every measure is brought into this House. The Committees of Ways and Means, Foreign Affairs, Military Affairs, Public Lands, and the Judiciary, are the principal doors by which every question enters this House. On each of these committees there are placed three opposition members and six for the administration—two for one. Of course the opposition have no voice to bring forward any thing. The majorities of these committees decide the fate of all the important measures of the session. Whatever they recommend comes into the House under the sanction of the administration and of "the party," and is voted through as a matter of course; whatever they report against is voted down with equal certainty.

The effect of this party organization of the House prevents any member of the opposition from bringing forward an original proposition; and the previous question is used so as to prevent direct votes on amendments to bills which may be pending. For example, on the other day, when the general appropriation bill was before the Committee of the Whole, my friend from Virginia [Mr. MEXCEA] offered an amendment to divide the proceeds of the public lands, and to limit the cost of the custom-house in the city of New York to $500,000. The previous question was called, and the amendment cut off, no question being taken on the amendment; the question being, according to our preposterous rules, on the passage of the bill. So that, by the party organization of the House, and the frequent use of the gag-law, the previous question, the dominant party can not only prevent the minority from getting a fair and direct vote, by yeas and nays, but they can so involve their course in mystery as to evade responsibility, and "dodge what questions" they may not chose to record their votes upon.

In the Committee of the Whole on the general appropriation bill, as the only opportunity of bringing forward the measure, I offered the proposition for retrenchment; but in the House, to avoid a direct vote upon it, the previous question was called, and the journal does not show who was for and who against it.

But, sir, that the country may understand the subject, I have offered the proposition a second time, and call upon the House to take the vote by yeas and nays. And if this question is again "dodged" by the previous question, let it be distinctly understood that those who vote for the previous question are against the reduction of the expenses of the Government.

The effect of these modes of proceeding, to involve the course of the members in mystery, and to evade the responsibility, is manifest from another view of the subject. A party has been in power more than seven years, the members of which have been professing all the while a desire to amend the constitution, so that members of Congress should be rendered ineligible to executive appointments. They have all the time expressed a desire to reduce the expenses of the Government. They now have a majority, they say, of about forty in this House, and yet they cannot show by the journals that they have ever voted for any one of these propositions.

My colleague and friend [Mr. UNDERWOOD] brought in, early in the session, a resolution presenting all these constitutional amendments, yet we cannot get to discuss or vote on them. Under the party organization of the House and the perverted use of the previous question, it is impossible for my colleagues or myself to have discussed and voted on the great measures upon which the people of Kentucky desire to see the action of Congress.

I will make allusion to another subject characteristic of the times. It has become a part of a general scheme to delude and mislead the public mind, for "the party" to assume that these measures are identified with the honor and glory of the country; and every one who dares to oppose any one of these plans, however unwise it may be, is denounced as an enemy to his country. Let us see how time and reason and experience expose this arrogant folly.

In this year 1834, all who were not for reprisals against France were proclaimed to be enemies to this country. On the last night of the session, all who refused to vote three millions of money, to be used at the discretion of the President, and in clear violation of the constitution, were denounced as the allies of France. Now, all the world plainly sees that, if reprisals had passed, and the money been voted, we should now have been in the midst of a French war. It is now evident to all that those who prevented reprisals and refused to vote the money preserved the peace and honor of the country.

Among the signal blessings which a gracious Providence has showered upon our country, none is greater than such a national Senate, given at such a time—a body of the greatest men the world ever saw congregated in a legislative hall. Their debates, for the last five years, will be read with enthusiasm as long as liberty and genius shall live. In future ages they will become a political text-book among the friends of constitutional freedom, when all the selfish projects of the present day, for the obtainment of money and office, shall have perished in the forgetfulness of oblivion. The American Senate will go to posterity with the glory of having been the anchor of the vessel of state, in the tempest of all the passions unchained and let loose by the ascendancy of party violence over the constitution.

The whole country has been filled with the lamentations of the exclusive patriots for the loss of the fortification bill of the last session; and, at this session, the following resolution was proposed:

"Resolved, That the President be requested to cause the Senate to be informed of, 1st. The probable amount that would be necessary for fortifying the lake, maritime, and gulf frontier of the United States, and such points of the land frontier as may require permanent fortification."

And all were denounced as enemies to the country who would not agree to pledge the surplus revenue to this ill advised measure; when, lo and behold, the enlightened Secretary of War, by the approbation of the President, in his luminous report of the 7th of April, completely demolishes the whole scheme; and the friends of an extensive plan of new fortifications, who had been so liberal in their denunciations of its enemies, were compelled to face to the right-about, a movement which frequent use had made easy and familiar in the evolutions of this administration.

On the 21st of March, while the application of the public treasure to the erection of new fortifications was all the rage, I took the responsibility of maintaining the impracticability of defending our extensive frontier by fortification; that the system had already been carried too far; that it would lead to a large standing army; that the true strength of our country was in the hearts of a brave people, and the way to insure success in war was to enable them to concentrate their power wherever danger should approach, by means of steam and roads, with the greatest possible celerity. I have the unexpected pleasure of seeing that every position which I took is sustained in the report of the Secretary of War.

The report of the Secretary has rendered the denunciations against the members of the minority for their opposition to new fortifications as powerless as time has rendered those which were levelled at them for their opposition to reprisals and the grant of the three millions.

It is thus that the opponents of these wild and dangerous schemes stand not only justified by experience and reason, but they have the honor of the sagacity of having foreseen, and the firmness to resist and defeat them in the face of power.

I will notice in this place the systematic attempt made at this session to establish two principles in regard to the appropriation of money which are subversive of the constitution, and upon the success of which depend the ascendancy of the executive control above that of the legislative in the disposition of the public treasure—principles that have been contended for from the commencement of the Government by the advocates of the extension of executive power. The first of those principles was advanced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SUTHERLAND] as the true doctrine “of the party.” It is this: that the recommendation of any of the executive departments of the Government that a certain sum of money should be applied to a partial object, is prima facie evidence that the appropriation ought to be made, and that the burden of proof is thrown upon those who maintain the negative! The other principle is, that, in making appropriations, Congress should not specifically direct the purposes to which the money shall be applied, but that the grant should be indefinite, and that it should be expended at the discretion of the Executive.

The gentleman from New York, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] some weeks past, when he made his speech upon the famous three million effort on the last night of the last session, went back for precedents, to justify and prove that appropriations should be general and not special, to the days of '98.

The constitution contains the following clause: “No money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law.” The people intended by this clause to keep the purse-strings in the hands of their immediate representatives. But this power had in effect been transferred to the Executive, by giving him grants of money to be used at his discretion. To correct this great abuse and clear violation of the constitution, Mr. Jefferson, in his very first message to Congress after his election to the presidency, expresses himself thus:

“In our case, too, of the public contributions intrusted to our direction, it would be prudent to multiply barriers against their dissipation, by appropriating specific sums to every specific purpose susceptible of definition; by disallowing all applications of money varying from the appropriation in object, or transcending it in amount; by reducing the undefined field of contingencies, and thereby circumscribing discretionary powers over money, and by bringing back to a single department all accountabilities for money, where the examination may be prompt, efficacious, and uniform.”

This great constitutional principle of specific appropriations, brought forward by Mr. Jefferson at the commencement of his administration, has ever since been regarded as the principle, by an adherence to which economy could be maintained in the administration of the finances, and executive power restrained within the limits of the constitution.

If the principle now sought to be established should prevail, that is, that Congress was bound to vote all the money demanded by the Departments, unless the negative could be proven, and the grants thus procured, not to be limited by specific appropriation, but left in the broad field of executive discretion, then the provision of the constitution referred to is useless; it would be as well to authorize the President to draw on the Treasury for all he wanted, and to expend it as he pleased.

The good old doctrine of the Jeffersonian school is, that when the Departments call for appropriations, the burden of proof shall be upon them, and the grant was not to be made unless they convinced Congress, by reason and evidence, of the propriety of what they had recommended; and when the money was voted, the precise object to which it should be applied was defined, leaving no discretion with the President, but making it his duty to see the money was expended according to law, and not according to his will.

I will proceed to show the boundless extravagance to which general grants of money, unguarded by specific appropriations, according to the recommendation of Mr. Jefferson, will lead; and the wide range of power which they place in the hands of the Executive, by enabling him to give fat contracts to his friends. It would be impossible, in the compass of a speech, to describe all the instances of prodigal expenditure by which millions of the public money are annually squandered, by the aid of ambiguous, undefined appropriations, among political partisans; but I will select two cases as specimens, to show the country in what manner this administration disposes of the public money confided to its discretion. In the year 1832, an act passed authorizing the President of the United States to cause to be built a good and sufficient bridge across the Potomac river, between this city and Alexandria, and the sum of $200,000 was appropriated for that object. The act failed to describe the plan of the bridge, or limit its cost; it was left to the discretion of the President. The letting of the contract was advertised, according to the requirements of the law, and was taken by Gilson and Stephens, at the sum of $1,186,625. They were permitted to proceed upon the work upon a mere verbal contract; and finally failed to execute a written contract, and sold out their bargain to a Mr. O. H. Dibble, in whose favor the plan of the bridge was changed, and the price raised to $1,350,000, without any new advertisement. In the same loose manner, he was permitted to proceed upon this great work, for so large a sum, upon a mere verbal understanding. In the mean time, Mr. Baldwin, an experienced engineer, reported that the bridge, upon the plan upon which Mr. Dibble was proceeding, would cost the enormous sum of $4,791,620. This extraordinary proceeding was arrested by the vigilance of my friend from Virginia, [Mr. MENCKEN,] who is better informed upon the construction of all works of internal improvement than any man in America. He had this prodigal contract brought before Congress, and exposed its enormity. Congress refused to go on with the work, and paid Mr. Dibble for what he had done. Since which time a good and sufficient bridge has been completed—for what sum do you suppose, Mr. Chairman, after what you have heard? The sum of $113,000. The country is indebted mainly to the learned gentleman from Virginia for having saved between four and five millions of dollars.

The other case to which I shall refer is the custom-house now building in the city of New York. In the year 1832, the same gentleman, now at the head of the Ways and Means, reported to this House a bill, as chairman of the Committee on Commerce, which passed at that session, and contains the following section:

“Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall be,

MAY 24, 1836.]

Fortification Bill.

and he is hereby, authorized and directed, with the approbation of the President of the United States, to purchase a site, and to cause a building to be constructed thereon, to be used as a custom-house in the port of New York, and that the sum of two hundred thousand dollars be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be applied to the purposes aforesaid."

At the time this bill passed, it attracted no particular notice. It was not intimated that any further appropriation would ever be called for; no one doubting that the sum of $200,000 would be amply sufficient to buy a lot and build a custom-house. The real design was concealed from Congress. And the Secretary, in clear violation of this law, under the direction of the President, instead of buying a lot where they were cheap, as we are now informed by the father of this law he could have done, he proceeded to make the purchase on the corner of Wall, Nassau, and Pine streets, in the dearest part of the city, at the price of $217,500, and to contract for a house, as we are now informed, that would cost a million and a half! It is manifest that the law above referred to authorized no such extravagant proceeding as this. It is perfectly certain that if this profligate expenditure of public money had been disclosed to Congress, the law never would have passed. But the gentleman [Mr. CAMBRELENG] informs us that he disapproved of the purchase of this extravagant lot, and that one near the water would have done as well, and also that he disapproved of the extravagant design of the building. Sir, he was the projector of this law. This abuse of it took place under his own eye, in his own city, of which he now says he very much disapproved. Now, as the gentleman has ever since remained a member of Congress, it is a misfortune to the country that he did not, at the next session, inform Congress of this flagrant extravagance and abuse of the law, of which he now says he so much disapproved. But the gentleman at the next session, in 1833, so far from giving this information, slipped into the general appropriation bill the following weighty lines: "For the erection of a custom-house at New York, $300,000." Mark the phraseology. Not in addition to a former appropriation, not to finish the custom-house; but it is for a custom-house. And this year, again, the gentleman has got through the general appropriation bill with an appropriation of $300,000 more, and the year and days prevented on it by the gentleman's own vote for the previous question. So that already the enormous sum of eight hundred thousand dollars has been appropriated for this house, and the basement-story is not yet done. And after all this the gentleman makes an effort to throw the whole blame on a former Secretary of the Treasury, who made a contract, as he states, for a house that would have cost a million and a half; but that the present Secretary of the Treasury, more economically given, had been to New York, and had adopted a new plan, to curtail the extravagance of this first. It seems that the duty of defending the administration is confined to the persons who happen to be in at the time. Here is a generous effort to throw the blame on an absent gentleman, who is out of office, and to eulogize the economy of the present Secretary at his expense.

[Here Mr. CAMBRELENG rose to explain, and said that he was surprised at the imputation of a design to assail the former Secretary; that he had several times explained, and he could only account for the observations of the gentleman from Kentucky, by supposing he was absent when he had given the explanation.]

Mr. ALLAN proceeded. Sir, the gentleman is mistaken in supposing that I was absent; I was present, and heard every word he uttered, and have a perfect recollection of all that he said. Sir, I have no intention of either assailing the gentleman's motives or of accus-

sing him of assailing the motives of the former Secretary of the Treasury. With motives I have nothing to do; my business is with facts; and although I intend to make a very free and full commentary upon what the gentleman has said and done in this House, yet my duty, in this respect, shall not be exercised in a spirit of personal unkindness, because my intercourse with the gentleman has been characterized with politeness on his part. But the influential position which the gentleman's party assigned him in this House, and the control which he is thereby enabled to exercise over public measures in which my constituents have a deep interest, impose on me the duty of commenting freely and fully upon his course. The gentleman did certainly say that the former Secretary had agreed to an extravagant plan, that would have cost a million and a half, of which he disapproved, and that the present Secretary had reduced the plan to a proper scale of economy. I thought this a very strange account of the matter, and that two Secretaries should come into conflict upon so important a subject; as we have been informed in a state paper that the Secretary of the Treasury was a mere incumbent of the President, neither of the Secretaries, of course, had any thing to do but to execute the orders of the President. I wrote to the present Secretary, Mr. Woodbury, on the subject; and, so far from claiming the credit of having altered the plan of the custom-house, he did not even know what the plan was, or what the cost of the building would be, and promised to write to New York and procure the information which I desired, and which he did; and the two following letters will explain the subject:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 28, 1836.

SIR: As promised in my letter of the 23d instant, I now have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of a report made to me, under date of the 26th instant, by the acting commissioner of the New York custom-house, containing the remainder of the information respecting the new custom-house building, asked for in your letter of the 22d of the present month.

It is deemed proper to add that the contracts referred to by the commissioner are for the following purposes, to wit: 1st. For the supply of all the cut marble necessary for the completion of the basement story, amounting to $67,500. 2d. For the supply of all the cut marble necessary for the superstructure above the basement story, together with the shafts for the columns, $281,585.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. CHILTON ALLAN,
House of Representatives, Washington.

OFFICE COMMISSIONER FOR BUILDING CUSTOM-HOUSE,
New York, April 26, 1836.

SIR: Yours of the 23d instant was received yesterday, in reply to your inquiries—"1st. What is the length, breadth, and height, of the new custom-house?"

The length is 185 feet, exclusive of buttresses and steps on each front; the breadth 90 feet; and the height, from basement floor to top of the eave, 55 feet; to the top of the roof 68 feet.

"2d. What will be the number and cost of the marble columns for the support and decoration of said building?"

There are sixteen doric columns for the porticoes sixteen Corinthian columns for the great hall or rotundo twenty-two doric columns in the basement, and eighteen doric columns in the rooms of the first, second, and third floors; the prices of which it is now impossible to designate, as in the contracts entered into, (copies of which are with the Department,) the items, or parts, were not specified, but put down in gross; they can, however, be obtained from the contractors. The columns cannot be separated, or their receipt declined; the contract is for the whole together, and they are mostly worked and ready for delivery.

"3d. What will be the cost of the building?"

The superintendent's estimate in November last, forwarded to you, was, for the whole cost of the building, seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars; and he is still fully persuaded that this sum will complete the whole. It is the general opinion here, that, by the contracts already made, the Government receive the marble for $150,000 less than it could now be contracted for and furnished. The building cannot be materially altered without losing the great advantages of these contracts; the building is now progressing rapidly, and the entire appropriation of $300,000 will absolutely be necessary.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WALTER BOWNE,
Commissioner, &c.

The Hon. LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington.

It has turned out as I anticipated—that there could be no conflict between two Secretaries, acting under the orders of the same President. The lot for this house cost $217,500; the marble $348,585. There is no general contract; the cost is not limited. The work is progressing at the discretion of the architect; he makes out the annual estimates; it was him who sent here the demand at this session for $300,000 more. He is the only person who appears to be informed on the subject. Simply upon the act of Congress of 1832, appropriating $200,000 to buy a lot and build a custom-house, the Executive, in the exercise of his discretion, has determined to build a house in the city of New York, which shall be a splendid monument of the arts, which shall astonish and excite admiration by its extent and magnificence, to adorn and beautify the great commercial metropolis. This house is merely for the preservation of the books and the accommodation of the clerks and officers of the customs. A plain house near the water, where the lots are cheap, could have been built for the original appropriation of $200,000. But we now see a house progressing, made of such huge blocks of marble as to require thirty yoke of oxen to haul a single piece. The people can learn from these two cases of the bridge and the custom-house how their affairs are managed; how power seeks every occasion to extend its patronage, and provide profitable contracts for numerous dependants. They will see that their money is thrown out broadcast, as profusely as if it were as plenty as seawater.

In private life it is a safe maxim to count the cost before you begin to build a house; but here a house is undertaken without defining the plan or fixing the price, and the commissioners paid a premium for the amount which they spend.

I will close my remarks on this branch of the subject, by placing the Potomac bridge and the New York custom-house by the side of a sentence in the inaugural address of the President, of the 4th of March, 1829. He says:

"The management of the public revenue—that searching operation in all Governments—is among the most delicate and important trusts in ours; and it will of course demand no inconsiderable share of my official solicitude. Under every aspect in which it can be considered, it would appear that advantage must result from the observance of a strict and faithful economy."

Sir, when you consider the effect of this "searching operation" upon the bridge and the custom-house, you cannot wonder that the same kind of operation has made the expenses of this administration swell more than forty-five millions of dollars more than the preceding eight years. This "searching operation" increases in energy as it progresses, and will, from the present indications, very soon reach the very bottom of the Treasury. Between twenty and thirty millions have already been appropriated at this session. In my former calculation I took the Secretary's estimates for 1836, at twenty-three millions of dollars, which were made in view of a French war. Now, I have but little doubt that the appropriations of this session will exceed the estimates of the Secretary at least ten millions; if so, the excess of expenditure of this administration over the previous eight years will be over fifty-seven millions.

It is very true this "searching operation" has demanded "no inconsiderable share of the official solicitude of this administration;" and if it has not been conducted exactly in accordance with the former understanding of a "strict and faithful economy," yet a strict and faithful regard has been had to the spoils principle. No doubt the honorable gentleman from the city of New York thinks the cost of this custom-house a small matter. When we were on the navy bill, he sneeringly said the pitiful sum of $600,000 was game too small to be worthy of the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL:] this is all very natural: our minds are formed by the circumstances around us. The gentleman has been long accustomed to see millions of the national treasure poured out in his State and city. His constituents now have the use of more than twelve millions of the public money without interest, a million to build a custom-house. Under these circumstances, it does not surprise me that the gentleman should have large ideas; and that, being so much used to millions, he should have no patience in counting mere thousands.

I do not know how it is with the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] as he resides at Nashville, within the limits of the constitution, but I will undertake to say that the gentleman from the same State [Mr. PERRY] would think the sum of $600,000 was game well worthy of his attention, if he could get it to improve the Cumberland river above the upper boundary of the constitution.

The power of the House of Representatives is fast wasting away to nothing under another alarming innovation, in regard to the appropriation of money. A demand upon the Treasury for a large sum of money was heretofore deemed an affair of sufficient consequence to be brought before Congress by a message from the President of the United States, and to be referred by the House to a standing committee for investigation. Now, the irregular practice has grown up, of the heads of the Departments, instead of the President, to call upon a committee of the House, instead of the House itself, for appropriations. Under this new practice, and at this session, we have seen millions voted away upon a letter passing between the Departments and the committees. I was surprised at the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SPREIGHT,] who, in the general, is so correct as to the rules of proceeding, when he asserted that this practice had existed from the commencement of the Government. I deny that any committee has a right to deliberate or report upon any subject that has not been referred to it by the House. The committees derive all their powers from the House, and the range of their deliberations is confined to such subjects as the House has referred to them. I deny their right to receive a communication from any source whatever, of original propositions, except from the House. They have a right, and it is the practice for the Departments, to prepare estimates and statements for the committees, explanatory of subjects which have been referred to them by the House. And it is this usage that has misled the gentleman from North Carolina. Whenever the design of raising armies and appropriating money originated in the executive department, such design was always, until of late years, brought before this House upon the responsibility of the President, and it is the right of every representative to vote upon its reference. But our present chairman of the Ways and Means not only receives notes from the executive departments calling for armies and millions, but whenever he determines that any of these notes are not properly directed to his committee, he takes the responsibility, without consulting the House, to say which of the other committees they shall go to. In this informal mode of proceeding, we have seen millions appropriated in the compass of a few hours, under a single breeze of excitement.

Fortification Bill.

At this dangerous innovation, the honest indignation of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. JARVIS] rose above party, and he boldly and fearlessly denounced this practice, as reducing this House to the condition of an old French Parliament, whose office it was to enregister the decrees of the King. The whole of the improvements of the country, the fortifications, breakwaters, harbors, &c., are progressing under such vague and general estimates, under such indefinite legislation, that power is left in the uncircumscribed field of discretion, to multiply and extend patronage at pleasure.

Sir, on the subject of fortifications a brief statement will show the wild, wasteful, prodigal spirit, which is now, with an unsparing hand, scattering the public treasure to the winds—a spirit that proclaims that it would be better to scourge our land with the devastations of war than to unloose the grip of federal power upon any portion of the contents of the Treasury. The average amount of the annual appropriations for fortifications, upon the settled policy of the country, since the year 1816, is within a fraction of $700,000. The estimates sent in from the proper department for the year 1835, when it was said there was danger of a French war, were the sum of $439,000. The estimates for 1836, in view of a French war, for fortifications, being for two years, the bill for 1835 not having passed, was for the sum of $1,670,000. And now, when the French war has gone by, and it has been determined to make war on the Treasury, to keep the people out of any share of the surplus, what do we behold? Three bills depending before this House: the one now under consideration for the sum of $3,772,058, and the two bills reported from the Committee on Military Affairs for new fortifications, for the sum of $2,503,800 more; making, in all, the sum of $6,225,858! The sum proposed now to be appropriated at this session is nearly half as much as has been appropriated for fortifications for the last twenty years.

The average annual amount for the naval service heretofore has been a fraction less than three and a half millions. The annual naval bill of this session, which has passed this House, is for $6,235,307. From the above indications, it is evident that federal power, entrenched in the strong ramparts of the Treasury, is determined there to make its stand, until it triumphs in the battle of the succession, or expends every dollar in the conflict.

Sir, I disagree with my colleague in the warm approbation which he has expressed for the fortification bill now before you. It is without example for its prodigal extravagance; and unnecessary, because the enormous amount cannot be expended during the year.

During the year 1834, when labor was comparatively cheap and easy to be procured, only the sum of $475,617 could be expended out of the appropriation of $870,594 for fortifications.

Of the fortification bill of this session, $700,000 is for arming the fortifications. The annual appropriation heretofore for this last object was $100,000.

There is in the army bill of this year the sum of $200,000 for the armament of the fortifications, which has already passed; and the amendment now pending, and to which my colleague has pledged his support, is for $700,000 more; making, in all, $900,000, in place of the $100,000 heretofore annually applied to this purpose. I do not see the necessity of making this appropriation ninefold more than has ever been required heretofore, even by this administration. As all former experience has proven the impracticability of expending the sums demanded at this session upon the public works in the year, there can be no other object in the extravagant appropriations proposed, than to make such a disposition of the public money as to defeat the land bill. Sir, why are you about to depart from all former usage at this particular time? Why signalize the year 1836 with a prodigality that will swell the expenses of the Government millions beyond even the excesses of the last seven years? Is it possible that Congress will swing the doors of the Treasury wide open, and pour out the public money agreeably to the new demands of power at the approach of a presidential election? For the army, navy, and fortifications, nearly ten millions are demanded for this year more than the last.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] gave us notice several times that he intended to speak upon the surplus revenue and expenditure. I was anxious to hear him on these subjects, for I supposed he would avail himself of the occasion to explain to the country why he had delayed so long to bring forward a bill for retrenching the expenses of the Government and the number of federal offices, agreeably to his famous report of 1828, upon the adoption of which he and his friends then thought, or professed to think, that the very salvation of the country depended. But when the gentleman came to speak, he remembered to forget his pledge of retrenchment, which is now eight years old. He must be excused; he has been so busily engaged during this session in preparing bills to increase the number of offices and the salaries in all the executive departments, that he has not had time to explain the reasons of his failure to comply with his retrenchment pledge.

He commenced his speech by showing that if the President's wise and just recommendation in 1829, to give the public domain to the new States in whose boundaries it was situated, had been complied with, we should not now have been troubled with a surplus revenue. The public domain was purchased by the blood and treasure of all the States, for the common use and benefit of all. Virginia conveyed her vast possessions to the United States for the benefit of all the States, herself included; and yet the gentleman contends it would be just towards Virginia and the other States for Congress to take the common property from all the States, and divide it among a few of them. This agrarian scheme, prostrating as it does every idea of justice and policy, the gentleman knows full well will never be adopted. But the delusion has answered the purpose for some time, and may a little while longer, of raising expectations in the new States which they will never realize, and of casting their political influence in the scale that holds out the promise. The idea of robbing one State of its property, to bestow it on another, had its origin in political designs, and will end in political designs; for such a scheme can never succeed unless the people become deranged. It will turn out like the promise of retrenchment and reform. The plain English of both promises was artifices to get votes and political influence.

The gentleman next proceeded to denounce the legislation of 1816, which has paid off the national debt, and filled the Treasury to overflowing, and stoutly maintained that if the public money was divided, it would corrupt the States! The honorable gentleman seems to have all sorts of horrors at the idea of the corruption which the use of their own money would spread among the people; but the gentleman has no fears that the public money will corrupt the officers of the Executive Government, who now have it in their hands against law, and are using it in violation of law. There is no danger of its corrupting the pet banks, and brokers and stockjobbers of New York, who now have more than twelve millions of the people's money without interest. There is no danger that they will either use this money in political bribery, or for the unholy purpose of grinding the poor and needy. There is no danger of millions of this money being loaned to political favorites to speculate in Indian reservations. There is no danger that forty millions of public money thus used will transfer the property of the country into a few hands, and build up a lordly aristocracy among us. There is no danger that the present operations of the federal Treasury will make a single city the mistress of the commercial operations of the whole country, and subject every portion of the Union to enormous exactions in the forms of discounts and exchanges. There is no danger that the labor of the people will have to pay tribute in the brokers' shops in this ingulfing commercial emporium. No, sir; the honorable gentleman apprehends no danger from any use of the public money except its division among the people, to whom it belongs, and there he thinks it would spread universal corruption.

To save the democracy from corruption, the gentleman, with the most disinterested views in the world, holds on to the surplus revenue with the grip of death; he will keep it snugly in New York. And here, sir, I will notice one instance of the use of a portion of the public money in that city. The Manhattan Bank, which was smuggled into existence by fraud, has a perpetual charter; of the stock an English nobleman owns over six hundred thousand dollars. This bank held on the 1st of February $3,067,000 of the people's money on deposit, which, at legal interest, produces $214,690 annually; of which the Marquis of Carmarthen receives $70,000 for his share of the spoils. And this is done for the very laudable purpose of keeping the money from corrupting the people. A few years ago we were informed by the gentleman and his friends that it was very improper to let foreigners hold stock in the United States Bank, although they paid the Government a large bonus for the privilege. Now we are informed by the same gentleman that it is very proper that foreigners should hold stock in this pet bank, without paying any bonus, and have the use of the money of the people of this country gratis in the bargain.

After the honorable gentleman had shown and condemned the means by which the surplus in the Treasury had been produced, and shown how its division would corrupt the States, he straightway denied that we would have any surplus whatever to divide. He fell to work on the Treasury, and soon had it bankrupt. The forty millions disappeared under the operation as fast as the number of Falstaff's assailants in Kendal green.

I will give a specimen or two how the gentleman got clear of the surplus. In the first place, he stood up here, in presence of the assembled representatives of the people, and contended, with a grave face, that the seven millions of stock which the Government owns in the United States Bank was not safe; and that, in reckoning our means, we ought not to count that fund! So the honorable gentleman strikes seven millions out of the account. He next strikes out five millions, to pay for the Florida war with a few hundred Indians. This is more than twice as much as was expended in all the Indian wars of the West, from 1774 to 1795. And then the gentleman took out ten millions to pay for a war that is to occur hereafter, but did not tell us where. But after getting clear of $22,000,000, there was still a large surplus on his hands which he did not know what to do with, when his friend and colleague [Mr. GILLET] flew to his assistance, with a scheme to spend $22,000,000 more, to buy muskets for the militia.

[Mr. GILLET rose and said that he did not propose to take that sum; that he had said it would require that amount to arm the whole militia, but that his proposition only extended to a part.]

Sir, I am glad to hear the gentleman does not want the whole sum now. These instances will show how the Treasury was to be emptied. From the gentleman's assertion, that there will be no surplus in the Treasury, I will appeal to official documents. In my statement on the 21st of March last, as to the amount of the public funds, I referred to the returns from the Treasury which had then come in, and I did not include the bank stock. By subsequent reports from the Secretary, it appears that there are now in the Treasury $38,000,000; the Government stock in the Bank of the United States is worth $8,000,000; estimated receipts to the 1st of January next, $24,000,000—making, in the aggregate, $70,000,000. Admit that the extravagant spirit that now bears rule should at this session swell the appropriation to the unexampled sum of $35,000,000, still there will be in the Treasury, on the 1st of January next, $45,000,000, allowing that there will be in the Treasury at that time $10,000,000 of unexpended balances. Now, I should like the gentleman to descend from the airy region of imagination, and show any error in this calculation.

In prosecuting hostilities against the Treasury, the gentleman makes a most vigilant war minister. Whenever he wants a large sum of money, he forthwith waxes exceedingly valiant, and becomes warlike; but, to do him justice, during almost the whole of last session he was as civil and peaceable a gentleman as any one could wish to live by; and only a few days before the close of the session, as chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, he made the most sensible speech I ever heard him make, and as sensible a one as I ever heard any one make. It was short and to the point; both very rare merits in this hall.

The venerable and learned gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] called upon him to know why he had not made a report upon our relations with France. I remember the identical words of the reply, for they struck me at the time. The gentleman rose and said, "as we intend to do nothing, we think it prudent to say nothing." I admired the excellence of this speech, because it is not uncommon in the world to hear men play the braggart, and gasconade, and talk big, just in proportion as they intend to do nothing. But notwithstanding this prudent pacific speech, on the very next night the gentleman fell so violently into one of his belligerent ways, that it broke out in a peremptory demand for three millions of money: and he became so moody because he could not get the whole sum, that he would not have a part, and exhorted his friends not to answer to their names when they were called, to prevent a quorum from voting, to enable him to withhold from the House the report of the committee of conference. I was present to the last hour of that long-to-be-remembered night session, and confess that I was astonished to hear the gentleman call upon his friends not to vote after midnight, knowing that the gentleman had never on any former occasion refused to vote himself after midnight; and knowing, as I do, that it is his opinion that the Congress does not necessarily end on the 3d of March at midnight. I will not dwell upon what occurred at the last session, but return to this. During the last winter, when that gentleman desired to make heavy pulls on the Treasury, he would take into his head that Admiral Mackau was hovering on the coast, and sometimes seemed to think that his guns were within point-blank shot of the Capitol.

Since the nautical evolutions of the Gallic admiral have ceased to float in the visions of the gentleman's fervid imagination, his pugnacious apprehensions have worked around to an opposite direction, and one ominous sweep of his finger from Lake Superior to the Gulf of Mexico portended unnumbered direful wars, in some one of which it would be necessary to spend ten millions of dollars. In this brief manner the honorable gentleman disencumbered the land bill of nearly one half of its contents. The gentleman tells us boldly that a war would do the country less injury than the division of the surplus treasure among the States.

Sir, that it was the deliberate intention at first to make the whole Union tributary to New York, becomes every day more and more evident. As early as the 18th of October, 1833, the agent of the Government appointed to select the deposit banks wrote to a person in New York that, under the new system, "it (the branch of the United States Bank) will have to become the collector of specie from every quarter of the Union, for the ultimate use of your bank and others who may want it in New York." Yes, sir, here is a project to drain every part of the Union of specie, for the benefit of New York. We now see, in completion of this scheme, twelve millions of the people's money deposited in one city, and the whole Western country constantly drained to keep the public funds concentrated at this point; and we hear the member from that city proclaiming that it would be better to involve the country in war than to have this New York monopoly broken up; the monopoly by which the specie from all parts of the Union, as well as the public revenue, is conveyed to this favored place.

The great contest of the present day is, whether the public domain shall be divided among the States, to strengthen the defences of liberty, or retained in the hands of federal power, to be divided out as spoils in the form of jobs, contracts, and salaries, to secure political influence. The proceeds of the sales of the thousand millions of acres of the public land, devoted to the augmentation of federal patronage, will insure the ultimate triumph of executive and aristocratic power over the liberty of the country. Hence power holds on to the public money and the public lands. Hence the declaration that war would be preferable to a division of the public money among the States. Hence the presumptuous declaration of the office-holders, while they are rioting upon the public money which they hold in violation of law, that if they were forced to give it up, it would corrupt the people. Hence the succession of varying schemes which have passed before us since the first Monday of December, with a view to engage public attention, so that the session might be wasted in the consideration of a number of repugnant plans; that nothing should be done, and Congress adjourn and leave the public money in a position to do the political work of "the party."

Three projects were proposed by three eminent politicians, all high in the confidence of power, members of the other branch of the Legislature. One proposed to lay out the surplus public money in the purchase of stocks; another reported a scheme of distributing the public funds among railroad companies, for the purpose of having the mail carried; while another proposed to get rid of the surplus by building forts. Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] and his party, in the face of their own admissions during the whole session, in the face of their own projects of disposing of the surplus revenue, turn round and deny that there will be any surplus to divide! Emboldened by success, the party now confidently imagine that they can pass off the most palpable inconsistencies upon public credulity, under cover of the President's popularity. It may be slow, but a day of accountability will come.

But, sir, there is one view stronger than all others, to show the inconsistency of those who are engaged in the project of keeping the people out of the use of their money. On the one hand, we are told that the whole ought to be appropriated for the use of the General Government; and, on the other hand, we are told, if it be appropriated for the use of the States it will break all the banks. Yes, sir, according to these gentlemen, if you grant all your money for federal purposes, the pet banks can pay you with ease; but if you make the grant for the use of the States, they will all blow up!

Sir, I will here take leave of the gentleman from New York, and pay my respects to my honorable colleague, [Mr. FRENCH,] who has thought proper to honor me by making almost the whole of his very elaborate speech in answer to one of mine delivered more than two months ago. I will not complain of his going out of his way, and against the rules of the House, on one subject, to answer an argument made on another. But I do not see the necessity the gentleman was under to answer my speech, inasmuch as, after two months' deliberation, he has not ventured to deny a material fact, or to controvert a principle maintained by me. That the gentleman should have selected me, out of all the members of the House, to make his speech at, is a little remarkable, considering the long and uninterrupted friendship which he has informed the House has subsisted between us; and considering, also, that the gentleman stands pledged to his constituents to support the same measures that I do to mine. Our districts adjoin, and we represent people not only having precisely the same interests, but agreeing perfectly in the measures which should sustain their interests. I do not know that my colleague and myself differ on any question of national policy. We agree that a national bank is constitutional, and conducive to the preservation of a sound currency. We agree in the constitutionality and expediency of works of internal improvement. We both believe that roads could be made in Kentucky, of a national character, as well as in the other States. We both believe the constitution is in force above as well as below custom-houses. He believes, as I do, that the proceeds of the public lands ought to be divided among the States. We both agree that the condition of the public money ought to be examined into by Congress before the adjournment. Thus situated, being old friends, substantially representing the same people, and agreeing as to all the great measures depending before Congress, I had cherished the hope that the gentleman would have stood side by side with me, and shoulder to shoulder, in pressing these great measures, in which our constituents have so deep an interest, through the House.

That the gentleman should have assumed an attitude of opposition to me, (in a kind manner, it is true,) is among the strange events of these strange times; not because we differ in principle, not because I have made any argument against the interest of the country, but because, as he says, I have opposed "his party," and he, being one of "the party," is, in self-defence, bound to answer me. His defence is not of the constitution, not of the great principles of public policy called for by our constituents, for here we walk together and are agreed. No; the gentleman entered the lists as the champion of his "party." My friend is an apt scholar, and has very soon learned the fashion at the metropolis. He quickly ascertained that, no matter what measures he advocated, no odds what principles he professed, he would be taken into full communion and fellowship, provided he would defend the party and vote for the successor. He informed the House that he intended to leave his posterity in Kentucky, and that he loved Kentucky better than any place in the world. No doubt this is true; yet I could wish the gentleman had a different way of showing his love. He stands here, from day to day, and sees "the party" contriving schemes of extravagance to squander the public money, with a view to deprive the people of the use of any portion of it; yet he is as meek and as gentle as a lamb; his Kentucky blood is not in the slightest degree agitated at those attempts to crush the rights of his constituents.

Fortification Bill.

The other day, in this present debate, he heard the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENG] contending that, if the money was divided, it would corrupt the people. This daring affront upon the sovereign people did not fire my friend with indignation, and bring him to his feet to vindicate his constituents from the aspersion. No; that was no attack upon the party. The honorable gentleman had to reserve his strength, to lay it out against a Kentuckian who was fighting by his side for the measures which he professed to advocate. After a full examination of all the documents, my friend informed the committee that we had a large surplus in the Treasury—enough to divide over twenty millions among the States; yet he listened with perfect composure to the gentleman from New York when he was boldly asserting, in the face of figures and facts, that there was no surplus in the Treasury. Yet the gentleman did not feel it to be his duty to protest against a statement which he knew to be unfounded, and which was made with a view to defeat the just claims of his constituents in their share of the surplus money. The gentleman could look quietly on and see the great measure which he was sent here to sustain sinking under this statement. Yet the gentleman's love for Kentucky could not induce him to utter a word of remonstrance; all was reserved for me; not because I was against his measures, but against his men. Verily the gentleman does not love Rome less, but he loves Cæsar more.

But after all the gentleman's devotion to his party, after his gallant defence of his party, what return has his party made to him? He moved, on three several days, to take up and consider the bill which I had the honor to introduce for the benefit of the old soldiers who fought the battles of the Western country. Where was the gentleman's party on these occasions? They voted him down, and would not let him have even one hour to consider the bill. Yet my friend went between the tellers, with the gentleman from New York, for the previous question on the general appropriation bill, and thereby prevented a motion to strike out $300,000 for the New York custom-house. While my friend is aiding in the completion of a custom-house in the city of New York, which will cost at least a million of dollars, his party from New York vote to leave the conquerors of the West, in their age and poverty, without a dollar of compensation for all their suffering and all their toils. Again, my friend was elected especially to get from his party an appropriation to make a road from the mouth of Big Sandy to Mount Sterling. Where is the gentleman's party on this subject? They are taking millions for improvements in other States, but they will not grant my friend one dollar for his road. He may hope for it, but I will tell him now that they do not intend to give him one cent. So that my friend is engaged in a most hopeless undertaking. He stands by his party, but they will not stand by him.

If the gentleman had reserved some of his eloquence to vindicate the rights of his constituents, and to bring his party to a sense of justice, he would have stood a much better chance for success. My friend occupies the strange ground here of supporting men who oppose every measure which the people of Kentucky think connected with their deepest interests. I do not know what consolation the gentleman can take in this, unless he, too, thinks it "a sufficient glory to serve under such a chief."

I will now proceed, in the same kind and friendly spirit manifested to me by the gentleman, to a nearer view of his speech. He again brings forward the letter of General Jackson to President Monroe; in which General Jackson advises Mr. Monroe, "in the selection of the public officers, to avoid party and party feeling." Advises him to "crush the monster called party spirit." Tells him that "the Chief Magistrate of a great and powerful nation should never indulge in party feelings; that his should be liberal and disinterested, bearing in mind that he acts for the whole, and not for a part, of the community." This celebrated letter was written in 1816, and was republished in all the papers of the party throughout America, while General Jackson was electioneering for the office of Chief Magistrate, as containing the principles and pledges upon which he would administer the Government if elected. Now, that every principle and pledge in this letter have been violated; that all appointments have been made with a view to party; that every man in the nation has been proscribed who did not belong to the party; that the monster called party spirit, so far from being crushed, has scattered throughout the land firebrands of discord, and caused party passions to blaze with increased fierceness, are truths which no one questions.

My colleague, perhaps, did not observe that all the members of his party, in their speeches, prudently went round the Monroe letter; that upon this subject they were as silent as the tomb. Perhaps he did not know that for the last five years not one was found in this House who ventured to deny that every principle and pledge in the Monroe letter had been disregarded in practice. If my colleague had observed these things, he would not have taken a post which had been abandoned by every one; he would not have undertaken the defence of his party upon a point where he cannot find a single man that will stand by his side.

But as the gentleman entered the lists, not to sustain the rights of his constituents, but to defend his party, he had a chance of showing his zeal, if not his discretion, in taking up the Monroe letter; and if he has not been able to reconcile the professions and practices of the party, it has afforded him a notable occasion to show the strength of his devotion. But let us see what the gentleman has made of the letter. The point in issue was between the profession that, in the selection of public officers, party and party feeling should be avoided, and the practice which selected none but partisans. In the very first move my friend bears off from this issue, and turns to other parts of the letter, upon quite different subjects, and discourses about Western lands and Indians, the public debt, &c. &c.; but when the gentleman got back from his irrelevant digression, as he could not prove the consistency between the President's profession and practice, he boldly abandons the profession and justifies the practice.

In his advice to Mr. Monroe, General Jackson said: "Every thing depends on the selection of your ministry. In every selection party and party feeling should be avoided." My colleague said: "All statesmen of all parties concede the right to the President to select from the ranks of his political friends the heads of Departments. How can two walk together except they be agreed?" The gentleman's tone has altered. In 1828, when he was electioneering for the office of elector, he eulogized General Jackson for the elevated and liberal principle, that in the selection of the heads of Departments party should be avoided. Now, he says, all statesmen agree that Departments should be filled with partisans. That the gentleman should move in opposition to his own professions in 1828, in the face of the principles of the President, contained in the letter which he held in his hand, should say that all statesmen of all parties agree that cabinet ministers should be partisans, is but the beginning of the difficulty in which he has involved himself by undertaking to make a whole-hog defence of the administration.

My colleague then proceeded, in direct opposition to what he had advanced in the sentence before, to say: "It is true, sir, that all the citizens of the United States are equally eligible to office, and entitled to equal benefits from the Government;" and went on to prove that equal justice had been done to all parties in the distribution of offices. He said that he had inquired of the most intelligent citizens of this city, and had been informed by them that the opposition have their due proportion of offices throughout the Union. I should have been pleased if my friend had given the names of his witnesses. I should like to know if they were not office-holders, in the receipt of the spoils. I very much regret that a statesman from Kentucky should have been reduced to the necessity of making such an inquiry in this city, and of founding a grave argument upon the testimony of witnesses whose names he has thought proper to keep to himself. Does not every body know, as well as the gentleman's nameless witnesses under the eaves of the palace, what is the truth on the subject? What is the question? It is this: In the appointment of public officers, "have characters been selected most conspicuous for their probity, virtue, capacity, and firmness, without regard to party," agreeably to the solemn pledge which had been given, and upon the faith of which the present Chief Magistrate was elected? Now, my friend knows perfectly well, what every one knows, that no individual has been selected to fill office but a devoted partisan; yet he goes into the purlieus of the palace to inquire for information. If the gentleman did not know, he ought to have consulted the public records; there he would have found who had been appointed home and foreign ministers, judges of courts, and to all the offices in the nation. But, when the gentleman leaves his Washington city testimony, and relies on his own knowledge, and takes a range throughout the land to find instances to prove that, in the selection of public officers, no regard has been had to party, he has found two signal cases in the Western country, both of which occurred in the county in which I live. He says that Colonel Coleby, H. Taylor, and James Pace, opposition men, were appointed postmasters by this disinterested and liberal administration. The gentleman has been very unfortunate in his allusion to the Post Office patronage in Clark county, as will appear in the sequel. I would not myself have voluntarily made any allusion to the subject; but as it has been introduced for the purpose of proving that, in the appointment of public officers, this administration has had "no regard to party or party spirit," the whole truth must come out. The post office at Colonel Taylor's is in the county where no Jackson man lives. The office yields no profit of consequence. Colonel Taylor did not take the office with any view of making money; he is a very obliging gentleman, and agreed to take the office merely with a view to accommodate his neighbors. The office at Pace's was in all respects similarly situated. These being the only cases in the whole Western country that the researches of my friend could find where opposition men had received appointments from this administration, could any thing prove more clearly how hard he was pressed, than to be compelled to refer to two such instances to prove impartiality? But even here the gentleman is mistaken. As he thought proper to bring up these two offices in a grave argument in Congress to prove that, in the appointment of officers, this administration had no respect to party, I addressed a note of inquiry to Mr. Kendall, and here is his answer: He says Colonel Taylor was appointed postmaster on the — day of —, 1826, three years before the commencement of General Jackson's first term.

[Here Mr. FRENCH rose to explain, and said that he had been led into the error by information which he had received in Clark county, where he was well acquainted; that he had not intentionally made the misstatement; but, upon inquiry of Mr. Kendall, he had found that Mr. Thomas Edminson had also been appointed to a post office, who was an opposition man; so that, although he was mistaken as to Colonel Taylor, yet he was right as to the number.]

Mr. ALLAN proceeded. Sir, I am very sure that the statement in regard to Colonel Taylor's appointment was made under a mistake; and I take this occasion, with great pleasure, to bear witness that my colleague is incapable of making an intentional misstatement on this or any other subject. Yet it appears to me, in fairness, the gentleman ought to have stated that Mr. Edminson and Mr. Pace lived in the same house, at different times, and had been appointed for the same office, and that there was no Jackson man at the place to appoint. I am informed by Mr. Kendall that this office was discontinued last fall, because no one would have it. The whole income of the office, for the year 1835, was $17. So that the only case that the diligent researches of my friend could find to prove that this administration had reduced to practice, in good faith, the advice which General Jackson gave to President Monroe, is the bestowal of a country post office, where no one lived but the postmaster, that was worth five dollars and sixty-one cents per annum! being 33 per cent. on $17. As to Colonel Taylor, the liberality was not in the appointment, but in the forbearance to turn him out; and this forbearance is owing to the fact that there is no one of the "party" at Colebyville to take the place of the present incumbent.

Now that the office at Pace's has been abandoned, my colleague must turn his admiration to the signal forbearance practised towards Colonel Taylor as the remaining monument left to illustrate the liberality of this administration, and to prove that "the Chief Magistrate of a great and powerful nation acts for the whole, and not for a part of the community."

The only post office in Clark county that was profitable when "the party" came into power was held by Mr. J. B. Duncan, a gentleman of the very first respectability, and perfectly well qualified; whose unoffending and amiable manners enabled him to discharge the duties of the office to the entire satisfaction of all parties. Mr. Duncan, during the late war, shouldered his rifle, and fought in the battles of his country. My colleague has known Mr. Duncan intimately for more than twenty years, and will not deny the statement I have made concerning him. He will go farther; he will agree that there is not a more worthy man in the county of Clark, nor one better qualified for the office, than Mr. Duncan. He will agree that there is not an officer in the United States who gave more universal satisfaction in the discharge of the duties of his office than did Mr. Duncan. But Mr. Duncan had committed the unpardonable sin of having voted against the President, and for this sin he was punished by removal from office, and a worthy young man placed in the office, as a reward for the partisan services of influential relatives.

Now, that the committee have the whole of the facts on the subject, they can judge how far the post office patronage in the county of Clark was used, regardless of party and party spirit.

All others, except my colleague, had prudently passed in silence the letter of the President to the Tennessee Legislature, but he has thought proper to reproduce that letter; where General Jackson states, in substance, that, if important appointments continue to devolve on members of Congress, corruption will become the order of the day. Since which time, as President, he has appointed such a large number of members of both Houses to the highest offices, as to draw between five and six hundred thousand dollars from the Treasury for their salaries. This inconsistency between profession and practice, being so glaring as to deter all other debaters from attempting to reconcile them, did not in the least stay the zeal of my colleague in his determination to defend the administration at all points. And to get out of the difficulty, he said:

"Suppose, Mr. Chairman, General Jackson, in that letter, had suggested to the Legislature of Tennessee an amendment to the constitution, by which the President of the United States should be deprived of having any voice in the passage of laws by Congress, by which the power that now makes it his duty to approve and sign bills passed by Congress before they have the force of laws should be taken away forever. Suppose, also, the General, after having given this opinion, had been elected President of the United States, and that he had refused to approve and sign bills passed by Congress, upon the ground that he had given to the Legislature of Tennessee the opinion that the President ought not to have such power. Sir, in the case supposed, the President would have been impeached and removed from office, if he had refused to approve and sign bills upon the ground stated, when, by the constitution, it was his sworn duty to do so; he would have deserved impeachment and removal from office. What, then, I ask, is the difference in principle between the case supposed and the case in the letter? The amendment suggested in the letter has never been made to the constitution."

Thus spoke my colleague; and if he really can see any similitude between the case supposed and the profession in the letter, I will not stop to reason with him, as it is not probable that another person can be found who will be able to discover the most remote resemblance.

The gentleman went on to say:

"By the constitution, members of Congress are eligible to executive appointments. The President is sworn 'to preserve, protect, and defend the constitution,' as it is, not as he would have it to be. If, then, the President had introduced in practice what would have been a virtual amendment to the constitution itself, he would have been guilty of the high crime of usurpation."

It is true the President cannot appoint any one who is ineligible; but I never heard before that eligibility created any obligation on the President to appoint members of Congress to office, and that his failure to do so would amount to the high crime of usurpation, for which he ought to be impeached and removed from office. But as my friend is in the secrets of the cabinet, and if this constitutional interpretation is entertained there, and the President drew so largely on both Houses of Congress and the Treasury under the terrors of impeachment, it will certainly justify him in the eyes of my colleague, and all others who understand the constitution as he understands it.

The gentleman contends that the President could not, with propriety, refuse to appoint members of Congress to office until the constitution was changed so as to render them ineligible! The President was of opinion that the practice of appointing members of Congress to high offices would destroy the purity and independence of the Legislature, and make corruption the order of the day. Now my friend contends that the President was bound to continue a practice attended with those consequences until he was prevented by a change of the constitution!

If every thing may with propriety be done to make corruption the order of the day that is not prohibited by the constitution, the administration has a broad field to move in. It is probably the first time under the sun that the introduction of corruption into the administration of the Government was justified on the ground that it was not prohibited by the constitution. The gentleman says the President was sworn to support the constitution; and as members of Congress were eligible to office under that instrument, it would have been a dangerous assumption of power on the part of the President to have excluded them. If every body is to have office who is eligible, we shall have a goodly number of them. But I suppose the gentleman confines his notion of eligibility to "his party." It was not at all unconstitutional to prescribe and render ineligible every man in and out of Congress in the United States who had not given in his adhesion at the footstool of power; but it would have been very unconstitutional for the President to have refused to appoint partisan members of Congress to office. If this be enforcing the constitution, the President has fully administered, he has marched platoons out of both Houses of Congress, as was once observed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CORWIN.] There is something, no doubt, very pleasant in this idea of administering the constitution to a member of Congress of the right faith who stands on the roll of promotion, for this kind of luck goes round so fast that it will not take it long to reach every one. And when it comes to the turn of my colleague, I have no doubt that he will think it more constitutional than ever.

The gentleman eulogizes the administration for the vast sums of money which it has expended in works of internal improvement since the year 1829. Sir, how will the people of Kentucky feel when they know that a member from that State rose upon this floor, and vaunted the praises of this administration for the profuse outpour of millions for works of internal improvement, of all sorts, in all parts of the Union except Kentucky—when they recollect that they were told, in the midst of this profusion, that the pitiful sum of $150,000 could not be spared for a Kentucky road until the national debt was paid?

It is amusing to hear a controversy in this House between two of "the party" upon the much-agitated question, "what are the principles of this administration?" From parts of the Union where internal improvements are unpopular, we hear gentlemen praising the administration for having subverted the whole system; while equal praise is bestowed from sections of the Union where such works are in favor, upon the orthodox opinions and lavish expenditures of the present administration in the advancement of the great cause of public improvements. I do not know which swelled the note of admiration to the highest key, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GARLAND,] because the President had overthrown, or my colleague, because he had upheld, internal improvements.

[Mr. GARLAND rose to explain, and said he did not intend to convey the idea that the President had entirely crushed internal improvements. He wished to be understood as saying the President had done much to overthrow such works, but that he had not gone the full length of the Virginia doctrine.]

Mr. ALLAN proceeded. Sir, the explanation does not affect the sense of what I was saying. The gentleman from Virginia exults that so much has been done to destroy, while the gentleman from Kentucky exults that so much has been done to build up, the system.

My colleague says that the vast sums which this administration has expended "on works of internal improvement are not local, but national, in their character." In the true spirit of non-committal, in which school, by the way, he is not a very young scholar, my colleague said he would not undertake to say whether the Maysville road and the Louisville canal were local or national improvements. Now, I regret to hear my friend say that the new roads in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Maine, &c., on which hundreds of thousands have been expended, were national, while he stands in a state of non-committal as to the nationality of a Kentucky road. I regret to hear the gentleman vindicating the national character of improvements which this administration has made at the mouths of creeks which he can with difficulty find on the maps, while he will not say whether the Louisville canal, along which half the commerce of the whole Union passes, is local or national. I can very well remember a time when the gentleman and his political friends in Kentucky thought the Maysville road a national improvement. When the news arrived in that State of the passage of the Maysville road bill through both Houses of Congress, the gentleman and his friends were filled with joy, and they exultingly proclaimed from the housetops that the new administration had already done more for Kentucky than ever had been done. And just in the flood-tide of their rejoicings came another mail, and brought the veto, which did not at all abate their joy; they faced about, and said the veto was certainly the greatest act that ever was performed in the tide of time, always excepting the battle of New Orleans.

On the subject of the extravagant expenditures of this administration the gentleman has had before him the tables in my speech for two months, and I am happy to find that he has not denied the accuracy of a single figure in them. I proved that the expenditure from the 4th of March, 1829, to the 4th of March, 1837, will exceed the expenditure for the preceding eight years by the sum of $45,116,634 47. Not being able to find any inaccuracy in my tables, he seeks to evade their force by making calculations for different periods of time. But, after all his calculations, he does not deny the increase of expenditure during this administration of over forty-five millions of dollars; which he has undertaken to excuse and defend, and to prove that an increase was unavoidable, from the growth of the country.

The gentleman has entirely changed over since the year 1828, when he was electioneering for the office of elector; he told the people that the expenses of the Federal Government were too high, and ought to be brought down to the scale of Jeffersonian economy. Now, in 1836, when the gentleman's party is in the receipt of the spoils, he tells the people that, so far from reducing, it is necessary that the increasing expenditure should keep pace with the growth of the country. It now appears that what he told them in 1828 was a mistake. When I was listening to the gentleman's discourses in 1828 upon economy and reform, I little thought of ever standing by his side in this hall, and seeing him the advocate of increasing the expenses of this Government in proportion to the increase of the population and resources of the nation. Did not the gentleman know in 1828 that the numbers and wealth of the nation would increase? Why did he not then tell the people that it would be necessary for General Jackson's administration to increase the public expenses in proportion to the growth of the nation? The case being altered, alters the case. "The party" was then seeking power, and to talk of reform and retrenchment was the way to get it. Now that they have power, the way to get spoils is to increase expenditure.

The gentleman, with great apparent satisfaction, produced the number of Indian treaties and the quantity of land purchased from them, as evidences of the diplomatic skill of this administration. There is nothing new in this: the business of buying land from the Indians has been carried on for a long time. But I agree that this administration has introduced several new practices, which I regret my friend did not tell of while he was on the subject; but as he has failed to do so, I will endeavor to supply what he has omitted. The treaties with the Indians for their lands were formerly made for the benefit of the country: now, much of the benefit is reserved as a means of patronage to reward partisans for political services. In almost all of the treaties with the Indians for cessions of their lands, large reservations are made to particular chiefs and headmen of the best parts of the territories ceded, in fee simple, with power to such chiefs and headmen to sell the same to such persons as the President or his agents shall agree may buy. No one can purchase against the consent of the President. So that the accusation of cheating the Indians out of these reservations is exclusive.

We have seen large portions of the public lands brought into conflict with the public liberty, by being, under the forms of treaties, drawn into the vortex of governmental patronage. We have also seen eleven millions of acres, the common property of all the States, distributed by partial legislation to six of them; while the pioneers of Kentucky, the founders of the great Western empire, who bore the winter's cold and the summer's heat, and stood firm for a score of years in the front of a hundred battles, are most unjustly deprived of any share in the public domain, which is the fruit of their victories.

The gentleman eulogized the administration, especially, for the new system of removing the Indians. This novelty being a total departure from the benevolent policy of Washington, and all of his successors, has to be tested by time and experience, before we can judge correctly of its wisdom. This administration has undertaken to move the numerous tribes to the same territory. There have already been removed 31,348 Indians, and 72,181 are yet to be removed, making in all 103,529. What will be the result of placing so many tribes near together, with their fierce passions roused to the highest point of resentment, from having been forced to leave the land and graves of their fathers, where, by their union and their wrongs, they can learn their strength, time will show.

In addition to the removed Indians, there are of the indigenous tribes, within striking distance of the frontier, 150,341; so that, altogether, there will be a body of 253,870. We are bound to take part in all the wars that may occur among these numerous hostile bands, or which may occur between any of them and Mexico; for we have agreed by treaty to protect and defend the removed Indians, and to prevent all the Indians within our borders from making war over the Mexican line. The fruit of this Indian-driving policy, so far, does not argue much good for the future. It has already cost us several millions of money, and produced three wars. The Black Hawk war cost $1,237,473; it is estimated that the Florida war will cost $5,000,000; and what the Creek war will cost, we cannot tell. We have this session appropriated $1,000,000 to enable General Gaines to keep peace on the frontier. We have been compelled to add two regiments of mounted dragoons to the regular army, and to pass a bill authorizing the President to raise a provisional army of 10,000 volunteers, and the commanding general has written for an increase of the regular army to 20,000 men. The new relations of the numerous tribes will, it is anticipated, produce a general Indian war. These are some of the fruits which have already ripened, by driving the Indians to despair. In fifty years, if this system does not cost a hundred millions of dollars and fifty thousand lives, we shall get off better than many anticipate. I hope for the best, and shall rejoice if all the good comes of it that its friends anticipate.

The gentleman brought forward, also, a great many foreign treaties, and the amount of indemnity secured thereby, with as much exultation as if the art of treaty-making was a very late discovery. If the honorable member had extended his diplomatic researches a little further back, and looked into the treaties with Spain, England, Denmark, and many others, he would have found a greater amount of indemnity secured to our citizens than that of which he boasts.

To prove that we are passing rapidly from a paper money currency to one of the precious metals, the gentleman has produced the amount of coinage at the mint during the different years it has been in operation. Now, sir, I wonder if my friend does, in sober seriousness, intend to convey the idea to the people that the coinage at the mint increases the amount of gold in the country, or adds a cent to the national wealth? Does he intend to give the administration credit for working the mines? This would be even worse than the credit claimed for the payment of the national debt. The amount of gold and the payment of the public debt depended on the same cause—the industry of the people. In place of introducing a metallic currency, this Government surrendered its constitutional control over the subject into the hands of the States; and the national circulating medium being thereby destroyed, the necessity was imposed on the States of supplying its place in the best manner they could. And now, when banks are springing up as fast as mushrooms, when paper money is overspreading the land beyond any former example, my colleague gets up here, in defence of “his party,” and holds up the tables of coinage, to show his constituents that a golden era is about to commence, and that paper money is near its end!

Sir, after the gentleman has informed himself of the present condition of the public money and the currency, I am astonished that he, in the character of a public sentinel, announces to the people that all is well. Does he not know that the fact has been announced by a distinguished leader in his party, in public debate, that if the land bill were to pass, and the deposit banks were called on to pay the public money, it would not only break the whole of them, but cause an explosion in the whole paper system of the United States?

The gentleman has admitted that the public money is under the control of no law; he cannot be ignorant that it is loaned out, without interest, to persons of whom he has no knowledge. He knows that the notes of the deposit banks will not circulate a day's journey from their vaults. He knows that there is a general depreciation; that there are brokers' shops in every town and village; that a traveller across the Union has to submit to have his money shaved every day's ride. He knows that the broker will levy a heavy tax on the labor of the country while this miserable condition of the currency lasts. At this very time the notes of the New York banks are shaved in this city, and the notes issued here undergo the same operation there. In many places the people are compelled to pay five and six per cent. to procure notes on the United States Bank.

In this condition of things, when the laboring man is continually subject to be robbed of his labor, when the public money is placed in banks where it is admitted they will break if they are called on to pay, I repeat that I am astonished that the gentleman's zeal in defence of his party should prevent him from apprizing his constituents of the impending danger.

The combined influence of our free institutions, the industry and enterprise of the people, the introduction of laboring machinery, the establishment of manufactories, modern roads, and steam power, and the high price of our products in Europe, have enabled this young gigantic nation to make such advances to wealth, and power, and prosperity, as to astonish the world. The great result of the combination of all these causes the gentleman, in the prevailing spirit of man-worship, ascribes to “the Government,” and produces the tables of exports and imports, to show the wonders which he has done for the country. The people are nothing—our ruler is every thing. It is him who makes gold plenty, who pays off the national debt, who raises our exports and imports, and regulates the amount of the cotton crop in the South. The gentleman seems perfectly willing to strip from the people the trophies of their industry, enterprise, and genius, and place them upon the standard of the chieftain under whom it is “a sufficient glory to serve.”

The gentleman admits that the public money is now under the control of no law whatever, and has arraigned the Senate and the minority of this House for it. Has the gentleman forgotten who it was that took the public money out of the custody of the law? But he imputes fault to the Senate and the minority of this House for not passing a new law to reclaim the public treasure. If the gentleman had looked through this subject, it is the very last one that he would have alluded to. On the 24th of June, 1834, a bill passed this House to regulate the deposit of the public money in certain State banks, which the minority of this House generally voted against, and which the Senate laid on the table. Now, as the honorable member thought proper to arraign others for not passing this bill, he ought to have given his opinion either for or against it. I am very sure he will never venture to say that bill ought to have passed, for it contains some of the most objectionable provisions of any bill that was ever before Congress. But why did not the gentleman tell all, while he was on the subject? At the same session the Senate passed a bill on the same subject, which this House did not act on. And, further, at the last session a bill was again introduced into this House, and so soon as the minority offered some salutary amendments, which the majority did not like, and which they did not choose to take the responsibility of voting against, they refused to act further on the subject. So that the majority of this House not only refused to pass the bill sent here by the Senate in 1834, but refused to act on the bill of the last session, which they had originated themselves. This session has nearly passed away, and the majority has voted down repeated motions of the minority to take up the subject. So that the same party that took the money out of the custody of the law has refused to make a new law to take it out of the hands of those who hold it against all law.

But the gentleman says that this administration has showered blessings and benefits upon Kentucky in rich profusion. When he came to this part of his speech, I listened with all anxiety to hear what kind of commodities the blessings consisted of which had been bestowed by this administration upon Kentucky, as I never had heard of any before. My friend, with all imaginable gravity, without moving a single muscle of his face in sympathy with the general smile that went round the hall upon the occasion, announced that this administration had appointed to office Messrs. Amos Kendall, William T. Barry, Thomas P. Moore, Robert B. McAfee, and a long list of other Kentuckians! These are the blessings. A few men have got high offices and large sums of money. How this verifies the French saying—“that party excitement is the madness of the many for the benefit of the few.” Here are the benefits which the people of Kentucky have derived from all the party conflicts, from all the divisions and heart-burnings among them, which have occurred in the last eight years. We were formerly taught that Government was instituted for the advantage of the people. But my friend eulogizes the Government for the benefits which it has bestowed on public officers. I complain that the Government will not expend a fair proportion of the public revenue to assist the people of Kentucky to make improvements; that the Government will not divide the money which is now idle in the Treasury for the benefit of the great body of the working men of Kentucky who have no office, and who desire no office; and my friend says that my complaints on these subjects assail "his party," and he answers me, as a full set-off to all the injury done to the people by keeping them out of their just rights, that a large share of the spoils have been divided among the leading partisans in Kentucky. Does the gentleman suppose that Kentucky will be willing to compromise principle, and sell the rights of the people to buy offices for leading men? My friend has truly explained the principle of party action, the plain English of which is, the art of getting and keeping money and office; and he gives a fair account of the loaves and fishes which have fallen to the share of political aspirants in Kentucky from the table of this administration, while he has not been able to find a crumb that has fallen to the lot of the people. In taking a review of the blessings of this bountiful administration, which have flowed in such copious streams into the pockets of the office-holders, the gentleman rebukes me for complaining that the expenses of the Government have swelled up to such a height of extravagance.

Sir, I will not go for the office-holders; I will stand by the laboring men of the nation, who are the bone and sinew of the land, whose industry is the source of your national wealth and prosperity, and to protect which ought to be the first care of every patriot and statesman.

When the general appropriation bill for the supply of the army of public officers with their large salaries was before the House, amounting to between two and three millions of dollars, my friend from Virginia [Mr. MERCER] proposed an amendment to appropriate the surplus revenue for the use of the people. My colleague voted for the previous question, and cut off this amendment for the benefit of the people, because, he said, if the appropriation for the people was placed in the bill that contained the appropriations for the officers, and the bill should be vetoed, it would cause an interregnum in the Government. Now, as the money is the main object, my friend is perhaps right in supposing that an interregnum would occur if the pay were stopped; therefore my friend thought it best not to put the spoils of the officers in the same bill with the appropriation for the people, lest all might fall together. This was the very reason why I desired to see both provisions in the same bill. I have in the last seven years seen so many excesses committed on the rights of the people and the ancient institutions of the country, by a fat, s'all-fed Government, that I would be willing to starve it until I could count its ribs, and until it consented to give up the public money which it holds contrary to law, and divide the same among the States.

I will here leave my colleague, and we shall part with very different feelings. While he is rejoicing at the flush condition of the pockets of the political leaders of his party in Kentucky, I am left in regret, because his "party" has defeated the passage of every law for the benefit of the people of Kentucky. I leave him, sheltered under the ægis of power, secure as one of its defenders, and will proceed myself in its face, sure of its vengeance, to point out its abuses, and arraying its usurpations before the country. In this I occupy my old position. Being indebted to the people for the political honors which they have conferred upon me in the last twenty-five years—having been so long sustained by their firmness and intelligence against all the assaults of power, against all the detraction of enemies, I feel bound by the highest sense of duty, and the deepest feelings of gratitude, to continue, at every personal hazard, to defend their constitutional rights. I have never sought office under executive power, State or national; I am under no obligation and owe no allegiance to any earthly authority but that of the people.

In supporting the proposition to reduce the expenses of the Government, I shall urge the considerations which connect it with power and patronage more than those which relate to economy. I would rather commence the work of cutting down executive power by rendering members of Congress ineligible to executive appointments, by abridging the veto power and the power of removal, and by disconnecting the Executive, and the Treasury, and the public press; but, as the opportunity of voting on these propositions is now denied me, I will agitate the question of the curtailment of power in an effort to reduce expenditure.

I shall proceed to show how retrenchment will reduce power, and in what manner it will have a tendency to change the Government back from a Government of men to a Government of laws. Your army of public officers draw such enormous sums from the Treasury that they would be able at any time of emergency, by devoting fifteen or twenty per cent. on the amount of their salaries, to raise a fund sufficiently large to enable them to distribute thousands to carry elections. The reduction of these exorbitant salaries would certainly to that extent impair the power of the General Government, which is thus brought into conflict with the freedom of the elective franchise. It is high time to admonish these officers, by reducing their pay, to leave elections to the people, and stay in their offices and attend to their duties. The members of Congress, when they see the general tendency to extravagance, and the evil effects of it, ought to be willing to commence with themselves, and set the example, by reducing their own compensation. In this way they will afford the most convincing proof of their desire of carrying the Government back to republican simplicity and frugality. In showing a willingness to share the fate of others, they can, with a greater probability of success, urge a general system of retrenchment and reform in the public expenses. If we pass the amendment which I have offered, it will reduce the expenses of the Government more than a million of dollars annually; and if we are to have as many wars as the gentleman at the head of the Committee of Ways and Means has discoursed about, they will furnish additional reasons for saving money. I hope all the officers of the Federal Government, from the President down, will be willing to give up a part of their salaries to pay the poor soldiers for fighting our battles.

But there is still another more important view of the subject. The salaries of the federal officers are so far above those paid by the States, that it will not be possible for the State Governments to maintain their proper influence and weight in the confederacy. This central magnificent power rises up with honors and emoluments that so far overshadow the States that they are sunk into provincial obscurity. This central agency contains the high sources of attraction. Hence the thronging thousands that continually crowd the streets of this capital, to solicit power and money at the President's palace. Here is one great source of the President's dangerous power—the vast multitude over whose minds and freedom of thought he exercises control; for absolute submission to all the requirements of party is known to be the price of success.

To cure these evils, to restore and build up the power of the States, to revive the independence of thought and action, let us cut down federal honors and federal salaries to the size of those of the States; let us make official employments about as profitable as the common pursuits of life, then men will not be tempted to quit the service of the States, and the independence and freedom of private stations, and become courtiers at the footstool of federal power.

Sir, we have raised a portion of our public officers too far above the people. They have been elevated to a point of exaltation where human vanity becomes giddy, and forgetful of the rightful source of power. Our head men, upon their six thousand dollars per annum, in their eagerness to adopt the manners of European aristocracy, have forgotten the plain republican style of living of American citizens. The President and five of his home ministers, receive as much as the Governors of the twenty-four States. The twenty-four Governors preside over the concerns of fifteen millions of people, their duties extending to all the complicated relations of life, while the duty of this central agency is restricted to general superintendence. Yet the amount of compensation seems to be increased in proportion as the labor is less. Five home and one foreign ministers receive more than the chief justices of the twenty-four States; yet the labor of these six ministers is but a drop in the ocean in comparison to the duties performed by the twenty-four judges. The President alone receives as much as the Governors of sixteen of the States.

It appears from the secret history of the debates in the Federal Convention, that Doctor Franklin was of opinion "that the Executive should receive no salary, stipend, or emolument, for the devotion of his time to the public service, but that his expenses should be paid." The great experience and sagacity of Franklin enabled him to foresee what has already come to pass, that, if a princely support was provided for the President, an example would be set in his style of living which would be followed by all subordinate officers, until extravagance and degeneracy would ruin the public service. President Washington seems to have entertained the same views; he refused to receive any compensation for his services above his expenses; and his plain republican style of living is well described in the memoirs of the celebrated Chateaubriand, who visited Washington in 1791. He says: "A little house of the English construction, resembling the houses in its neighborhood, was the palace of the President of the United States: no guards, no valets. I knocked; the servant girl opened the door," &c. How delightful and refreshing it is to turn from the scenes around us, to contemplate the profound forecast and philosophical views of Franklin, and the citizen-like simplicity of the example left us by Washington! How striking is the contrast! Now, a splendid palace towers in regal magnificence far above many of those inhabited by the monarchs of Europe; and the President's hospitality is as sumptuous as the pampered epicures who doze away a worthless existence at the courts of Asiatic despots could wish. This palace, according to the notorious east-room letter, was, in the administration of Mr. Adams, furnished in such splendid style as to shock the sensibility of a republican. Yet this reforming administration, not satisfied with the costly decorations which were then the theme of democratic denunciation, has expended the unexampled sum of forty-five thousand dollars in the purchase of new furniture, which throws all that preceded it far into the shade. In addition to this, the President receives an annual salary of twenty-five thousand dollars a year. In attempting to make a President, we have made a monarch in fact.

In all the forms of Government that have ever been tried, the executive power has been found too strong, and, in the long run, has swallowed up all other powers. It is taking the direction here which was anticipated by many at the adoption of the constitution; and now, in the bitterness of their disappointment, the most ardent of the original friends of a strong Executive see fast accomplishing the predictions of Patrick Henry, and many other sages of his day. Among all the votaries of liberty, it is an uncontested maxim that the superstructure of free Government rests upon the division of its powers into three independent distinct departments. Mr. Jefferson's definition of despotism is the union of all the powers of Government in the same hands. Yet history furnishes no example in any free Government where the executive power has made such advances of usurpation upon the other departments in so short a time as in the United States.

A brief contrast of the powers claimed and exercised by the Executive at the commencement of the Government, and now, will make this manifest. At first he claimed the power to remove public officers for misconduct; now he removes them for a free exercise of the right of suffrage. At the commencement of the Government it was held to be a fundamental principle that the purse and the sword should be kept separate; now they are in the same hands. For forty years Congress exercised the right of conducting the operations of the Treasury through bank agency; but now, while the President denies to Congress the right to establish a national bank, he appoints himself an executive bank, composed of an association of State banks, to conduct the fiscal affairs of the Government; so that the long-contested legislative power to establish bank agency for the Treasury has practically passed into the hands of the Executive, and he has established the most dangerous money monopoly in the world. Ever since the adoption of the constitution, it was held that Congress possessed the money power, and had authority to regulate the currency and fix the standard of value, until the President seized the public money, and issued decrees through the Treasury to regulate the currency. The power that regulates the currency is a power over the commerce, agriculture, and manufactures, of the country. The power that can raise or depress the currency can tax, without limit, the labor of the people. It is customary in all the States to hold annual examinations into the condition of their treasuries. It has been the custom for committees of Congress to examine the national Treasury; but now this new executive bank, this many-headed monster, shrinks with alarm from all scrutiny; and such is already its influence that every proposition to examine its concerns has been voted down. This House will not trust its own eyes to open the doors and look at the actings and doings in this great political gambling shop. It is now plain that Congress will adjourn and leave its deeds shrouded in the darkness of midnight.

The veto, as formerly understood, was a negative power given to the President to enable him to defend his department from encroachment. Now, it has become the active principle of legislation. The President takes the responsibility, seizes the public money, appoints a national bank agency for the Treasury, and issues decrees to regulate the currency, and continues to exercise these high sovereign functions of legislation until two thirds of Congress shall be found (which will never be the case while he can appoint the members to office) to take these powers out of his hands. It is thus, by the exercise of the veto, that the authority of Congress has become powerless, and the Executive has acquired dominion over the property, the labor, and the commerce, of the United States, by assuming the power over the Treasury and the currency.

In tracing the advances of executive power, nothing is more striking than the dominion which it has acquired over the public press. The press is admitted to be the most formidable political engine of modern times. During the high and palmy days of true principles, the press was the faithful channel of truth—the palladium of liberty. The press then fought the battles of the constitution, because it was paid by the community, who have not, and who do not desire, office. Now we have a press in the service of the Government, organized and regulated by disciplined ambition, and gorged and fattened out of the public crib. There are at this time in the pay of the Government more than one hundred editors of newspapers scattered throughout the United States. There will be paid to one press at the seat of Government near one hundred thousand dollars per annum out of the public Treasury.

Fortification Bill.

There is not in Russia or Turkey a press under more despotic control. If it were to insinuate that its master was not infallible, or refuse to affirm that the most glaring abuses of power were right, or deny the guilt of every public defaulter, even if the proof were as clear as the mid-day sun—if it should suggest a doubt as to the election of the chosen successor—it would not only lose the bread upon which it is fed out of the public granary, but would be overwhelmed by party vengeance. So completely is the independence of the press bought up, that we would as soon look to see the waters of the Potomac roll back to their sources, as to see this press tell the plain truth to the people. It is a part of the daily duty for which this press is paid, to misrepresent and traduce every member of Congress who opposes the encroachments of executive power. Such a press undertakes not only to judge of the conduct of the people's representatives here, but to give evidence to the people against them. Such a witness, paid such a sum for his evidence, would not, in a court of justice, in a contest between two citizens for one dollar, receive credit from any honest judge or juror. It is mainly through this pensioned engine that the power of the Federal Government is brought into conflict with the freedom of elections. It is paid out of the people's money to uphold and advocate every candidate for office who is known to be on the side of power, and to defame and vilify every one who is on the side of the country. Thousands of honest people have been deceived by this press, not knowing it was paid for every word that it uttered; and, under this deception, they have cast many faithful patriots from their service.

The important clause in the constitution which confers upon the President the right to appoint public officers, "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," was scrupulously adhered to in the days of Washington; but of late we have seen persons appointed to office upon the responsibility of the Executive, after their rejection by the Senate. We have seen the most important offices kept vacant for years, to the detriment of the public interest, because the persons first nominated were not confirmed. We have seen an effort made to have the journal of the Senate destroyed, which recorded, for the benefit of the present generation, and for the benefit of posterity, a signal instance of executive usurpation. Of all the wounds which have been made on the guards of liberty, none is more alarming than that which has been inflicted on the Senate. The hue and cry has been raised against that body, and rung along all the lines of patronage, because it made a stand against the encroachments which were demolishing its constitutional rights. We have seen executive power exerted with lamentable success in changing this constitutional check into an effective auxiliary.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] remarked that none of our early writers on the dangers of executive power foresaw that the Post Office Department would become the most extensive and dangerous means of patronage; neither did they anticipate that the public money would be used to subsidize the press, which exercises more influence on public opinion than even the Post Office with its thirty thousand dependants and agents scattered throughout the United States; but both taken together make the most formidable and dangerous political engine that exists in the world.

From this rapid sketch of the present outline of executive power, it is evident that there is but one man in the republic. Every other office, every other interest, is lost in the shoreless ocean of his power. Every officer, State or national, from the highest down to the lowest, is elected in reference to his opposition or adherence to the President or the candidate for the presidency. This is not wonderful, because the President does, in fact, hold in his hand the executive and legislative power of the country. The expanded dimensions of executive power leave no room for liberty to breathe in. The office is too high, too attractive, for human weakness. The temptation to arrive at it is too great for human virtue. In the contests for this office, the country will be sacrificed, and liberty overthrown. Behold the formidable array of power that is now brought to bear on the presidential election: the whole patronage of the Federal Government; the forty thousand public officers; the machinery of the Post Office Department; a pensioned press; the numerous army among whom the public money is loaned out!

Every aged man can remember when the executive power was confined within the limits of the constitution, that the presidential elections were quiet, orderly, and fair; but now the whole country is convulsed in the scramble which is to divide the offices and money among those who succeed in placing their chief in possession of more power than is exercised by any of the modern Kings in the south of Europe. If the morals of the people were made of adamant, they would in time be worn away by the perpetual stream of corruption, in which unchastened ambition will ever attempt to swim to this highest prize of distinction—the presidential office. The experience of all other free nations has proven that elections are the point in the fortress of liberty where usurpation and corruption make their first attack. The arts of political aspirants, who were willing to sell their souls and betray their country to satiate unholy ambition, have caused elections every where to result in corruption.

I will bring forward a few illustrations from Roman history. In the pure days of the republic, the Roman magistrates were fairly elected by the qualified voters: men of the highest talents, the most approved experience and sterling integrity, were called into the public service. Such public servants conducted Rome to the highest elevation of power and glory that has ever been reached by any nation. But at last the destroyer came, and breathed the breath of corruption on elections. I will read some passages from Adams's Roman Antiquities. Under the head of candidates for office, the historian says:

"On the market-days they (the candidates) came into the assembly of the people and took their station on rising ground, whence they might be seen by all. * * When they went down to the Campus Martius at certain times, they were attended by their friends and dependants. * * They had persons likewise to divide money among the people. * * * There were also persons to bargain with the people for their votes, * * and others in whose hands the money promised was deposited. Cæsar pillaged the wealth of the provinces to spend it among the citizens of Rome, and gave his rapine an air of generosity."

Could an actual description convey a more distinct idea of what is passing here before our eyes than is to be found in the above extracts from Roman history?

I will read a passage from Gibbon, to illustrate the progress of corruption in Roman elections:

"The prætorian bands maintained that the mixed multitude that thronged the streets of Rome were not the real people; that they were alike destitute of spirit and property."

"That the defenders of the States, trained to the exercise of arms and virtue, were the genuine representatives of the people, and best entitled to elect the military chief of the republic."

And after they had murdered the Emperor Pertinax, "they ran out upon the ramparts, and with a loud voice proclaimed that the Roman world was to be disposed of to the best bidder, at public auction."

The candidates for the imperial power at the foot of the ramparts carried on the contest.

"Sulpicianus promised a donative of five thousand drachms (above £160) to each soldier. Didius Julianus, eager for the prize, rose at once to the sum of six thousand two hundred and fifty drachms, or upwards of £200. The gates of the camp were instantly thrown open to the purchaser, and he was declared Emperor. They placed their new sovereign, whom they served and despised, in the centre of their ranks, surrounded him on every side with their shields, and conducted him in close order of battle to the Senate house, which, after he had filled with armed soldiers, the new Emperor expatiated on the freedom of his election."

Such is the result of Roman elections. Such the manner in which executive patronage was brought into conflict with the freedom of elections in the most renowned nation of antiquity. In our own country we have seen the office-holders attempting to dispose of the presidency, who have no better claims to speak in the name of the people than had the Roman cohorts. In place of bidding £200 to each voter, we have seen the revenues and offices of the country bid for the presidential office, to be divided out as lawful spoil among those who would bring the greatest number of votes to the polls. Our elections are taking the direction they did in Rome, and will end in the same way if we do not reduce the power of the President, and thereby take away the temptation to betray and corrupt the country to get the office. No matter what the form or the name may be, the very instant that any Government is organized, two distinct interests in society are formed—the interest of the rulers, on the one hand, and the interest of the people on the other. It is the interest of those among whom the honors and the revenues are divided to form combinations and a "party," to keep in their hands these honors and revenues, and to transmit them to their relatives and friends. It is the interest of the great body of the people to have a cheap and a pure Government, and that it should be administered by able and pure men. It is the interest of the office-holders to have an extravagant Government, because they reap the benefit of extravagance. And it is the interest of the head rulers, in place of having able, honest men in office, to have such as will agree to be "mere instruments."

The history of nations is nothing but a narrative of the conflicts between these two separate interests of rulers and people. On the one side there is union, discipline, art, and intrigue; on the other, honesty, unsuspecting, confiding confidence. The result every where has been the triumph of the office-holders; and, in the end, in all other nations, they have made themselves the people's masters, and become a separate hereditary order.

The long-contested question, and which is committed to the Americans for final decision, is, whether the people can maintain their free Government against the perpetual war that will be waged upon it by their own officers? I call upon the people to behold the formidable array of power with which they have to contend. Forty thousand public officers—a pensioned press—thirty-five deposit banks—a subservient Post Office—the multitude among whom the public money is loaned out—all combined to keep the people out of their money, and to control the Government, constitute a force more terrible than an open army with banners; because it advances secretly through byways, through the vaults of banks; it crawls through all the channels of corruption; and while all appears fair on the surface, while the people, active in industry and enterprise, are moving rapidly on to wealth and apparent prosperity, the subtle poison of despotism is infecting the vitals of the body politic.

In the contemplation of our public affairs, there is no aspect of them to be more regretted than the selfish personal character which the struggles for the presidential office have communicated to party. Our early parties were formed upon a difference of principle, each contending for the country, for the whole country, for the security of liberty, for the preservation of the constitution. Ambition was then a noble and elevated principle, which identified its success and elevation with the success and elevation of the republic. The party now is not distinguished by the profession or the practice of any known system of principles. The art of getting and keeping money and office, and transmitting them to friends, is the principle of action. No matter what are the principles of an individual, if he will labor in the vocation of office-getting and money-getting, he is taken into full fellowship and communion with the party. Our early patriots and statesmen rose to eminence by the possession and exercise of talents, experience, and virtue—by eminent services rendered to the country. Now, love of country is changed to devotion to men: man-worship is found to be a more ready road to success than devotion to the country.

The only avenue now open to honorable distinction is submission to power. This principle of party action, upon which success now depends, is enforced upon the observance of all the members of the party, by both the precept and example of the person who now holds the second rank in the Government, and is aiming at the first. He prides himself upon, and in the spirit of exaltation, proclaims, that "To have served under such a chief, at such a time, and to have won his confidence and esteem, is a sufficient glory; and of that, thank God, my enemies cannot deprive me."

The annals of the nineteenth century do not furnish an example, in the despotisms of Asia, of such an instance of the worship of one man by another. And this flattery was successful in winning for him the presidency; for, if that individual succeed, no one will doubt that he will owe his success to the favor of the exalted personage under whom it was a sufficient glory to serve. The glory is not in having served his country, but in having served under a chief. The glory is not derived from services rendered Rome, but from the honor of having served under Cæsar. Here we have, in bold relief, the principle and example of the leader of the party. All aspirants will take the hint from this example of success, and must make their way to office and money by the same means. Under this system all high and honorable ambition must perish; all hope of rising to eminence, by the possession of eminent qualifications, will expire; and servile adulation and man-worship will become the order of the day. Federal power, as it now exists, is built upon this compact; all subordinates are to sustain it in all of its courses, right or wrong; and, in return, it is to throw the ægis of its protection over each member of the party, no odds what may be his official acts of omission or commission. If the spirit of the times will tolerate and justify such an example in a candidate for the first office, it will of course be followed by every one who expects to reach the throne by the aid of governmental patronage.

We have already come to the point where every candid man will admit that the next presidential election, so far as one of the candidates is concerned, depends on the wish of the present Chief Magistrate. Did any American expect to live to see such a wonder? Did any one imagine that an American President would so soon acquire the power to appoint his successor? Is it in the constitution of nature that man must every where seek a master, and crouch to power? Must the right of suffrage every where become a mere shadow, and the voter a mere machine? Are nations every where destined to become estates in the hands of rulers, to be transferred by hereditary descent as property from father to son?

The powerful phalanx of public officers, printers, and money-borrowers, enlisted in this presidential canvass, are in some respects in the same condition that Bonaparte's army was previous to his election as Emperor of France. Public proclamation was then made that every soldier might freely vote according to his wish; but at the same time a secret order was issued that every one who did not vote for the Emperor should be shot. Here it is said the public officers and the borrowers of the public money and the printers are free. But it is well understood that every one who does not vote and get others to vote for the already appointed successor shall, not be shot, but, if an officer, be cashiered and turned out; and, if a money-borrower, must pay up. Executive power must be reduced. The confederacy that has the public money, and is fattening upon the labor of the people, must be compelled to disgorge their ill-gotten spoils. My observation here for the last five years has convinced me that a republican Government cannot be preserved unless it can be made a cheap Government. Liberty and frugality have never been and never will be long separated. Extravagance naturally leads to corruption, and corruption to despotism.

Sir, the adoption of the amendment which I have offered to this bill, by which the expenses of the Government would be reduced more than a million of dollars annually, would be attended with the most salutary consequences. While it would purify the Government, and reduce the power and patronage of the Executive, it would rebuke the public officers for intermeddling with elections, and bring them to a proper sense of their dependence on the people. It would revive the power and influence of the States, check the spirit of federal usurpation, and cut off the temptation that men are now under of selling their freedom of thought for office and large sums of money. It would give the Government a direction back to the republican simplicity of the days of Washington and Franklin. It would teach power to tremble in its strongholds, and re-establish the ascendancy of public opinion.

Being solemnly and deeply convinced that extensive abuses exist in the administration of the Government—that power is advancing with the rapid strides of usurpation upon the free institutions of our country—that the precious heritage of our freedom is in danger; believing that the only remedy for these evils is to be found in the public reason—I have appealed to that reason, and call upon my countrymen to rally in defence of that liberty which they hold at the price of the blood of their fathers.

When Mr. ALLAN sat down,

Mr. CARTER, of Tennessee, rose and said:

That it was not originally his intention to have said a word on the subject of the bill under consideration. But the recent course of the House on the subject of another bill now upon the table, the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States of the confederacy, according to their respective population, in which his constituents, and the country generally, in his conception, were deeply and vitally interested, warned him that this was probably the only opportunity that would be afforded; during the present session, of discussing the merits of that proposition—which he proposed to do, in connexion with the bill before the committee.

Mr. C. said he should be recreant to his duty, and unfaithful to those he had the honor to represent upon this floor, were he not to ask the indulgence of the committee whilst he offered a few remarks upon these interesting subjects—subjects in which the whole country felt such an abiding and lively interest. He said he labored under no difficulty in determining what was his duty to the country, and the course he ought and should pursue in relation to the bill now under consideration, and in relation to the appropriations generally designed really for the permanent defences of the nation. It required no argument to convince his mind that judiciously located fortifications were necessary for the safety and welfare of the country, and he conceived it to be the duty of Congress to make ample and liberal appropriations for their accomplishment, not only in the erection of them, but in arming them, and making all necessary equipments to meet any emergency that might occur. He said he would go as far as he that went farthest in the expenditure of the public money upon proper and useful fortifications, wherever the interest and safety of the country required their erection, or demanded this sort of defences. No man would more readily and cheerfully vote ample and sufficient appropriations than himself. But, said Mr. C., the defences contemplated by the provisions of the bill under discussion, and other schemes of the same character now before Congress, were not, in his judgment, the kind that seemed to guaranty to the country the most efficient and formidable defence, nor were they the most useful or economical. He said he had no doubt it was right and proper that fortifications should be established at the principal sea-ports, for their protection against the assaults of an enemy, and for the protection of commerce—at the naval depots and the navy yards, for the security of public property. But the idea of fortifying the whole maritime frontier, from Maine to Louisiana, a distance of between three and four thousand miles, by an almost unbroken chain of forts and fortifications, each of which must cost several millions of dollars, was preposterous and absurd. He said to do this was impracticable, and to attempt it would be impolitic, unwise; and, if commenced and prosecuted to any considerable extent, would produce the most disastrous consequences to the country. It would, in the first place, very uselessly involve the Government in an enormous public debt, and, what would be worse than all, it would rivet upon the country, in time of peace, a large standing army, alone for the safe keeping and preservation of these forts and the necessary attached ordnance, to be supported and sustained by a very heavy charge to the community, and to the prejudice of the agricultural, manufacturing, and all the better interests of the country. He said, let gentlemen involve the Government in these wild and visionary schemes of public defences, proposed by the dominant party in this House, through the chairman of the Military Committee, [R. M. JOHNSON,] an aspirant to office, connected with the profligate and ridiculous propositions upon the same subject in the Senate, and you will present to the American people a system of military establishments of the most alarming and dangerous character, and such as will justly draw down upon the authors of the policy the indignation and rebuke of the good people of this country, whose liberties will be endangered by it, and who must be taxed beyond all endurance for its support.

He said he had, with great mortification, seen encroachment after encroachment upon the rights and liberties of the people, by the aid and influence of party, but he had not expected to see the day arrive, when those who claimed to be exclusively the republicans of the day adopt a favorite principle of John Adams the elder, the father of the federal party, by an attempt to change the form of our Government, to sap the very foundation of liberty, by riveting upon the nation a large standing army in time of profound peace, with all its dangerous and demoralizing influences. The American people, sir, will revolt at the very idea; they will not, they cannot, submit to it; they cannot be thus imposed on by party influences and party considerations; there is too much good sense and spirit in the country to be thus tricked and defrauded, even under the pretext of "public defenses," as the party choose to term them, and behind which name they seek refuge when assailed for an attempt to waste and squander the public money. Sir, when this profligate measure just referred to was introduced in the Senate, (by Mr. BEXTON, the leader of the Van Buren party in that body,) proposing to appropriate the whole surplus, which would, in that case, have amounted to at least fifty-five or sixty millions of dollars, it was represented by the friends of Mr. Van Buren as an administration measure, one approved by General Jackson himself, and heavy denunciations were about to be pronounced on all who would dare to stand in opposition to its adoption, as enemies to the present administration and to the country. But, sir, when the light appeared, when the true developments were made of the opinions of the War Department, endorsed by the President himself, the delusion vanished, and those who, from a consciousness of duty, principle, and the good of the country, were bound to oppose this wanton waste, were saved from the denunciation of the party, as enemies to the administration and the country. Sir, the President and Secretary of War both, in their communications to this House, disapproved of this visionary and wild scheme; therefore we are to consider it the policy of Mr. Van Buren, and not that of General Jackson, because the latter disavowed it. It was introduced by the immediate friends of the Vice President, (Mr. Van Buren,) and was receiving the support and approbation of the whole party, until General Jackson signified his disapprobation.

Whilst upon this part of the subject, (said Mr. C.) he hoped he would not be considered as trespassing too far upon the time of the committee, by referring more specifically to the fortifications and defences of the country. It is proposed, sir, for the protection and the defence of the seaboard frontier, in extent between three and four thousand miles, the erection and armament of two hundred and thirty-two forts. These works have already cost the Government large sums, and, when completed, will have cost about forty millions of dollars, according to the estimates. Four of them have been completed, and found to have cost four millions and seventy-three thousand dollars. One hundred and ten of the others are now under construction, and have already cost four millions one hundred and fifteen thousand dollars. The Secretary of War says, in his report, that it will require fourteen millions three hundred and, perhaps, forty or fifty thousand dollars more to finish them; making, in all, about nineteen millions of dollars that have been expended, and yet required, for the completion of the last-mentioned fortifications; and still there remained one hundred and eleven forts, and, he believed, fifty or fifty-three steam batteries, yet to be commenced, the cost of which, by the estimate of the same Department, is to be about seventeen millions more, making a total of forty millions of dollars, part finished, as before stated, another part under way, and the balance yet to be commenced. And, Mr. Chairman, all past experience on the subject of estimates for public works, made by any of the Departments, shows those estimates to be very far short of the real costs of public works, and that they are not to be relied on. And, sir, you must invariably, upon an extensive work, double the estimate, to cover costs. Thus, instead of these forts and steam batteries being built with forty millions of dollars, as per estimates, when finished, they will more likely be found to have cost eighty or a hundred millions, in addition to the sums already expended.

Again, sir, when you shall have gone thus far, you are not done with the expenses attendant upon these works. The Secretary requires thirty millions more, to arm them with guns and put them in a state of defence. And then comes another great calamity; they must be furnished with soldiers, to garrison and preserve them from damage, at the cost of two or three millions of dollars more per annum. And, in time of war, to garrison these fortifications properly for defence, the same Department tells you will cost thirty millions of dollars each year. And still, sir, our Military Committee now proposes, and urges vehemently, that nineteen new and heretofore unthought-of forts should be added to the list, that will be an additional cost of a hundred millions of dollars; and then another addition to the standing army. Sir, I should think this was an unfortunate recommendation of the candidate for the vice presidency—to show so much anxiety to expend two or three hundred millions, in one string of country, in addition to the four hundred and twenty millions collected by the Government of the people, and poured out lavishly in the same favored region since the year 1815, a space of twenty years, almost entirely to the exclusion of the South and Southwest.

Where is our wonted confidence in the militia of our country? Why can we not now trust citizens to be soldiers? Why can we not rely upon that spirit, and upon those citizens, which sustained our fathers in their revolutionary struggle and secured our independence? What then constituted the strength of our country?

Was it,

"High-raised battlement, or labored mound, Thick wall or moated gate?"

Was it,

"City proud, with spires and turrets crown'd;
Bays, and broad-arm'd ports,
Where, laughing at the storms, rich navies rode?"

Was it,

"Starred and spangled court,
Where low-brow'd baseness wafts perfume to pride?"

No, sir! no!

"But men, high-minded men,
Men who their duties knew,
Who knew their rights, and, knowing, dare maintain."

These at that day constituted the State, its shield, its strength, its soul; but are now to be set aside, and "high-raised battlements and labored mounds," filled with standing armies, are to be substituted instead.

Mr. Chairman, this policy cannot stand, it cannot endure the light of investigation, nor will it bear the test of the scrutiny of the American people. They, sir, when proper lights and correct information are afforded them, will decide all matters submitted to them correctly; condemning nothing "that is right, and submitting to nothing that is wrong." Sir, I would to Heaven this much could, in justice, be said of our public functionaries generally. They get into power, and into the enjoyment of the spoils of office, and seem to forget the welfare of the country, and act as if the Government was created alone for their special benefit, having apparently no idea that it was designed for the protection and promotion of the happiness of the great American family. But, sir, it seems to be a melancholy fact, and he was sorry to be constrained to admit it, that the political horizon appeared to grow darker and darker as our republic advanced in age; that disinterested love of country which characterized our fathers of the Revolution had taken leave of the bosoms of many of our public men, and selfishness and corruption, and all the heinous devices of party, in their most hideous shapes and worst forms, had supplanted patriotism and public virtue. He regretted that he felt authorized to make these declarations, but he feared there was too much truth in them for the safety of the country; this is more or less verified and manifested by every day's movements of the ruling party power in this Congress. Party movements, for the advancement of party interests and party aggrandizement, are notoriously and obviously the order of the day; and without entire obedience and submission to prescribed rules of action, proscription and dismissal from all participation in the anticipated spoils, is the threatened consequence. Sir, the good of the country is, now-a-days, not even a secondary consideration. He said these were signs portending danger, and if the American people heeded them, they will spurn the pretensions of any party who seek their confidence, that thus wantonly and selfishly invades their liberties.

Again, sir, it is proposed, by the year 1850, to have our naval defences (which are by far the best defence) to amount to one hundred and fifteen ships of war; which is estimated at an annual expense of seven millions of dollars, and by the appointed time will amount to one hundred and five millions. It is not designed, sir, to put all these vessels into immediate service, but to procure the building materials, to fit and prepare them in such manner, that upon an emergency our naval strength can be increased to one hundred and fifteen new ships of war.

Then, by the estimates, it will require about three millions more to arm them for service. This Congress has already passed a bill appropriating six millions of dollars for this service, which, added to the annual appropriation of five hundred thousand dollars, approaches very near the Secretary's requirement of seven millions for the increase of the navy. These estimates, he said, he made more particularly for his constituents, to give them some idea of the costs of the public defences, which are now sufficiently costly, but are attempted by the party dominant in this Congress to be swelled ten or twenty fold, for no other purpose but that of exhausting the Treasury of its surplus, to prevent a distribution of it among the States. What, said Mr. C., can be more plain than that the party will waste this large surplus upon objects worse than useless, than a recurrence to their various and almost innumerable schemes and projects of appropriation? and when they tell you, in so many words, they would prefer that the money should be sunk in the Potomac, than distributed among the States—among the people to whom it belongs? Nay, when this House is told by the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] that he would rather see the nation involved in war, than that distribution should be made of this surplus. Sir, this is alarming: when American life and blood are placed in the scales to weigh against money, and when all the calamities of disastrous war, drenching the earth with the best blood of our citizens, are preferable to the parting with money, he must say such sentiments were not indicative of the sympathy, brotherly love, and patriotism, that should characterize every American citizen and statesman. Whenever the lives of our countrymen have a price fixed upon them in money, and that too in the national councils, and by the legal guardians of our lives, liberty, and property, it at once shows that avarice and her long train of wicked associates have become conquerors of the better virtues; and nothing but evil can come of it. Sir, it is also said that distribution will corrupt the people; to which he would remark, that if corruption is the necessary consequence upon the possession of the surplus, does the party feel disposed to make a monopoly of all the corruption? He said he would submit to the committee, taking for a moment the premises as correct and tenable, whether thus corrupting the fountain of power, the sources of a healthy action to the body politic, must not in the end prove fatal to the whole? But, he said, he denied the premises, and must say the safety of the country alone depended upon the people; they have the integrity, and the only antidote to this malignant distemper, and they only can be relied on for a perfect cure. Mr. C. said he was astonished to hear such sentiments proclaimed upon this floor or elsewhere, that the people could not be trusted with their own money, for fear they would be corrupted. Sir, if this position be true, the Northern and Eastern States must, by this time, be awfully corrupt, for they have received the benefit of almost all the disbursements made by the Government from its commencement up to the present time. And if corruption be the consequence of distribution of the public money, those States inevitably are now past recovery and quite prepared for dissolution. No rule is a good one unless it will work both ways. These States have had almost all the money expended among themselves, and can readily judge of its corrupting influences; and if they consider themselves to be untainted, and uncorrupted, they should not be so fearful now of injury to the Western States, by a process that has proved harmless to them. But if they are satisfied that the public money that it has been their fate to enjoy has had that effect upon them, why, they are well prepared to deliver moral lectures. But, sir, these are insults; they are slanders upon the integrity and patriotism of the American people. And I am the more surprised to hear them made by a party now seeking power, and asking these people, whom they say are so corruptible, to elevate them to the high places of the Government, to feed upon the identical money they say will corrupt the people if divided amongst them. Mr. C. said he repudiated the charge of corruption, when made against the people; they are honest, and can have no motive to be otherwise. But, sir, when the charge is made against those who subsist alone upon the patronage of the Government and party spoils, who are daily in the use of intrigues for purposes of self-aggrandizement and party promotion, he admitted the charge more readily applied.

Mr. C. said he would again repeat, that he would willingly and freely vote the most liberal appropriations for every constitutional and proper object connected with the defences of the country; but schemes that have only for their object the exhaustion of the public Treasury, by the most profligate and wasteful expenditures, upon works that can effect no good, but great injury, and for the express purpose of preventing a distribution among the States for laudable and highly necessary improvements and purposes of education, within their respective limits, by the State authorities, are just such projects as cannot but meet with his entire disapprobation. The proper defences were not local, stationary, and immovably fixed fortifications, created at an enormous expense, and only capable of defending so much of the surrounding country as may fall under the cover of their guns, except at such places as before mentioned, and such other points as would command important avenues of communication, and insure security to an extended surrounding country. The occupation of places coming within this general principle, are the only places that should be guarded by this sort of defences. At such points the Government have already completed or have under construction this description of fortifications, and only require some additional appropriations adequate to their completion in the entire. But, sir, pursue the dictation of the Van Buren party, and the consequence will be not only an exhaustion of the large surplus now on hand, but the creation of future liabilities of three or four hundred millions of dollars, to be collected in some shape or other of the people, either by increased duties of the tariff, or by a direct taxation upon them; and then no additional security to the country will have been effected. Sir, the true defence of the nation is in the bosoms of the brave and chivalrous yeomanry—appeal to their patriotism, and you are never deceived in redress of national insults and grievances—not in your forts and stationary fortifications. The leader of the same party in the Senate, [Mr. BENTON,] as remarked before, proposed to apply the whole surplus to the erection of this sort of defences; he asked, when could the Government, employing the whole operative and mechanical resources of the country in an economical and prudent manner, expend this amount? Could it be done in less than ten or fifteen years? If not, why appropriate it all now? If the system is obliged to be carried out, why not be contented with appropriations commensurate with the power or ability of the Government economically to expend? Sir, no good reason could be seen by him for the adoption of such a policy. But, sir, go into it, and make these highly extravagant appropriations, and the consequence will as certainly be, as that you do it, that bankruptcy and defalcations will happen with nineteen twentieths of your public officers charged with the expenditure of this sum, and to whom you are obliged to confide this trust. Every day's experience proves to us all that a superabundance of money at the command of any of us naturally begets waste, and useless and pernicious extravagance; and the same rule that rightfully applies to us as individuals, will apply with increased force to our public officers generally intrusted with the public funds. The accounts of the numerous defaulters in your several departments verifies this melancholy truth.

Fortification Bill.

These woful manifestations of extravagance, by the dominant party, proved satisfactorily to his mind that there was much more in contemplation than that of "public defences;" that this patriotic name was assumed for effect, as was lately done by the present aspirants to office, in the conversion of "caucus" for that of "national convention," for the purpose of gulling the people; knowing well that the term "caucus" was a most odious name to the Americans. But, sir, when you come to analyze the late unauthorized Baltimore convention, at which Mr. Van Buren was nominated for the presidency, you will find the name was alone changed; and that it was really a caucus, composed of individuals chosen by a few irresponsible office-holders, the great body of the people not having been consulted upon the subject. The consequence of this caucus system, if permitted by the people now to be riveted upon them, is, that they have for the last time exercised the free prerogative of choosing their public officers; they will be selected for and placed over them, without having their choice or wishes consulted; and thus will end the important privilege now enjoyed by the great mass of the people; the many will be ruled by the few interested office-holders as with "rods of iron." The interests of the party may require the adoption of this unusual and most hateful waste of the public money, to give them the command of larger sums, nominally by sanction of law, to be used for electioneering purposes, but the better interests of the country forbid it. Mr. C. said, such juggling and political hypocrisy, intended to mislead the public mind, should be met with the abhorrence and contempt which all such conduct deserved at the hands of an honest representative of an independent and free people. He said he would like to see the gentlemen who were opposed to the distribution of the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the States, for internal improvement and education, come out fairly and boldly, and oppose it upon principle; show the demerits of the policy, and not shelter themselves behind "the public defences," expecting to gull and deceive the people by exciting their patriotism under false pretences. Sir, the defence required by this country consists in an efficient navy, that rides the waves and guards our commerce abroad in peace, and in war prevents invasion from abroad, and can hover around our coast, and protect the land from any fleets which could be sent across the ocean. These naval defences are important and indispensable, and will be always useful in peace or war; and are such as the people will approve.

Mr. C. said, the bill which proposes to divide the sales of the public lands among the States according to population, and which bill these extravagant appropriations for fortifications were designed to defeat, was a measure of more importance generally, and particularly to the Western States, where the people had always paid heavy taxes and never had received a dollar in return, than any measure now pending, or which has been for many years, and which he had hoped would have received the sanction of Congress this session. But the party movements of late were such as to induce him to believe they intended to give it the go-by, and not consider it the present session; the effect of which will be to continue the party and their political friends in the exclusive use of forty or fifty millions of the people's money. He said he was aware that this subject of distribution had occupied much of the time of the Senate at the present session, and of both Houses heretofore. But the friends of the policy had not succeeded in procuring for the country the immense advantages that would result to the States by its passage. Yet, when backed by the sovereign people, they should not be discouraged in so good a work, but persevere by redoubled exertions in the establishment of a policy so just and equitable in its character, that it must prevail; the people require it, and their will must be respected and obeyed. He said the people, under the fundamental principles of this Government, are entitled to equal benefits and advantages from its administration; but in all times past these benefits and advantages have been extremely partial and unequal. Whilst the public treasures have been poured forth in profuse extravagance in many of the States for all purposes whatever, there are some others that have not as yet received a cent from the Federal Government, and such in particular was the treatment of that portion of the country he had the honor in part to represent; but he hoped the time had now arrived when justice (and he asked for nothing but justice) would be done to that long-neglected and depressed section. Mr. C. said many objections were made to distribution, by members belonging to the party in support of Mr. Van Buren, in this and the other branch of the Legislature, but he considered there were but three points to settle to justify the policy. The first was the constitutional power of Congress over this fund; the second expediency; and, lastly, would there be a surplus in the Treasury, after defraying the ordinary expenses of the Government, and providing abundantly, nay, liberally, for the necessary increase of the navy, and all other proper defences? He said it appeared to him, if these points could be clearly settled in the affirmative, there could be no rational difficulty in the way of the passage of the bill; and he hoped and confidently believed that he would be able clearly to show the power, the expediency, the existence of a large surplus, and, in addition, the necessity; and that the Government was bound by every honorable consideration so to do, by the express terms of the contracts between her and the ceding States, in the acts of cession themselves, and also by constitutional provisions in relation to the public domain.

He said it would be recollected that the State of Virginia ceded to the United States by far a greater quantity of land than did either of the other States, which comprised the large and extensive tract of country, then called the Northwestern Territory, and is now the States of Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Michigan, and Wisconsin Territory. This cession was made in 1784, before the adoption of the federal constitution. After making certain reservations, and stipulating for the payment of the national debt, it is provided, in the face of the act of cession, that "all the lands within the territories so ceded to the United States, and not reserved for, or appropriated to, any of the before-mentioned purposes, or disposed of in bounties to the officers and soldiers of the American army, shall be considered as a common fund, for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the confederation, or federal alliance of the said States, Virginia included, according to their usual respective proportions of the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and no other purpose or use whatever."

The cession was made during the operation of the articles of confederation, and he said he would ask if the States, when they came to adopt the federal constitution, did reject, or even make any objections whatever, to the terms of contract made with Virginia? Or were they not agreed to, and their obligatory effect and character acknowledged? Let us refer, Mr. Chairman, for a moment, to the constitution, and see the provisions in relation to the public lands, and all contracts and engagements made by the confederated States under the articles of confederation. In the sixth article of the constitution will be found this express provision, that "all debts contracted, and engagements entered into, before the adoption of this constitution, shall be as valid against the United States under the constitution as under the confederation." He said here was a recognition and a positive pledge and assurance that "all contracts and engagements" made under and during the supremacy of the articles of confederation should be binding in their effect, and be complied with. Now, if these acts of cession be "contracts or certain engagements," then there is a constitutional provision which no man should dare to violate, and is unalterable. Was not this a contract, a bargain, between the State of Virginia, then sovereign and owner of this valuable extent of country, in her individual capacity, by which the title passed from her to the United States, entered into in due and solemn form? And by which the United States engaged to appropriate so much as should be found necessary to the extinguishment of the national debt, and that the residue should be a common fund, for the use and benefit of all the States that then were or should become members of the confederation? Most certainly: and, sir, the same stipulations and provisions are incorporated in all the acts of cession, made by the other States, of land to the General Government; and the same rule that would apply to the cession of Virginia, should and will apply with equal force to the cessions of the other States. He said he looked upon the United States in no other light than acting in the capacity of trustee for the sovereign States, in relation to the proceeds of the public lands, since the extinguishment of the public debt; and that she is bound, in the faithful execution of that trust, to distribute the money arising from the sales of those lands among the States upon some equitable principle, and no basis appeared to him more so than that of representation.

And now, the great and grand object for which these cessions were made having been accomplished—the national debt extinguished—the States, by virtue of express and unequivocal stipulations, have the right to claim, and do claim, the residue of money that may arise from the sales of the public lands, to be distributed amongst them, according to the terms of the acts of cession. Sir, in the fourth article of the constitution, there is found the following provision: "The Congress shall have power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory or other property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or of any particular State."

Sir, what territory did belong to the United States? How did she acquire her title to that territory? Was it not by a full and complete ratification, on her part, of those acts of cession by which, and by which alone, she acquired the right to one inch of territory? Can the United States, in justice and common honesty, recognise that portion of the acts of cession which is for her own benefit, and nullify that portion which was intended to secure the reserved interest of the States ceding the territory? By this article, it will be clearly seen that full power is vested in Congress to make all needful regulations respecting the public lands, by which is meant Congress shall regulate by law the mode and manner of surveys, sales, perfect titles, fix the prices, and make all necessary arrangements for their conversion into money; and, when converted, the acts of cession point out the uses to which the proceeds shall be applied; and the first provision is that they go to the extinguishment of the public debt, and the balance shall be a common fund, for the use and benefit of all the States, including the State ceding. The latter clause of this article unequivocally provides that "nothing in this constitution shall be so construed as to prejudice any claims of the United States, or any particular State." What claims? Surely her claims upon the ceded territory. And he said he would ask, if the whole of this fund was intended to be used by the United States, as some contend, why insert this provision in the fundamental law of the land, making so manifest a distinction between the claims of the United States and those of the States? If the United States was designed to have all, why say the claim of no particular State should be prejudiced, when speaking alone of the public lands in the constitution? Sir, the intention of the contracting parties is satisfactorily explained by the provisions of this article. The Virginia act of cession having said that the public debt should be first paid—that the residue should constitute a fund for the use and benefit of all the States, conclusively proves that so much of the ceded territory as should be found necessary for the extinguishment of the national debt was absolutely vested in the United States, to which the individual States could affix no claim whatever, or in any wise interfere with. It was a deed in fee. But should the public debt not consume the whole ceded territory, then, and in that case, that balance was to constitute the fund for the benefit of all the States, which the General Government, by her constitution, was forbidden to interfere with or prejudice; she in this respect could only be privileged to execute the trust confided to her, for the benefit of all the States. And she is certainly bound by every honorable and legal principle, in the execution of the trust, to make distribution among the States of all the proceeds of the public lands now in the Treasury, or that may hereafter come into her hands from that source.

Mr. C. said, he would further ask if the United States had acted faithful to the trust in granting to many of the States large quantities of the ceded territory for internal improvements, making roads and canals, opening rivers and creeks, and, upon some occasions, large grants for political effect, to secure votes in presidential contests? Is this acting honestly, and in conformity with the trust she undertook? Was it contemplated that these lands, set apart for the use and benefit of all the States, in due proportion, should be given to a few of them, to the prejudice and exclusion of the rest? Was it intended that any portion of them should be voted away, with a view to secure the vote of a State, or States, in a presidential election? Sir, was it ever intended that they should be used for purposes of bribery and corruption? Or were they really designed for the benefit of the States, for the noble purposes of improving the country, in the construction of roads and canals, opening watercourses, and avenues to market, for the more cheap transportation of the agricultural and manufactured products, and education to all classes of society, from the most affluent to the most humble child in the country? Most certainly the latter looks the most probable. But more of this hereafter.

Mr. C. said there could be adduced in support of the distribution of the surpluses among the States—not only that which has arisen from the sales of the public lands, but the revenue arising from all sources whatever, assuming the broadest ground—the opinions of many of our most distinguished and enlightened statesmen, whose fidelity to the principles of the constitution has never been doubted, and whose patriotism and love of country cannot be questioned.

Sir, the venerable and democratic Jefferson, whilst President, in his message as early as 1806, recommended the distribution of a portion of the then revenue among the States, for internal improvements and education; and his recommendation and convictions of the utility and importance of the policy are expressed so forcibly, that I hope the Clerk will be permitted to read that portion relative to this subject.

Mr. Jefferson, after speaking of the tariff duties, the surpluses in the Treasury, and likely to be, from time to time, also as to the payment of the public debt, as it might fall due, says—(Here the Clerk read as follows:)

“The question, therefore, now comes forward, to what other objects shall these surpluses be appropriated, and the whole surplus of impost, after the entire discharge of the public debt, and during those intervals when purposes of war shall not call for them? Shall we suppress the imposts, and give that advantage to foreign over domestic manufacturers? On a few articles of more general and necessary use the suppression, in due season, will doubtless be right; but the great mass of the articles on which impost is paid are foreign luxuries, purchased by those only who are rich enough to afford themselves in the use of them. Their patriotism would certainly prefer its continuance, and application to the purposes of the public education, roads, rivers, canals, and such other objects of public improvement as it may be thought proper to add to the constitutional enumeration of the federal powers. By these operations, new channels of communication will be opened between the States, the lines of separation will disappear, their interests will be identified, and their union cemented by new and indissoluble ties.”

This recommendation, said Mr. C., occurred at a much more inauspicious time for distribution than the present, and assumes a much broader ground than the present bill. The bill upon the table only contemplates the distribution of such of the surplus as is derived from the public lands. Mr. Jefferson advised the distribution of all sorts of revenue, from lands, imports, and duties of every kind, and that, too, at a period when the Government was groaning under the burdens of heavy responsibilities, and under circumstances when not even the acts of cession would seem to have warranted a distribution, because the national debt was not then paid, and a division amongst the States was not contemplated or expected until after that debt was discharged.

Mr. C. said, that if it was constitutional and expedient to divide amongst the States the moneys collected from customs and imports, (at a time when heavy debts were hanging over the country,) for purposes of education and internal improvement, and “such other objects of public improvement as it may be thought proper to add to the constitutional enumeration of federal powers,” in the different States, as proposed by Mr. Jefferson, surely it cannot be urged that Congress has no power now to distribute the sales of the public lands, seeing that the Government debt is fully discharged, and seeing that something of this sort was intended by the terms of the acts of cession, recognised and confirmed by constitutional provisions.

Sir, said Mr. C., this great and patriotic man did not stop short with this single recommendation of this important policy. In his message of 1808 he renews the recommendation, which, he said, he would ask the Clerk to read. The Clerk read as follows:

“The probable accumulation of the surpluses of revenue, beyond what can be applied to the payment of the public debt, whenever the freedom and safety of our commerce shall be restored, merits the consideration of Congress. Shall the revenue be reduced? Or shall it not rather be appropriated to the improvements of roads, canals, rivers, education, and other great foundations of prosperity and union, under the powers which Congress may already possess, or such amendment of the constitution as may be approved by the States? While uncertain of the course of things, the time may be advantageously employed in obtaining the powers necessary for a system of improvement, should that be thought best.”

Mr. C. said he would remind the committee that Mr. Jefferson expresses no doubt of the power of Congress to distribute the public fund amongst the States. And he said he must remark, that in these recommendations that great and patriotic man could have had nothing in view but the good of his country and the happiness of the people. This was his last message to Congress—his last official act as President. He had devoted a long and useful life in the service of his country, and in the cause of liberty; his political career was about to terminate; he had enjoyed the highest offices within the gift of a grateful people; he had nothing further to ask or expect; he desired no further honors; the cup of his glory was filled. He said he had no ambitious designs, no selfish motives, to influence him or misdirect his judgment; the glory and the prosperity of his country were his highest ambition; and under the influence of these sentiments and feelings he makes this recommendation in his message, among the last of his official acts.

Again, said Mr. C., a report of a very intelligent committee (for so he judged them to be from the ability evinced in the report) will be found in the documents of 1826, where a committee was appointed to investigate the subject of distribution of a portion of the surplus revenue among the States. The views taken by that committee are so forcible and conclusive, that I beg leave to have a portion of the report read. The Clerk read as follows:

“The committee, from as careful an examination of the subject as a due attention to their other duties would permit them to make, have come to the conclusion that great advantages would result to the United States from an annual distribution among them, by some equitable ratio, of a portion of our national revenue, for the purposes of education and internal improvement, or for such other purposes as the State Governments may respectively deem most to their advantage.

“Whether the United States shall divide the whole of their revenues, beyond what are required for the usual expenditures of the Government, for domestic and foreign, civil, military, and naval, and to the reduction of our public debt, until the whole of it shall be extinguished; or whether they shall apply a portion of the revenues, as proposed, for the most important purposes, and thereby cause a more gradual reduction of the public debt, resolves itself into a question of expediency.

“It remains for Congress to determine which of these courses will most effectually promote the present, as well as the future, prosperity of the country. There can be no doubt that money distributed among the States, as proposed, would be vested in a way to give much greater profit than the interest on such money would yield at three, four and a half, or even five per cent., which are now the interests paid on the greater part of our public debt.

"As a large portion of this debt is payable to persons in Europe, to discharge it as fast as our means would permit would be to send from the country, sooner than necessary, funds that are wanted at home, the inconvenience of which would be sensibly felt in the present embarrassed state of our moneyed market, and most probably for several years to come.

"Money distributed as proposed would give new activity to industry and enterprise in all the States, and that equally and simultaneously.

"It would create a vigilance on the part of the State Governments over the expenditures of the General Government, and thereby prevent the waste of money, and the adoption of extravagant measures that might diminish the amount of the annual dividends.

"It would secure impartial justice to all the States in the distribution of the expenditures of our Government, of our revenue, a failure of which at present is a subject of load and just complaint.

"It would relieve the General Government of the serious inconvenience of an overflowing Treasury, which, if not provided for in the manner proposed, or by a reduction in our revenue, will impair the most important principles of our constitution.

"It would relieve the two Houses of Congress of a large portion of legislation, now devoted to the disposal of our surplus funds—legislation of the worst kind, calculated to produce combinations, sectional feelings, injustice, and waste of public treasure.

"It would transfer to the States the regulation of expenditures for internal improvements by roads and canals, which, if retained and exercised by the General Government, contrary, as is believed by many, to the letter and spirit of our constitution, will in time so far decrease the powers of the State Governments as to destroy the federation principle of our Union, and convert our system of confederated republics into a consolidated Government.

"It would remove the cause of the great and increasing difficulties arising from an objection, on constitutional grounds, to the exercise of the right claimed by the United States, of making roads and canals through the different States of the Union.

"It would enable the General Government to keep in operation an effective system of finance and revenue, with advantage to the States. And should the exigencies of the country require the application of all our means to some object connected with our national peace and prosperity, those means could be soon brought into operation, by suspending, for a time, the dividends to the States. By this our Treasury would be filled without resort to new taxes, which might be oppressive to agriculture, and which might create much inconvenience by interrupting the pursuits and industry of our citizens.

"Money collected from the sources which now give us our revenues, and distributed among the States as proposed, would produce a rapid and profitable circulation of our funds from the centre to the extremities of our Union, and thus add to the force of the moneyed capital of the country."

Let it be remembered, sir, that a majority of this committee were the friends of General Jackson, and all agreed to a distribution; and the arguments and reasoning in this report, in favor of distribution, are cogent, and go far to convince the mind of the expediency and constitutionality of the policy; and made at a time when we owed a large public debt, running upon interest. Mr. C. said he could not conceive how it was possible for the United States, in 1825, to entertain an idea favorable to distribution, under the then depressed state of the finances of the country—revenue but nominal compared to its present amount, with a heavy national debt hanging over it, all bearing interest; and that the most enlightened politicians should have recommended and advised a distribution; and that now, when the condition of the country is more prosperous than any ever was known to be; out of debt—with no embarrassment—with between forty and fifty millions of dollars more in the Treasury than can possibly be used with advantage to the country—lying at great risk and hazard in the rotten and unsafe pet banks, used for all sorts of purposes—speculations of every description based upon it—shaving shops carried on and sustained upon it—yielding no interest to the Government. Yet, notwithstanding all this, the dominant politicians of the present day, the politicians of the party in power, cannot agree that this surplus, that the Government can have no good use for, shall be given to the States to whom it belongs. All this, said Mr. C., argued conclusively that all was not right; and the people, he hoped, would find it out and apply the antidote, the corrective. Sir, said Mr. C., the people will not endure these frauds and impositions that are daily and hourly practised upon them. Sir, if the Government shall, in the very face of her "engagements" with the States, and in defiance of the constitution, withhold these rights and benefits from them, by refusing to yield that portion of the surplus produced by the sales of the public lands, it will be a manifestation of injustice, cruelty, and oppression, unworthy the high character of the American Government.

He would have read the report of the committee of the House in 1829, by the Clerk. The Clerk read as follows:

"It appears to your committee that the time has arrived when the community should be awakened to their rights; when measures should be adopted in the national councils, to give the States a direct interest in the income arising from the sales of the public lands. This individual measure would at once check further concessions, and effectually prevent the selfish from availing themselves of the advantage presented by some great crisis in public affairs, to obtain propitiatory concessions from rival parties, deeply injurious to the general interest.

"The committee cannot devise a surer guard to the purity of legislation, with respect to the public lands, nor an application of their value more just and equitable, as regards the interest of all the States, than by recommending for consideration the policy of directing, by law, that the proceeds of all sales of the public lands, after deducting expenses, should be distributed to the several States, in the ratio of their population, as ascertained at the usual periods of taking the census.

"This policy would, undoubtedly, always influence a majority of Congress; because only the members from a State about to receive a cession would venture to make such gift, when the evident consequence would be the diminution of the direct revenue of the States represented by the rest.

"This measure would likewise interest the States in the adoption of a system of rigid economy, as relates to the expenditures of the land offices; and no private or other claim would be sanctioned, but as their justice might be clearly established. It must then be evident that unless the United States create rivals in her own land market by further concessions or donations, (the holders of which would, of course, occupy the market by selling low what had cost them nothing,) there must be a sure, and, hereafter, an annually increasing demand for the public land, and consequently an increasing amount of cash will be received for national purposes, or for the proposed distribution, and which, in all probability, will average three millions yearly for the next ten years; an amount which can be most beneficially applied in well-regulated systems of education, in constructing roads, bridges, canals, and such other useful works as may be deemed advisable by the respective States."

This committee was composed of administration members—some now in Congress—voting then for a distribution, when the Government owed, perhaps, a hundred millions of dollars—and now casting a sumerset, and voting against the measure when the Government is out of debt, and the coffers of the Treasury are groaning under the weight of a large excess. He said he would warn gentlemen to pause and reflect seriously before they made the awful plunge that must be disastrous to the country.

Mr. C. said he would refer to the message of General Jackson in 1829, which he would send to the Clerk, with a request that he would read that portion of it relating to this subject. The Clerk then read the following:

"After the extinction of the public debt, it is not probable that any adjustment of the tariff, upon principles satisfactory to the people of the Union, will, until a remote period, if ever, leave the Government without a considerable surplus in the Treasury beyond what may be necessary for its current services. As, then, the period approaches when the application of revenue to the payment of debt will cease, the disposition of the surplus will present a subject for the serious deliberation of Congress; and it may be fortunate for the country that it is yet to be decided, considered in connexion with the difficulties which have heretofore attended appropriations for purposes of internal improvement, and with those which this experience tells us will certainly arise, whenever power over such subjects may be exercised by the General Government; it is hoped that it may lead to the adoption of some plan which will reconcile the diversified interests of the States, and strengthen the bonds which unite them. Every member of the Union, in peace and in war, will be benefited by improvement of inland navigation, and the construction of highways in the several States. Let us, then, endeavor to attain this benefit in a mode which will be satisfactory to all. That hitherto adopted has, by many of our fellow-citizens, been deprecated as an infraction of the constitution; while, by others, it has been avowed as inexpedient."

"All feel that it has been employed at the expense of harmony in the legislative councils.

"To avoid these evils, it appears to me that the most safe, just, and federal disposition which could be made of the surplus revenue, would be its apportionment among the several States, according to their ratio of representation. And should this measure not be found warranted by the constitution, that it would be expedient to propose to the States an amendment authorizing it.

"I regard an appeal to the source of power, in cases of real doubt, and when its exercise is deemed indispensable to the general welfare, as among the most sacred of all our obligations; upon this country, more than any other, has, in the providence of God, been cast the special guardianship of the great principle of adherence to written constitutions. If it fail here, all hope in regard to it will be extinguished. That this was intended to be a Government of limited and specific, and not general powers, must be admitted by all; and it is our duty to preserve for it the character intended by its framers. If experience points out the necessity for an enlargement of these powers, let us apply for it to those for whose benefit it is to be exercised; and not undermine the whole system by a resort to overstrained constructions."

Sir, said Mr. C., the language used by the President in this recommendation needs no comment; it speaks for itself; and does, in a plain and most forcible manner, show the justice, utility, importance, and the necessity, of a distribution of the surplus of the Treasury among the States. The President expresses, in this able document, no doubt as to the convictions of his own mind of the expediency or the constitutional power of Congress to make distributions. Hence the President, he presumed, would now make no constitutional scruples upon the subject; but if the details of the bill that may be passed by Congress should meet his views in other respects, no doubt it will meet his sanction and approbation. It is, however, incumbent on Congress to discharge their duty faithfully and honestly toward the country and their constituents, in the adoption of such measures as they may think will redound to the honor and the advancement of the best interests of the nation; and then it devolves upon the Executive, in the discharge of the high and important trusts confided in him, in like manner to make his decisions.

Mr. C. said, although he had promised to refer to no further authority in support of this policy, yet he hoped he would be pardoned for requesting to be read a short paragraph or two of the report of Mr. McLane, who was then Secretary of the Treasury under General Jackson, made to Congress in 1831; which the Clerk read, as follows:

"The sources from which the revenue has hitherto been derived, are the imports, public lands, and bank dividends. With the sales of the bank stock the latter will cease; and as the imports, according to any scale of duties which it will be expedient and practicable to adopt, will be amply sufficient to meet all the expenditures, that portion of the revenue heretofore drawn from the sale of the public lands may be dispensed with, should Congress see fit to do so.

"On this point, the undersigned deems it proper to observe, that the creation of numerous States throughout the Western country, now forming a most important part of the Union, and the relative powers claimed and exercised by Congress and the respective States over the public lands, having been gradually accumulating causes of inquietude and difficulty, if not of complaint, it may well deserve consideration, therefore, whether, at a period demanding an amicable and permanent adjustment of the various subjects which now agitate the public mind, these may not be advantageously disposed of, in common with the others, and upon principles just and satisfactory to all parts of the Union.

"It must be admitted that the public lands were ceded by the States, or subsequently acquired by the United States, for the common benefit; and that each State has an interest in their proceeds, of which it cannot justly be deprived. Over this part of the public property, the powers of the General Government have been uniformly supposed to have a peculiarly extensive scope, and have been construed to authorize their application to purposes of education and improvement, to which other branches of revenue were not deemed applicable. It is not practicable to keep the public lands out of the market, and the present mode of disposing of them is not the most profitable, either to the General Government or to the States, and must be expected, when the proceeds shall be no longer required for the public debt, to give rise to new and more serious objections. Under these circumstances, it is submitted to the wisdom of Congress to decide upon the propriety of disposing of all the public lands, in the aggregate, to those States within whose territorial limits they lie, at a fair price, to be settled in such manner as might be satisfactory to all. The aggregate price of the whole may then be apportioned among the several States of the Union, according to such equitable ratio as may be consistent with the objects of the original cession, and the proportion of each paid."

It appears clearly that this enlightened statesman at once recognised the right of the States, after the extinguishment of the public debt, to the residue of the sales of the public lands; and draws an obvious distinction between the revenue derived from the sales of these lands, and that raised from other sources; and admits the obligatory force of the reserving clause used in the acts of cession. Sir, said Mr. C., there cannot be a remaining doubt of the power of Congress over this fund; and by the terms of the contract between the General Government and the States, as evidenced and expressed by the acts themselves, connected with the provisions of the constitution in relation to the public lands, and recognition of all contracts and engagements made under the articles of confederation, prove obviously and incontestably that the power is not only possessed, but that Government is bound, by the most solemn obligations and duty, to surrender to the States the surpluses of the sales of those lands now in the Treasury, and any amount that may hereafter be derived. Sir, it cannot be otherwise.

Mr. C. said, believing he had shown, beyond doubt, the power of Congress to divide, and that it was expedient and proper to do so, he would leave this branch of the subject, and before he took his seat would show that there would be a large surplus in the Treasury that the Government could not use, otherwise than by distribution. He would also attempt to show the inequality and the great injustice that had been done some of the States in the disbursement of public money.

The revenue collected in 1835, by the tariff duties and sales of the public lands, was upwards of thirty-four and a half millions of dollars. By the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, (Mr. Woodbury,) for the year 1836, the revenue from the same sources is calculated at upwards of nineteen millions; which will be found to fall far short of the real amount, which he proposed to show. The returns received for the first quarter of the present year are considerably upwards of eleven millions, actually collected and paid into the Treasury; and but for the law passed this session, (without my consent,) loaning about five millions to citizens of New York, there would have been paid in the first three months of this year sixteen millions of dollars, within three and a half millions of the Secretary's estimate for the whole year. Thus it will appear that the whole amount collected last year, and in the first quarter of the present, is forty-six millions of dollars; and, but for the New York loan, would have been fifty-one millions. And should the last three quarters of this year produce equal to the first, there will be in the Treasury at the end of this year thirty-three millions more, to be added to the above forty-six millions now on hand; making, in all, seventy-nine millions that will have been collected in two years; add to this the New York loan, and you have eighty-four millions. The charter of the Bank of the United States having expired, in which the Government owns seven millions of stock, the advance upon which may safely be calculated at five hundred thousand dollars, all of which the Government can command at pleasure, added to the above, makes ninety-one and a half millions of dollars. Now, sir, let us calculate the charges upon this amount, and strike the balance.

The Secretary of the Treasury's estimates for the present year, for ordinary and extraordinary appropriations, are twenty-three millions of dollars; which is said to be about eight millions more than is necessary for the ordinary expenditures of the Government for this year. It will be right to add to this, three millions appropriated at the present session for defraying the expenses of the wars now in progress, with the Seminole and Creek tribes of Indians; then add the five millions loaned to the citizens of New York, and then seven millions to carry into effect the treaties recently made with the Cherokees and other tribes of Indians; all of which give you the sum of thirty-eight millions of dollars. This sum deducted from the amount collected of ninety-one millions and a half, (before shown to be in the Treasury, or will be at the end of the present year,) leaves a balance of cash on hand of fifty-three and a half millions of dollars, to be distributed among the States, by the provisions of this bill, or the greater part of it. But, (said Mr. C.,) suppose the last three quarters of this year fail to produce revenue proportionably to the first, as before estimated, let us deduct one million of dollars for each quarter, for any supposed deficiency, and still you will have remaining fifty millions and a half at the end of the year, after paying all the expenses and charges upon the Government, up to the end of the present year. It will be recollected that the charges upon the Treasury for 1835 were paid out of the revenue collected in 1834, of which there remained in the Treasury several millions of dollars, after meeting all Government engagements for that year, which is not now taken into the calculation. Now, sir, it is shown by the receipts reported to this House, by the proper authorities, contrasted with the charges upon the Government for the present year, that there will be at the end of this year fifty and a half millions of dollars of surplus, unless it shall turn out that it has been confiscated and squandered by the deposit banks. Sir, it has been charged upon this floor by an honorable member from Virginia, [Mr. Wise,] that in all probability the public money in these banks is not only unsafe, because of the improvident management of those institutions, but that the whole fund is under the control of a certain Mr. R. M. Whitney, who is not only suspected for the want of integrity, but has been actually convicted of the highest crimes known to the laws of the country. And, sir, this House has been repeatedly asked to appoint a select committee, with power to send for witnesses and papers, and to investigate the espionage, peculations, and frauds, charged to be in constant practice by those charged with the safe keeping of it; and, sir, the ruling party has as often refused. How will gentlemen account for these unprecedented movements to the people? Can there be any acceptable apology offered? What, sir, when you are assured that forty or fifty millions of dollars—collected from the hard earnings of the people; from your constituents and mine, in their due proportion—have fallen into the hands of dishonest men; men without principle; used for dishonest purposes by individuals and speculating shaving companies; and that all is in great danger of being lost; and that by the appointment of a committee with these powers, these peculations and abuses might, perhaps, be corrected; how can honest and honorable representatives of the people refuse to order an investigation? Sir, these are alarming omens of the depravity of the servants of the people; and I pray God they may understand it and apply the corrective lash. The party now in the ascendant in this House owe something to the President and his friends upon this subject. He, upon his own responsibility, removed the public money from the Bank of the United States, and placed it in the present repositories, and his friends sustained him; and should the party now seeking to come into power, and assume the reins of Government, so manage as to lose or waste this treasure, may it not be the means of bringing censure upon the Executive and those who went with him upon that subject? But to return to the subject. Sir, the question now arises, what shall be done with this surplus? Shall it be appropriated in the lump, as proposed in the Senate, (by Mr. BENTON,) for useless fortifications on the seacoast? or shall it not be divided among the States, for the improvement of the country and for education? Sir, I am opposed to the first proposition, as before stated; and believe the latter policy will be productive of more good to the country than to dispose of it in any other manner whatever. It will, sir, produce a new and most interesting era in our history. It will put it in the power of the States to construct facilities of intercourse, and promote trade between each other, and thereby strengthen the bonds of alliance, friendship, and identity of interest, between the citizens of the different States, that will bid defiance to disunion or dissolution of the confederacy.

Sir, said Mr. C., one prominent advantage in distributing the surplus revenue, is, that it will destroy the vast inequality which now exists by these partial appropriations and expenditures of the public money, and send its blessings to different sections of the country by an equitable division.

In obtaining bounty from the Treasury there are a few favored sections which claim great and unequal boons from the Government, for reasons of their importance, which importance is constantly magnified by these very boons themselves. For instance, you have extended to New York a loan for several years of five millions of dollars; you have appropriated nine hundred thousand dollars in part pay for the erection of a magnificent marble custom-house, that will cost three millions of dollars—all because of her commerce, which commerce has been greatly augmented by the expenditure of the public money. Sir, when will East Tennessee get as many thousands for internal improvements, as you have just voted to New York millions, if the money lies in the Treasury, for the exclusive benefit of Eastern merchants, stock-jobbers, and violent and thorough-going partisans? But if distributed, that portion that would be allotted to that rich but neglected portion of the land would be as a refreshing dew to a soil suffering by a long-continued drought. Sir, Tennessee has memorialized Congress, from time to time, on the subject of some improvements that she considered national in character—that would promote the military operations and defences of the country—and which would be productive of commercial benefits to her citizens, and those of the surrounding States, in the transportation of their produce to market upon better terms than the ordinary mode in wagons by horse power. And how have her prayers been treated? Was she recognised as a sovereign State, entitled to equal benefits in the distribution of the bounties of the Government? No, sir; her petitions have been passed over unrespected, laid upon your table to sleep the sleep of death; and she required to depart from your bar without a dollar. In 1823, the Legislature of Tennessee asked Congress to make an appropriation to connect Hiwassee, a river that empties into the Holston, with the Coosa of South Alabama, by a canal, only a distance of nine or ten miles, through a perfect plane; representing it as highly important in military or war operations, because it effected a water communication from the most interior with the seaboard at Mobile, by which the products of the eastern part of that State, munitions of war, and troops, could be transported by water to the most vulnerable part of the Southern frontier.

Sir, in the last war many lives were lost among the troops marched from East Tennessee, by forced marches, to this frontier, from fatigue and hunger. Sir, you were memorialized in 1829 upon the same subject; and that communication he had referred to the committee at the beginning of this session, under a hope of having a favorable report upon it; but hopes were fallacious; it seemed as if they did not intend to act upon it; and he said he must be permitted to enter his solemn protest against such delays in the execution of our duties towards the applications of the people. He said he was at a loss to know the cause of the delay in reporting upon this memorial. There is another improvement that Congress has been often called upon to make—the opening of the Tennessee and Holston rivers up to Kingsport, or near the Virginia line—this would connect with the Coosa canal, and communicate with a region abounding more extensively with iron mineral, stone coal, plaster, salt, and many manufactories of iron, nails, castings, and pig iron, and affording an outlet to the south into the ocean by way of Mobile, and the west by a connexion with the Mississippi, and to the north by the Ohio river. This application has met with no better fate than the other.

Sir, let these improvements be made, and instead of sending your four or five major generals, as has lately been done, to defend the Southern frontier against a few hundred hostile Indians—wheeling their right and left wings, and firing cannon every morning, as if to notify the enemy to get out of the way; that American generals were about—at the expense of millions to your Treasury: make these improvements, and in future call upon the hardy sons of Tennessee, who are always ready and willing to brave the storms of war in defence of their country, to volunteer with the privilege of choosing their own officers; and they will end your little wars, and return home to their farms and families, before your scientific generals will have issued their manifestoes and gone into summer quarters. Sir, your statute book shows that great injustice has been done to the West, and particularly Tennessee and Kentucky, in the distribution of public money. Whilst your Treasury has been made to overflow by exactions, by indirect taxation, and by the sales of the public lands, and every dollar that could be commanded by the toil and sweat of the Southern and Western agriculturists and mechanics were appropriated to meet the Government demands, a return of any portion of that treasure has never occurred, although often asked for. Sir, two hundred thousand dollars would probably effect both these improvements, to which he had alluded, in East Tennessee, and bestow incalculable advantages upon this long-neglected, suffering, and depressed region. Sir, to the North and Northeast you have poured out, from the commencement of the Government to this time, almost the whole revenue, for improvements of every description; and the protecting hand of Government to their manufactures has, upon all occasions, been extended, to the great prejudice of the South and West. The West has never complained; she has asked no protective duties to sustain her manufactories; all she does ask is, that the Government shall now enable her to make some improvements in the country, to give her outlets for her products, and place herself more upon an equality with her sister States, and she will be contented. He said he had the honor to offer an amendment, the other day, to a bill proposing an appropriation of a hundred thousand dollars for the improvement of these rivers, and the party opposed it with a vengeance, and then called for and sustained the previous question, to prevent any similar propositions from being offered again. The West will not stand this kind of treatment; she will not agree to be “hewers of wood and drawers of water” always for the North.

Sir, since these questions have been pending, overlooked and neglected, many millions have been given to other States for improvements, not more nor as much national in their character as those in Tennessee. How many hundreds of thousands of dollars have been appropriated to make Conneaut creek, in the State of Ohio, navigable? How much to Ashtabula creek? How much to Cunningham creek, and to as many others of as little magnitude, that cannot be made useful half a dozen miles from their mouths? Sir, if it is constitutional to apply the public money to make navigable these creeks, three or four miles only from their mouths, and affording benefits to none but those who may have received the money expended, how much more constitutional would it be to make navigable the Tennessee and Holston rivers, running up into the interior of a rich, fertile, and extensive manufacturing country, seven or eight hundred miles, affording commercial advantages to a number of the States, and transportation and outlet for millions of produce? There is, sir, no comparison; yet you have applied money to the one, and refused it to the other. Sir, by such operations of the Government, the poor are made to grow poorer and the rich richer. The North and East seem to have been, and continue to be, the favorites. New York is benefited, by the acts passed this session, perhaps ten millions of dollars, Tennessee nothing; the District of Columbia two and a half millions for the Ohio and Chesapeake canal, all the streams of Tennessee nothing. Suppose, instead of bestowing upon the wealthy city of New York nine hundred thousand dollars to build a house, to ornament the city, that is to cost at least three millions of dollars, you had applied the amount to the settlement of the poor upon Western lands of eighty acres to each family—to how many families would you have given comfortable homes? Supposing the house to cost three millions, by laying out that sum in lands, and dividing it into eighty-acre tracts, you would give homes to forty-five thousand poor families, who are now without them, and have not the means to procure them. Now, sir, which policy would advance the interests and happiness of society most—to have erected in the city of New York a stupendous marble custom-house, or to present forty-five thousand poor families with comfortable and independent homes of their own? The Government still owns about eleven hundred and fifty millions of acres of land, yet to be sold; this, at the Government price, will yield fourteen hundred and thirty-seven and a half millions of dollars; which, divided among the States according to population, would give to Tennessee about eighty five millions of dollars; by the use of which she could make all necessary improvements that could be desired, and at the same time establish a literary fund, that would justify a public school in every neighborhood throughout the State, capable of educating every child of the present and future generations, without taxing the parent with a dollar; then the poorer part of society would have an equal chance; and, sir, the fruits would be seen and felt. Instead of youths, born in poverty, passing through life without a smattering of education, unknowing and unknown citizens, they would be educated; and thousands of them become the most brilliant stars in the firmament, filling the highest stations in your Government, with credit to themselves and with honor and usefulness to the country. Sir, these events should be desired by every patriot. The perpetuation of the Government much depends upon the people being enlightened—and this is the way to accomplish that important and desirable result.

Mr. C. said he would trespass but a moment longer upon the patience of the House, being conscious that he had already occupied more time than he had intended; but would only present a couple of tabular statements, the one showing the liberal grants made by Congress of the public lands, the other making a division of the forty millions of surplus among the States according to the provisions of the bill, and he should be done.

Division of forty millions, after deducting ten per cent.

When Mr. CARTER had concluded,

Mr. INGERSOLL took the floor, but gave away for a motion, made by Mr. GRAVES, that the committee rise; which was decided in the negative: Ayes 25, noes 103.

Mr. INGERSOLL then rose and spoke as follows:

If I were to consult my own inclination alone, I would cheerfully yield the floor, which has been awarded to me. The gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. HALL,] who claims it with me, may rest assured that no one could have been better satisfied if he had chanced to gain the precedence, than myself. But, being in the lists, I am bound to fight the battle of my constituents, at the hazard even of abusing the almost exhausted patience of the committee, and of disappointing or delaying those who hear me in the enjoyment which they have a right to expect, when I shall have finished the few remarks I have to make. After the several subjects of general interest involved in the discussion have been debated by so many gentlemen, and so much at length, I could scarcely hope, under any circumstances, to add materially to the stock of argument which has been accumulated. But, after a fatiguing session of many hours, I shall receive especial credit for the assurance that I rise with much reluctance to occupy even a small portion of the time which is still allotted to the present debate. Its hours, I know, are numbered; and the sun, which is now going down in clouds, will not rise again until the labors of this committee shall have closed.

Different measures are almost immediately before us, which are perpetually struggling for precedence; they are in appearance altogether dissimilar. A stranger, on a cursory, or even a careful examination, would scarcely detect any points of resemblance between them. Yet they are, in truth, closely, and, perhaps, inseparably united; dependent so far upon each other, that the result of any one of them cannot fail seriously to affect the rest; constituting, as they do, only parts of one comprehensive system, upon the due workings of which, in its entire and perfect character, may depend the wholesome and vigorous condition of the whole body politic. A distribution of revenue among the States cannot be made, no matter how desirable it may be, unless the necessary wants of the Government are first supplied. The extent of funds which shall be applied by law to particular objects must depend not only upon their own intrinsic merits, but upon a comparison of the urgency and importance of them with others of a national character; and, when these points are settled, it may be essentially increased or diminished by the ability which exists to make a due and useful expenditure of them during the present year. In determining, also, either upon distribution or expenditure, it becomes a serious duty to inquire whether the requisite funds for either object are, in their nominal amount, ready at the call of the Government. Are they husbanded and improved with the care of the good and faithful servant? Or, like the talent committed to the foolish servant, are they buried in useless inactivity? Or, still more inexcusably, are they, like trusts betrayed by false stewards, perverted and abused to corrupt and wicked purposes?

The bill immediately before us is to appropriate funds for fortifications. But it is impossible, in the most faithful attention to it, to lose sight of the proposal to divide among the States the proceeds of the public lands, or even the incidental question of a reference of that momentous subject, and to which committee it properly belongs. As much out of course would it be to separate from this direct inquiry the resolutions which have been introduced to permit a scrutiny into the state of the public funds; the security or peril in which they stand; the arrangements which have been made in adopting particular depositories; the inducements for such selections; and all the mysterious circumstances by which they are surrounded.

When any one of these cardinal measures has been formally before the House, it has been made the basis of broader discussion than its own mere provisions would seem absolutely to require. If the discussion has not extended beyond the various merits of them all, co-incidents of each other, as I have stated them to be, it has done no more than fulfil its correct and lawful office. Were it confined to narrower limits, it would be restricted far within the range of useful, and, perhaps, of necessary argument.

The subject which claims and deserves chief attention is awaiting its disposition here only in preliminary; it has passed the ordeal of the other branch of the Legislature, and is before this House on the several propositions of reference. It proposes to divide the proceeds of the public lands among the several States, according to the ratio of representation, with the paternal and patriotic object of promoting internal improvement and general education. In giving it shape and direction, it should seem to be fair that its friends should exercise peculiar influence. Their objects are early consideration, and an opportunity, if it deserve it, for successful action. They ask no more. When it is matured, (and such they believe to be its present condition,) it must stand or fall according to its own merits; but they beseech you not to mar or maim it in its progress. Who is there, really its friend, that desires a reference to one of the standing committees of the House? Who, that it is opposed to it, will consent to its receiving at once the free discussion of a Committee of the Whole? A reference to the Committee of Ways and Means would insure an unfavorable report, or consign it to lasting oblivion. This inference is drawn, not, of course, from any thing that has occurred in the committee, but from the distinct avowal, on this floor, of the gentleman at the head of it—an avowal made, not as chairman, but merely in his individual character. If it be regarded as a party measure, such a reference would be an unfortunate one, although it would receive cordial (if feeble) support even there. Speaking for myself alone, and promising it, at all times, hearty and sincere, though unimportant assistance, I will say that a measure of deeper interest to the country—one better calculated to promote the true ends of government and law—the prosperity and happiness of the people—is not upon your calendar. It would be difficult to embody in any single proposition a larger or more prolific promise of present and of future good; a plan, purer in its conception, liable to fewer exceptions in its exercise and use, or more widely diffusive of blessings and benefits throughout the land. If the hostility of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CAMBRELENE] be of the character which he is supposed to have proclaimed, we should differ as widely as the branches of the alternative which his argument has presented. It was an alternative of peace or war. All the purposes of the proposed measure are pacific and prosperous; it contemplates and will promote universal happiness and peace—happiness, founded upon the utmost improvement and most complete development of the resources of nature and of art, and upon the wide-spread diffusion of them over every part of this extended republic, so that not an inch of ground shall escape their influence; founded, too, upon a moral elevation of the people, which cannot fail to be the consequence of enlightening their understandings and purifying their hearts. Peace, secured and rendered permanent by the power which these multiplied improvements will contribute to establish and confirm; and that power itself regulated and governed by a wisdom which universal education is calculated almost inevitably to inspire. An opposite system—the preferred system of the enemies of the measure—that which the gentleman deems an evil incomparably less than a distribution of the revenue, is a scheme of universal wretchedness: it denies to the husbandman the product of his land; to the manufacturer the use of his loom; it forbids tranquillity to the intercourse of social life, and may imbitter the purest cup of domestic bliss: it fills the truest heart with angry passions, and converts the smiling fields of plenty into a desert waste: “havoc, and spoil and ruin are its game.”

A succession of statements has been exhibited from the Treasury, showing the actual amount of public moneys deposited, and, in some instances at least, the manner in which they are disposed of or employed. Beyond these points, the periodical reports are altogether unsatisfactory. It is impossible that they should be otherwise. They prove, at least, (if they exhibit nothing more,) that while the Government, in not one of its various interests, is deriving any sort of benefit from the peculiar and embarrassing arrangement; that while favoritism may flourish, speculation grow rich, and patronage, in a long line of subordinate dependencies, may indulge its power and its pride, not an effort is made to wield the mighty engineering for the good of the people, or, so far as we know, to prevent the exercise of enormous and overgrown corruption. I do not speak of corruption as applied to the Government in any of its branches. It is not necessary that it should be engendered there, to prove the bad effects of the pernicious system. But the crop of evil consciences that may spring up under the influence of nearly forty millions now scattered broadcast through the land, and swelling in rapid accumulation into I know not how many millions more; the nature and the means of applying these corrupting objects to weak or venal minds, may become a scandal to the republic, although its rulers may be innocent of all active agency, and even ignorant of the fact itself.

In the estimate or enumeration of sources from which the funds have been derived, a distinction is drawn between the deposits of the Treasurer of the United States and those of other officers. If, by this, it be intended to express any thing more than an accidental derivation of them as to place or person, it is a distinction without a difference, against which I would anxiously protest. It is an error replete with mischief to suppose that moneys in the hands of subordinate or accounting officers are not moneys already belonging, in every useful sense, to the Treasury of the United States. It may not be very material here, but I take the liberty to notice it as not an uncommon error. The mistake arises from the want of due discrimination between the Treasury of the United States and the Treasury Department, as an arm or organ of the Government. Certain rules are adopted for the purpose of bringing under the immediate view and efficient control of the proper Department a portion—composing, indeed, nearly the whole of the finances of the Government, but still only a portion of them. The remainder, comparatively small as it is, is expended before it reaches the Department, in certain salaries and minor incidents of office, and by the collectors of the customs largely in the payment of debentures. The mass is then brought into the great depository of the nation by a machinery which is rendered somewhat complicated by the extent of the country and the number of agents employed, but which rests upon principles as simple as the elements of mathematical science. None of it—not a farthing—whether in the hands of the agents, or paid over by them, can be expended without an appropriation by law. The only difference is, that the lawful expenditures of the agents are made under previous appropriations, without a warrant from the Secretary of the Treasury; whereas the moneys which are properly the subject of such warrant are those which have been accounted for by the receivers as the surplus in their hands, and are drawn for in consequence of appropriations subsequently made. Both are alike public moneys. Both are within the clause of the constitution which speaks of “appropriations made by law,” but says nothing of a warrant; and both are therefore in the Treasury. I ask if a farthing of the money in a collector’s hands could be disbursed, or employed, or used in any way, except as the law directs? Why not? Simply because the constitution has forbidden it. But the constitution has forbidden no such use, employment, or disbursement, except as to money in the Treasury. It prohibits the drawing of it only “from the Treasury.” Then the term “Treasury,” (which is used, I believe, but once in the constitution,) applies to all funds belonging to the Government—to funds in the possession of the first receiver or elsewhere. The Treasury is not this or that particular place of deposit. It is not merely a stationary or locomotive strong box, in which the gold and silver of the nation is secured. It is not the vaults of a bank or the coffers of a capitalist. It is the present fixed right of immediate enjoyment vested in the Government, which, without precise locality or prolonged duration of movement, becomes perfect in the Government the moment the fund has ceased to belong to the individual by whom it is paid. It recognises no intermediate stage of fiscal existence—no probationary or expiatory purgatory. It admits no compromise of principle which would lead to an indulgence in flagrant abuses. All the revenues of the Government might be perverted to the sordid purposes of the particular officer, who might become a trading usurer to the amount of millions; or, which would be still worse, they might be abused to the corrupt and venal purposes of a profligate ascendancy, whenever such a one shall exist, and be base enough to avail itself of the opportunity: for all the resources of the nation must, in succession, pass through this dangerous channel. The extent of profligacy might become as unlimited as the temptation to a weak or vicious mind would be irresistible. No, sir; there is no sound distinction between moneys derived from the Treasurer and those derived from other officers. The receivers of public moneys may settle their accounts periodically or otherwise, as you will; its payment over, or absolute appropriation, without stop or period to the Government, in the proper sense of the word appropriation, must be a rule without any exception, or the purity of the republic is the shadow of a name.

That the subject of the augmented revenue requires legislation, is admitted by the bill on your table which purports to regulate the deposit banks. That it requires early legislation, will not be denied by those who have earnestly made that bill a candidate for early favor and consideration. Insufficient as it must be regarded for its professed purposes; coming into the House with all its imperfections on its head; it must, sooner or later, be taken up for consideration, and must then be supplied with its necessary improvements, (if it be susceptible of them,) in the course of its passage; or, possibly, it may be borne along in triumph on the car of the previous question, which alike silences all opposition and buries all amendments.

That the vast accumulation of money is an evil, will not gravely be contested, if the fact itself cannot be disproved. It has resolved the doubt of Tacitus whether the gods in anger or in favor deny us wealth: “Argentum et aurum propitii aut irati Dii negaverint, dubito.” It was said long ago, (and history and experience confirm the truth of the remark,) that those countries are seldom wise or prosperous in which the precious metals are abundantly produced. The sage policy of the republic of Switzerland prohibited the owners to explore the mines with which some of their mountains are said to abound. A purer and a richer tribute was produced by the hand of industry, prompted to exertion by the spirit of liberty which guided the ploughshare through their rugged precipices, and reaped the harvest on their almost barren sides. Wealth may be to nations, as we have the highest authority for believing it is sometimes to individuals, a curse.

The great difficulty in the whole scheme, and in its shining and delusive results, is, that it is a mystery—an experimental mystery. It is a mystery, perhaps, to the Government, and certainly to the people. It hangs like a dark cloud over the destinies of the nation, imbiting its enjoyments and darkening its hopes. It is not an answer to this unquestionable fact, that the evils under which the people suffer are the result of a panic, which time and cool reflection will dispel. They are not less real on that account. Mankind is always influenced, to a greater or less degree, by something besides the sober reality. Panic may be itself the result of unnecessary or misjudging apprehension; but the consequences of it are any thing but imaginary and insignificant. The gorgon’s head was more fatal than the sword. Panic has been the prolific source of enormous mischief from the time at least when the host of Syria was overwhelmed before Samaria by the fancied noise of the horsemen and the chariots of Israel. At this very moment there exists, certainly in the Atlantic cities, and probably in the interior of the country, an almost unprecedented degree of pecuniary pressure, accompanied by an exaggerated state of prices both for real estate and the various conveniences of life. Labor is high, and yet money is scarce. An unnatural state of things like this can proceed only from extraordinary and unnatural causes. Capitalists stand aghast, and close their hands in fear. Speculation usurps the place of well-regulated business, the ordinary channels of which are injuriously disturbed.

To prevent the continuance and recurrence of these evils, early, and, it should seem, permanent provision is necessary. An excess of revenue will, in all probability, exist in future; and it is unwise to apply only a temporary relief to a mischief so enduring. Upwards of three hundred millions of acres of unappropriated lands are estimated still to exist within the States and Territories. There are seven hundred millions more beyond the Mississippi and Missouri. Many hundred years must elapse before emigration will convert into the abodes of civilized man a thousand millions of acres of almost interminable solitudes. With the most lavish and wasteful expenditures of the Government in all its branches; with a departure at once from both of the characteristic marks of the reign of Queen Elizabeth—economy and vigor—it is scarcely possible that the ordinary resources of the nation should not exceed its ordinary wants and expenditures, leaving the proceeds of the public lands to distinct and specific appropriation. What a curious comparison is exhibited between the expenses of the present day and those of 1789, when, in times of primitive simplicity, a little more than six hundred thousand dollars covered all the disbursements of the country—a sum less than three fourths of the present expenditures of Congress alone.

Notwithstanding the urgent calls for distribution, we are constantly informed that the idea of a surplus revenue is delusive—that means enough are before us to absorb the prodigious mass. Where, and what are they? While estimate after estimate has been produced and proved in every way to show how erroneous is this suggestion, not a counter calculation is exhibited, and the argument is contented to rest upon vague surmise and indefinite and sickly anticipation. The evidence of every sense is to be distrusted for the sake of a partisan theory. Faith was said of old to be able to remove mountains; but it is now magnified into an energy sufficient to disprove their actual and obvious existence. There is the mass of evil almost before your eyes, swelling in amount and mischief every hour. You are unable to reduce it, in fact, or by any probable or plausible conjecture. I will not go over calculations which have been repeated many times. I adopt, with entire confidence, those presented yesterday by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] in what he was content to call a mere business speech, but which gave to business all the attractiveness of pleasure. The estimates exhibited by him were liberal in the extreme; yet they leave an excess beyond the proposed distribution and threatened expenditure combined. What is the consequence? Why, that the sturdiest enemies of distribution are unable or unwilling to bring their creed to the test of arithmetic: they substitute prophecy for calculation; they prefer conjecture to reality; they do not venture to say that there is not, but that there will not be, a fund for division. When pressed to put down the items that will absorb the mass, they fly to items of fancy, which can scarcely be made the subjects of argument. They are compelled to infuse a large ingredient of very remote surmise even into their vague and improbable predictions. Passing from things at home, where extravagance, though vast, is not absolutely boundless, they suggest a possible condition abroad. A European war, which, at some uncertain day, may break out and involve the destinies of America in its consuming vortex, or some other phantom, usurps the place of substance and reality. Never did an occasion exist when, in a state of peace, treasures were justly heaped together, and hoarded up to await the bare contingency of future war. Vexatious, and disreputable, and distressing, as the disturbances on the Southwestern frontier undoubtedly are, I cannot agree that, with proper treatment, even now, they are sufficiently formidable to interfere with the principle which I have thus advanced. In free Governments, at least, the rule is settled that measures to sustain warlike expeditions and movements must, in the main, be resorted to whenever the emergency may chance to come. Existing resources must be cherished and improved. But to dry up the fountain, in order that it may reserve its streams for the uses of futurity, would be to leave the present race without enjoyment, and to deprive posterity of hope. Miserable would be the condition of that people who, from a sickly fear of undefined danger—a feeling the most degrading that can curse our nature—should burden themselves with exactions and restraints, should deny themselves suitable expenditures and enjoyments, because a lurid star might happen to glimmer in the imagination of some feeble-minded statesmen. They would resemble only the individual who, in the full possession of robust and vigorous health, but incapable of appreciating or enjoying it, should deny to appetite its necessary food, and minister to a wholesome constitution the nostrums of disease, until he should become the prey of a preposterous and pernicious empiricism.

Loans are resorted to when they are required by necessity. No statesman believes that he can carry on war without them. There is no danger of disappointment in the hope of realizing them, unless the country, in its ordinary course, has been impoverished by withholding from it its natural and proper supplies. Money is the sinews of war, but it is the free-will offering of the open right hand of peace. It is the fertilizing spirit which gives life, and vigor, and activity, to all things; and it cannot be withheld except with the effect of present suffering and future imbecility.

A happier thought than the distribution, at least of the proceeds of the public lands, has seldom been conceived. It reconciles the highest attainable practical good with the strictest construction of the constitution. I should feel no necessity, for myself, to recur to this intermediate agency (if it be such) of the States for distribution. But I know full well that proud and honorable feelings unite with sound and enlightened judgments in requiring it; and the peculiar mode of reaching the object, which is itself free from reasonable objection, is rendered indispensable. If, through such fair and legitimate arrangements, the whole country can be brought to harmonize in one general sense of concurring approbation, how full of benefits and blessings is the proceeding.

When the purposes of the General Government are fully supplied, it is best that its connexion with the disbursement of the public revenues should cease. It is the true policy of the constitution that the National Government should be as seldom as possible seen and felt; that, in all external relations, it should present the formidable aspect of power, and the means of prosperous and successful intercourse with foreign nations; but that at home even the benefits which it sheds upon its own citizens should be experienced as nature receives, and prospers under the influence of, her refreshing dews, while the sources from which they flow are imperceptible. The organization of the Government does not even contemplate a home department, which necessarily exists as a branch of the different European systems. It exhibits in prominent relief a bureau of foreign affairs as a principal agent, resting upon military and naval departments as its pillars. If, when thus unseen in the direct performance of its domestic duties, it can realize all the wished-for results, without threat of danger to the liveliest sensibilities, without a suspicion of usurpation or encroachment; if it can maintain its dignified bearing and successful intercourse with foreign nations, and at the same moment "scatter plenty o'er a smiling land," the system is as brilliant in theory as its practical exercise is felicitous. Were I the warmest personal friend of the President, I would wish him no richer consolation, no happier subject for reflection in the calm evening of his lengthened day, than a belief that his recommendation had been the parent of this most salutary scheme. It would be less perishable than a laurel crown. Were I the warmest of his political adherents, I would cherish it as the brightest ornament of his public career. It would be more ennobling than a hundred victories. A whole country made fair, and cheerful, and prosperous—a whole people educated, enlightened, and refined—are peaceful monuments of enduring strength and grandeur, surpassing those of the triumphal arch erected on the sufferings of thousands of the human family.

Whenever the period has arrived at which distribution can be made without interfering with the paramount necessities of the nation, it can justly be withheld no longer. By the cessions of the several members of the confederation of their lands, the United States became not a mere proprietor, but a trustee. They received the lands in trust, for purposes of general good, for the use and benefit of all the States. How much might be realized from this great trust in the long course of aftertime, or how long its products would be required for purposes merely national, was not foreseen or fancied. It would depend upon many circumstances, and chiefly upon the rapid growth of population and prosperity in the States themselves, which, absorbing the private lands in their own limits, would send forth a host of hardy emigrants as pioneers of the Western wilderness. As long as the products of their purchases were necessary to replenish the general Treasury, they could not be applied to other purposes. They would not be, and they were not, distributed. These other purposes were necessarily postponed for such as were primary and were essential. But when the objects of absolute and preliminary use should be fully satisfied, and the sales of land should yield only an unprofitable and dangerous superfluity; and yet when they could not be intermitted without checking the progress of useful emigration, or be reduced in price without violating pledges of the strongest implication, and plunging into ruin a countless extent of private interests—the ceded lands must return in prolific plenty to the people, for whom they were always designed, and to whose uses, directly or indirectly, they ever have been, and I trust ever will be, sacredly devoted. It matters not what is the practicable shape they may assume. The prosperity of the Union is essential to the well-being of the States. That being secured by an appropriation of all that it requires, the States themselves will receive and dispose of, directly for themselves, the funds which their own grants have created. The trust was not confined to purposes of war or peace. It was not limited by any futile attempts at preternatural anticipation. Its products were to be applied as circumstances, regulated only by our own energies, encouraged by the smiles of Providence, might require. The constitution was wisely confined to the provision of means for creating revenue. It conferred upon the proper department in the distribution of powers—the Legislature—an authority to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; but it provided no rule for the disposition of excessive wealth. In the absence of constitutional provisions, we have been turned by gentlemen to the articles of confederation, as the true interpreter of the grants by the States. The search is, if possible, still more unprofitable there. Why should it not be so? That instrument, as well as its successor, (the constitution,) was the offspring of a representation considerably wider than that of the people from whom the lands were derived. To have permitted it to control the grants themselves, which upon well-established principles can, if they please, alone regulate what they cede, would be illegal and unjust. The objects of the trust must be looked for only in the language and spirit of the grants, and in the fitness and propriety of things. Besides, it would be difficult to conceive how an earlier could be the corollary of a later instrument; how a confederation formed on the 9th of July, 1778, could be designed as the commentary upon a series of cessions to which it was long anterior; the first of them not having taken place until the 1st of March, 1781, and the last until the 24th of April, 1802. As must inevitably be the case, there is not a word in the articles of confederation which bears upon the question, or can be tortured into an exponent of the several grants.

If there be no excuse in positive prohibition; in implied or express devotion to other objects, or in necessary uses for the money elsewhere, (any one of which would be clearly paramount,) what reason can be offered for withholding from the people their obvious and acknowledged right? Who can justify a postponement that would thus become unnatural? With these sources of prosperity at hand, the nation may advance, in the short space of months, to a situation which, under other circumstances, in centuries it might not reach; yet the bright prospect is to be destroyed, and the long-cherished hope of the nation is to be still deferred, while the desired object is almost within its tantalizing grasp, and all for the employment of a subtle scruple, or the indulgence of an idle fear.

As it is admitted that the distribution so ardently desired has thus far been postponed to the actual wants of the Government, it is conceded now that these, so far as they are reasonable, shall be first supplied. Look to the fixed objects of appropriation. Throw in the contingencies, ordinary and extraordinary. Let them neither be exaggerated nor stinted. Before you come to the work of expenditure, agree to a division of the surplus that shall remain; and we will cordially unite with you in liberal expenditures, if they are not positively extravagant and unjust.

The appropriation bill for fortifications is a liberal one. It was reported at a time when I am sure there was the strongest disposition to make it so. Speaking as a member of the committee which reported it, I believe there was scarcely any thing within the compass of a richly endowed Treasury, which would consist with other equally important arrangements, that would not cheerfully have been devoted to the necessary defence, and even warlike preparations of the country. If a proposal to inquire into the expediency of increasing the navy was not equally acceptable, it was because it did not embrace a more comprehensive and vigorous plan of general protection; because, by far the larger part of the navy, although in one sense already existing, was yet to be made available, before increase could be properly or usefully applied to it; and because all other defences were fearfully and shamefully defective. The bill now before us was reported on the 29th of December, at a moment when the pacific relations of the country were suspended by a single thread. The supplemental message of the President appeared on the 18th of January, bearing date the 15th of the month, recommending a prohibition of French products, and of the entry of French vessels into our ports. On the 23d of January a bill, precisely such as seemed desirable, was reported by the Committee on Naval Affairs. Its object was not to increase the navy to the extent of a single plank. Such a proposition would have been, during a moment of serious exigency, both useless and impracticable. It proposed merely the appropriation of a sufficient sum (in blank) to complete the vessels building, to repair and equip for sea those in ordinary, and to procure materials for rebuilding those for which partial appropriations had before been made. All of these objects were attainable. The mediation of Great Britain did not reach us until the 8th of February, about a fortnight afterwards. Under such circumstances, and with a pressure so extreme, it might naturally be supposed that the call was at least as large then as it ought to be now. It contemplates, in its original shape, expenditures for its especial objects, amounting to something less than $2,000,000. A corresponding bill, which was passed on the 30th of June, 1834, called for only $870,594. A single amendment has been offered, asking for $700,000 more. The original bill and this amendment combined do not bear any great disproportion to the call in 1834; as it will be borne in mind that, for causes to which personally I am a stranger, there was no appropriation to these objects in 1835. Although, for reasons not exactly similar to those which existed at the end of the year, I would not be indisposed to adopt the items of the bill, and the amendment too, if they can be usefully expended during the current year. They will at least relieve the plethoric Treasury of a portion of its load. I am not at liberty to applaud the skill in strategy which the amendment would have indicated, but for the declaration of the mover of it, that he disbelieves in the existence of a redundant revenue.

For the navy I would go much further. Few can doubt that when this nation disregards its maritime interests, it will forget its truest friend in peace, its most efficient champion in war, its proudest ornament at all times; It will turn aside from the high behests of Heaven, which has committed to it the protection of a coast, the vast extent of which proclaims the guardianship it requires; and a population whose daring qualities fit them especially for the perils of the sea, and whose intense activity never can be satisfied except with the opportunity of penetrating into every corner of the globe. Navy yards, docks, and convenient harbors, are objects of primary importance, as they are the positions in which this favorite limb of our gigantic system can occasionally repose. It is a limb which cannot be touched amiss without making every nerve in the great body itself to thrill, every artery to swell, every pulse to beat in redoubled quickness. The number and position of these navy stations, as they now exist, (except, of course, that of Pensacola,) and the absence of them where they do not, are points of policy much earlier in their origin than that of the present administration. At a period which, in these degenerate and distracted times, we are in the habit of looking back to, historically, as the golden age of the republic, all of them were selected. Even that period of comparative brightness had its cloudy days; and what period of individual or national existence is without them? During the very month when this measure was adopted, the boldest, and, for a time the most unpopular, act of the first administration was taken—that of sending Mr. Jay as envoy to England; and thus preserving, as an efficient navy will be the means of preserving, the happy neutrality of the country.

These events occurred in the time of General Washington, who, though himself a Virginian, and like every other child of that magna mater virum, justly proud of his maternity, was as little likely to be influenced by sectional feelings as any of his countrymen. He certainly had no especial predilections for the North, or any disposition to disparage or postpone the Southern portion of his country. Under his auspices, and by his personal direction, as communicated by the Secretary of War, long before a Navy Department existed, the selection was made. After careful re-examination, the selections thus made were confirmed by a succeeding administration, and the positions have been practically approved by every administration which followed, to the present time, including a period of more than forty years. Thus, after deliberate selection and repeated approval, after receiving the sanction of well-tryed experience and protracted time, it requires little argument to prove that a change ought not to be made without great deliberation and satisfactory cause. In sustaining them, we are not to be considered as supporting the policy of this administration, or the especial policy of any individual, but that system which is to be regarded as the settled policy of the republic. All the institutions of the country, resting upon a basis broader and deeper still, might as well be identified with the peculiar policy of a particular administration, if its mere and necessary, and it may be reluctant, adoption of them, should make them in any respect its own. We do not embrace the principles or sustain the policy of the administration. If it has adopted and is sustaining ours in any particulars, it is no reason for our abandoning that which, long before the existence of the present administration, became our own.

In the selection of positions for any of the works of national utility, or of protection from the wars of the elements or man, no preference can or ought to be given to one portion of the coast, or country, unless that preference is already pointed out by nature, and circumstances that are beyond control. To submit to the awards of Providence is not to make a preference. It is scarcely to create an equality. You avail yourself of local advantages, or supply local wants, where it is practicable to do so, without interfering with the constitution, or the just and equal distribution of public benefits, wherever they can be bestowed. In a well-regulated system, funds are disbursed where they are required, and where they can be made available; and no proper judgment can expect that, because they have been expended where they are required, they should be thrown away where they are not. If Philadelphia happens to be placed not far from the head of tidewaters of a long and difficult navigation, at the entrance of which into the broad ocean a climate is found, under the auspices of which the ancients would have said the cave of Æolus was dug, more than a million is expended upon a breakwater; yet you still leave the harbor inferior to those of the accessible cities of the North, or of the more genial climate of the South. Upon these nothing would be expended for similar works in order to create a mere equality in theory where there is no practical preference or postponement. Fortifications and other like measures of defence, to prevent and repel encroachments from the ocean or territorial neighbors, are resorted to on the sea-girt or land-encircled borders of the country. A happy exemption from similar perils obviates the call for such provisions for the rising capitals of the interior. Light-houses, and piers, and harbors, and even Indian agencies, and all the muniments of war, and appliances of peaceful preparation, are provided where congruity and the fitness of things require them, but they would be idle and unprofitable expenditures elsewhere.

Several gentlemen, in the course of recent discussions, have placed (I think deservedly) at the head of the list of objects of merited expenditure and regard, our imperfectly constituted navy. Is it not worthy of protection? I am not proclaiming its eulogium. Let its own unvarnished history speak, and interest alone, without borrowing for it a single ray of well-earned glory, will confirm the policy. When the first few ships sailed which still bear their flag with honor into every sea, the beneficial effect upon the commerce of the country, and consequently upon its general prosperity, was immediate and unquestionable. Insurance, at that time extravagantly high, fell at once one half on voyages to China and the East Indies, and to other places in proportion. A committee of this House, reporting on the 17th January, 1799, on that part of the President's message which relates to a naval establishment, estimate the saving on different objects at seven and a half per cent., and the effect is wonderful.

They estimate the exports and imports for one year at	$100,000,000
Vessels employed in foreign trade,	27,126,400
Coasters and fishermen,	7,178,760
	$134,305,160

Of which, seven and a half per cent. saved on the first two items, and one per cent. on the last, amount to	$9,578,517 60
And the annual expense of the existing navy was	2,434,261 10

Making a pecuniary gain of	$7,144,256 50

"Timely disbursements to provide for danger," said General Washington, "frequently prevent much greater disbursements to repel it." A suitable marine was not possessed before the war upon our trade was begun by the two great belligerent nations, who vied with each other not more in their mighty struggles for supremacy than in their ruthless violation of neutral rights. It was well remarked by the Secretary of the Navy, in his communication to a committee of this House, at the close of the year 1798, that if it had been, we should not have lost, by depredations on our trade, four times the sum necessary to create and maintain it during the whole time the war had existed in Europe. He adds, with prophetic spirit: "If we do not profit by experience, and put ourselves in a situation to resent insult and punish aggression, nothing is more likely than that in less than half a dozen years another occasion may be presented for a repetition of the same mortifying observation." The mortifying observation was repeated. It was repeated for more than thirty years absolutely in vain. At the expiration of a still longer period, the nation was on the eve of a war of countless expenditure of blood and treasure, to recover (as was supposed) amends of reprisals for withholding the payment of about one half of the principal sum, for the payment of which a slow promise had at length been wrung. What a world of loss and trouble had been saved by a recourse to early and honorable and glorious prevention!

To meet the objects of the country, actual increase in the number of vessels is not so immediately necessary as a vigorous use of those which already exist in completion or in progress. Put into the water what we are furnished with on paper, and the interest and honor of the nation will not be held lightly in any quarter of the globe. The great Frederick of Prussia once declared that, without a hundred ships of the line, and a hundred thousand sailors, a nation ought not to expose itself upon the ocean. He misjudged. Thirteen ships of the line, all of them of majestic proportions, and most of them of stubborn stuff, one of them, as she is familiarly called, the largest ship in the world; fourteen frigates of the first class, (only three of which are on the ocean, and others of them are unfit for sea service;) two frigates of the second class, and fifteen sloops of war, besides smaller vessels and steamboats, would present, if in condition, a squadron of four-and-forty hearts of oak, of which, when equipped and manned, and bristling with formidable armaments, and spreading their white wings, and boldly careering on the deep, any crowned head in Christendom might well be proud. Hundreds of gallant officers stand straining in the slips, anxious for employment and promotion. Thousands of swelling bosoms are panting for their places, whenever they shall be rendered vacant by the budding honors of those whom they are hoping to succeed.

I say not a word of preparing for war in time of peace; although there is certainly a position which is desirable for every nation, where, in the words of the first President of these United States, it "may choose peace or war, as interest, guided by justice, shall counsel." The true object of every preparation is, the maintenance of an honorable and a prosperous peace. Peace is the natural condition of mankind; it is the condition of true dignity and real usefulness. That nation which will not preserve it while it can must be predisposed, like the ancient Carthaginians, to sacrifice its children to idols. By self-respect, at all times carefully maintained, and a readiness, not ostentatiously exhibited, to enforce respect from others who are disposed to withhold it, it will secure the applause of men and angels.

Among the important measures almost immediately before us, I have adverted to the one of proposed investigation and scrutiny into the condition of the public moneys in the deposite banks. A considerable time ago, inquiries of a different character, and with different objects, were suggested in debate, which were then made the topics of consideration and remark. I am the rather induced to urge the right of such inquiries, because of the authority which was then imputed to the mere suggestions of the heads of particular bureaux. Granting, for the argument's sake, all the ability, experience, diligence, and skill, which were claimed for them, can the existence of all those qualities close the book in which our duties are written, or make the measure of our performance of them full? I join issue with the argument which would create or shift a burden of proof as to the propriety or fallibility of a communication the moment it is made. Were it so, a Secretary would have nothing to do but close his lips to explanations, and the wildest estimates that folly ever framed become irrevocable law, as disproof may be impracticable; because it depends upon the very information that is thus withheld. The condition of this body would resemble the occasional state of the by-gone Parliaments of France, which, in the presence of an absolute monarch, reposing literally on his bed of power, miscalled his "bed of justice," registered his decrees in abject and inevitable submission to his will.

The little experience I have had in legislation informs me that practice is quite at variance with this presumption of infallibility on the part of executive officers, independently of all questions as to their intelligence or worth. Inquiries are made, and explanations are called for, in all instances when the members of committees are not satisfied for themselves. Similar results await similar duties in the House. No where is the nullius in verba rule of Horace more applicable than in matters of legislation. Taste may be formed and exercised, partially, at least, by faith; but the true performance of legislative duties is, or ought to be, the consequence of sight alone. Push the suggestion home, and observe to what pernicious consequences, to what false inferences, it will lead. If the sayings of the Departments are binding, their doings ought to be equally infallible. Every thing, past and present, is to be regarded as in a condition of perfect security; all our relations are prosperous, because it is the duty of the Executive to keep them so! At least, concentrating in itself the details of universal agency, placed on an eminence that it may survey the whole surrounding hemisphere, it should mark every rising vapor, perceive every distant cloud, and foretell the coming storm; or leave the nation assured that an unclouded sky extends to the utmost limits of the vast horizon that every where surrounds it. Have the sentinels on the watchtower discharged these duties faithfully? Is the country provided with all it should desire? Has nothing mischievous been done, or nothing good omitted to be done? Has nothing been lost, or put in jeopardy, that vigilance might have guarded against, or precaution saved? On these occasions, when this legislative tribunal sits in solemn judgment to consider the state of the Union, it seems to be usual to look behind us, and around us, and before us, and to gather together all that may gild or tarnish the recollection of the past, or cheer or darken our future destiny. What part, then, of your national preparations, either for peace or war, is in a condition of which you could venture to be proud? Come with me along the whole line of seacoast from Maine to Florida, from the confines of Canada to the debatable limits of Mexico: will the eye of doating confidence itself slumber over the numerous defenceless and dismantled fortifications—the dust and ashes which remain to mark the place where stood at least one feeble tower of defence—the crumbling ruins of I know not how many more? The whole lengthened line is naked and defenceless, either from the want of provision of permanent objects of reliance, or from an omission to supply the relinquishments which time and accident require. All the Southern shore, every inch of it, according to the acknowledgment of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, has been “shamefully neglected” in the article even of navy yards, to say nothing of more important provisions for a time of need. I take for the argument his better knowledge, instead and in preference to my own inferences, founded, it seems, on a fallacious confidence, at least to this extent. I had supposed, in undoubting trust, that suitable stations did not exist in that quarter; that the depth of water was not sufficient; or that some other overruling cause had forbidden the attempt; and not that the providence of God had been shamefully neglected, or that it was disgracefully thwarted by the want of providence of man.

But the stations that exist, are they supplied? Have they men, or have they armaments? Could a salute have been fired if the harbinger of glad tidings had chanced, on a late occasion, to spread his white banner in the view of almost any one of them? I speak not at all of warlike preparations, but of those which become the piping times of peace. It was long since known to the Finance Committee of this House, (although then wisely communicated by the Department almost in sacred confidence, lest mischief might happen from its publication,) that scarcely a gun or a gun-carriage in any of the proper abiding-places, if such things existed at all, was fit for any service, except the very menial service of a by-word and a reproach.

Your naval preparations: are they essentially efficient and mature? I will not repeat the defects in maritime arrangement, with the complaints of which the whole country undoubtedly resounds, from careless contracts, up to the defective (because not understood) discipline which ought to bind together the component parts of this interesting and powerful machine. But your sloops of war: do they maintain the gallant bearing, the proud supremacy in swiftness and in strength, in grace and beauty of proportion, in fitness for all their duties, which were once accorded to them in every sea? Your officers: are they encouraged and kept in heart by becoming selections and employments, that would serve as the reward of merit and the crown of zeal? Are their ardent sensibilities fanned with the hope of seasonable promotion? or are the wisest and the weakest heads suffered alike to grow gray in situations of subordinate rank?

Your public moneys—but I forbear to press the inquiry here. Clouds and darkness rest upon them!

Your Western and Southwestern frontier: has it been guarded against the attacks of murderous savages? Are the properties and the lives of the citizens? and have they been exposed to no unnecessary ravages—to no mischiefs that could have been foreseen and avoided? Have treaties been regarded on our side; and has not the fulfilment of them been unduly exacted upon theirs? It is no longer unknown to any who have chosen to inquire, that intimations of the approaching storm were given again and again, and were as often disregarded. As long ago as March, 1835, from the highest official sources, cautions were communicated against attempts to enforce against the Seminole tribe a doubtful treaty; or, if it should be intended to be enforced, that competent means should be at hand to induce submission, or it would end in the butchery of these poor savages. Every precaution was omitted, and every prediction was verified, except that the expected victims became the ministers of the sacrifice.

These inquiries and suggestions are not made in the way of unnecessary reproach, but with a view to unite in preparing to meet and breast the coming wave which more than threatens to swell and break on our borders, from the Gulf of Mexico, all along perhaps to Lake Superior. Nothing is so contagious as the zeal derived from victory. It is especially so among those with whom success was probably altogether unexpected; and among whom not to be defeated is to overcome.

Depend upon it, there is no error in a popular Government half so fatal, no delusion so bewitching, and yet so likely to betray, as a blind confidence in those who happen for the time to rule. A burden of undoubting faith in the infallibility of a Government, and the necessity of disproving it when the means of so doing are withheld, would resemble the slavery of the victims of that bondage which bound them to a task which was rendered impracticable by the absence of the materials with which it was to be performed.

An honorable gentleman complained the other day that we were hurried into repeated expenditures for hostilities of which no record could be found. The traveller passing over those deserted fields will find a mournful record of blood and ashes: farms destroyed—houses burnt or pillaged—inhabitants driven off or slain. An Indian warfare admits of none of the ordinary records in which are inscribed the causes of the hostilities of civilized man. No warning herald's voice proclaims the intended invasion, which is announced only by the war-whoop that accompanies it. The death-dealing tomahawk is substituted for the herald's spear. The manifesto that proclaims the catalogue of wrongs which are about to be avenged, is written only on the tablets of bleeding human hearts.

These disasters have come upon our borders without being met by competent preparation and successful resistance. Still, in a conflict between placing disbursements in the hands of those whom I did not contribute to elevate to high places, on the one hand, and seeing the country suffer from the want of them on the other, I cannot hesitate. Patronage may be abused for a season, and we may mourn over the abuse of it; but the energies of patriotism will rise above the most untoward temporary influences. These are, it is hoped, but domestic vapors, which the next sun's rays may dissolve or dissipate; while a stain upon the honor or interests of the country may be indelible. In the preparations that are made for continuing peace or contingent war, in all that is hoped for and all that is feared, the lessons of true wisdom and universal experience teach us that we be true to ourselves. Whatever is necessary to protect the citizen, to defend the country—whether the foe prowls in the forest or move upon the deep—must be provided, cost what it may. The fairest claims on foreign Powers, the soundest arguments that can sustain them, are disregarded among nations unless they are backed by strength. "There can be no greater error," says General Washington, "than to expect or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. 'Tis an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard." It is the happy and sagacious thought of a writer on the military policy of Great Britain, who thinks scarcely less like a statesman than a soldier, that, whatever might have been the case in the golden age, Astræa has never since been acknowledged upon earth, when she has forgotten to bring along with her her sword.

When Mr. INGERSOLL had concluded,

Mr. HALL, of Vermont, rose and said he could not reconcile it to his sense of duty to his constituents to remain longer silent in relation to events which were daily passing before him. He would have preferred to submit the very general view which he intended to take of some of the most important measures before Congress, when a bill then on the table from the Senate (the land bill) should come up for discussion; but he had very lately been warned, by some rather ominous votes of the House, that it might be the pleasure of gentlemen to prevent any direct action of the House on that bill, and he had therefore determined to avail himself of the present occasion. He knew it was the desire of gentlemen to take the question that night, and he should condense his remarks in such a manner as to occupy as little of the time of the committee as was practicable.

We have, as I think, (said Mr. H.,) reached a new and extraordinary era in the affairs of this nation. When we came together in December, we were in the midst of an excitement arising out of an apprehended war with France. During the existence of that excitement, when it was supposed by the country that real and imminent danger existed of an almost immediate war with a most powerful foreign nation, we were furnished by the Executive with an estimate of appropriations which would be required for the year. Do you remember, sir, the amount of those requisitions? I will remind you of them. They were as follows:

Ordinary appropriations specifically called for, - - - - -	$17,515,933
Computation of extraordinary appropriations, to meet all anticipated contingencies, - - - - -	5,617,707
Making, in the whole, - - - - -	$23,133,640

This, sir, you will observe, was the estimate submitted to us during the existence of our difficulties with France; a war estimate; or, at least, such an estimate as the executive branch of the Government thought it proper to recommend, under the possible, if not probable, contingency of a war with a powerful foreign nation. And a comparison of the amount with former estimates will show that it greatly exceeded those of previous years; and that, upon the principles on which the Government has heretofore acted, it could only be justified by the uncertain and somewhat alarming state of our foreign affairs. Now, sir, all our difficulties are amicably adjusted; the nation is at peace; no foreign war is apprehended; and suddenly, as if by magic, a new warlike watchword is rung in our ears. It is sounded from the Capitol, echoed in the newspapers, sought to be published in the streets, and proclaimed from the house-tops. "National defence! national defence!" is the cry; and we, sir, of the minority, who have heretofore been branded as wasteful and extravagant legislators for our votes in favor of reasonable appropriations for fortifications, are now approached by the same gentlemen who lately denounced us, and very gravely asked if we are not in favor of appropriations for the "national defence!" Even the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] who has never been over-liberal in his support of appropriations for fortifications, and whose name, in the journal of the last session, stands recorded in opposition to mine, against an appropriation of sixty-seven thousand dollars, for one of the precise objects for which the present bill, reported by him, contains an appropriation of one hundred and fifty thousand dollars; he, sir, now seems ready to question even the patriotism of any one who hesitates to swallow, without examination, the most Quixotic projects for squandering the public money, under the name of expenditures for the national defence. Sir, this is no cry of patriotism; it is the cry of border interest and of party; and, for one, I shall not respond to it. The conversion of gentlemen is altogether too sudden, the object too palpable, to give to their new efforts any other character than that of the ridiculous; and by that character they must and will be known to the country. As to myself, sir, I shall keep straight ahead on my old track. I have always voted in favor of liberal appropriations for the national defence, and I shall continue to vote for them. I shall cheerfully vote for the one hundred and fifty thousand dollars for fortifying Boston harbor, uninfluenced by the last year's opposition of the honorable chairman, and for any other appropriations which have a reasonable claim to our approbation. But, sir, I will not vote for appropriations merely to get rid of the public money. I shall first inquire, as I have heretofore done, whether the object for which the money is asked be a proper one; and if it be, then whether the sum demanded can be profitably expended during the year. If I come to an affirmative conclusion on both these points, I shall vote for the appropriation; otherwise, I shall vote against it, and risk the denunciations of all new converts to the "national defence" party.

Sir, the secret of this new course of action, which is, indeed, no secret at all, is the discovery of a large surplus in the Treasury, which the people are desirous of having distributed among the States, and applied to some useful purpose. To prevent this distribution, we have, for the last two or three months, witnessed a state of things altogether new in the history of our legislation. Heretofore, the requisitions of the Departments were examined with some degree of scrutiny by the Committee of Ways and Means, to ascertain if they were necessary, or if some deduction from their amount might not reasonably be made. Formerly, when an unexpected requisition came in, you could discover, by the sober demeanor of the Committee of Ways and Means, that they were fearful of the effect of the new call on the House, and that they regretted the necessity which compelled them to advocate it. Now, the scene is entirely changed. No sooner does the chairman of that committee receive a call for a new appropriation, even for a few thousand dollars, than his countenance is lighted up with unusual joy; and on the prospect of a new Indian war, and the consequent call for an appropriation of a million, his exultation is extreme. He rises in his place, with great apparent self-gratulation, announces the fact to the House, and in a note of triumph informs us that we may stop talking about the surplus, for we shall now have an opportunity of spending it.

But, sir, gentlemen have not been content with the requisitions of the Executive. The Departments, contrary to all former practice, have been solicited, and importuned, and teased, by resolutions and letters of committees, and personal applications, for additional estimates. A resolution of the Senate of the 18th of February, asking for additional estimates, produced a brief letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting not his own views, but the imaginings of the Navy Commissioners; and a detailed report of the Secretary of War, overthrowing and "toppling down headlong" most of the tall projects of gentlemen for dissipating the revenue on fortifications—a report which does the highest credit to that distinguished officer, and which, had its production been the only act of his life, would have placed his name by the side of those of the most eminent statesmen of our country. The answer to this resolution was not a very digestible affair. The Secretary of the Navy said nothing. The Secretary of War interposed an argument that could not be controverted; and, what was no less insuperable, the President himself expressed an opinion in accordance with the Secretary. But gentlemen were not to be put aside by one refusal. The Senate place themselves in an imploring attitude, and address the Secretary in the language of supplication. Do, sir, be so good as to inform us the most you can possibly spend during the year in your Department. "What is the maximum amount?"—that is the language—that can be expended? This question was rather too extraordinary for so old-fashioned a man as the Secretary, and he seems to have been puzzled to know what to do with it. He knew the extravagant answer which the craving appetites of those who made the inquiry demanded, and that he could not give it without abandoning the estimates he had deliberately made at the commencement of the session, and contradicting all the principles he had so ably maintained in his report. But not desiring to be absolutely uncivil to so respectable and gentlemanly a body as the Senate of the United States, he hands over the resolution to the chief engineer: "Here, sir, you answer it." From the reputation which the chief engineer has—whether justly or not I will not pretend to say—of being the most liberal and latitudinarian of any officer in the Government in regard to appropriations, one might naturally suppose he would have found no difficulty in giving the required answer. But no such thing. Even he, sir, believes there is a limit within which expenditures should be circumscribed, and beyond which they become wasteful and extravagant. He, too, declines to answer, and, following the example of the Secretary, hands over the humble entreaty of the Senate to his subordinate; and we at length have the answer of a second lieutenant of engineers, in some half a dozen lines, saying that, in his opinion, some six millions may be beneficially expended on fortifications annually. And it is upon this naked opinion of a second lieutenant of engineers, without any designation of objects, or any reasons assigned for the extraordinary conclusion to which he has arrived, that we are to be called upon to appropriate millions of the public money.

Sir, the Secretary of War repudiates the idea of lavishing our resources on extensive fortifications on the seaboard—fortifications which it would require a large standing army to man, and which no enemy would be silly enough to go out of his way to attack, when he could accomplish any object of invasion much more conveniently by passing them beyond gunshot distance. He overthrows most conclusively the extended system of defence on which our former surveys were made, proposes to confine our fortifications to the protection of the important seaports from naval approaches, and to limit the extent of those works to their capability, with the aid of steam-batteries, of accomplishing that object, and of resisting sudden attacks—relying on the patriotism of the people, aided by the facilities afforded by the internal improvements of the country for the rapid concentration of force on any point of attack, as the great and leading means of national defence. He recommends a re-examination of sites, and a reconsideration of plans, before commencing new works. Sir, this is the language of reason and of common sense; and whoever adopts the principles of the Secretary will find it somewhat difficult to discover proper objects for the expenditure of much more than a tithe of the sum recommended—no, not recommended—extorted from one of the clerks in the office of the chief engineer. Besides, sir, we all know, that when the objects of appropriation are desirable, there is a limit beyond which money cannot be profitably expended in any given period of time. A document on our tables shows that there remained in the Treasury on the 1st of January last, of money before appropriated and not then expended, $8,726,000. Of this sum, more than two millions were of appropriations for repairs of ships and the increase and improvement of the navy; $133,000 for navy yards; and although no fortification bill passed at the last session, there still remained in the Treasury, at the beginning of the present year, over fifty-six thousand dollars of money previously appropriated for fortifications; and all this during the existing difficulties with France. Sir, either the Executive must have been wilfully negligent of its duties, or the unexpended money in the Treasury could not be profitably used. Gentlemen certainly will not take the first horn of the dilemma. Neither will I. We all know that the demand which the Government makes for the peculiar kind of materials and labor which it requires, may become greater than the natural means of supply; and that, when such point is reached, any attempt to force the prosecution of works must result either in a material reduction in their quality and value, or such a wasteful expenditure of money as no Government would engage in but during a period of the most extreme necessity and danger. Sir, most of the money under these extravagant appropriations cannot, and will not, be expended. It will still remain in the Treasury, and all attempts to drain it by this mode of operation will, so far as the money is not extravagantly wasted, be altogether nugatory. The Secretaries, both of War and the Navy, well understand this matter, and wisely decline making themselves responsible for these Quixotic appropriations. If gentlemen desire to assume a responsibility which the Executive declines, they are certainly at liberty to do so. I shall take care to wash my hands of the responsibility, by voting against the appropriations.

But, sir, the "national defence" project having encountered so many obstacles from the Departments, and it being ascertained that it will entirely fail of dissipating the public revenue, gentlemen have very industriously set themselves at work in inventing other schemes for accomplishing the same laudable object. I shall not stop to enumerate the various projects which this strife for the honor of being the inventor of the most expeditious and effectual mode of draining the Treasury has produced. Any gentleman who has a curiosity to examine a list of them, will find one approximating as nearly to perfection as the nature of the subject will admit, in the printed remarks of the gentleman from New York on my left, [Mr. GILLET,] who catechised so non-committally his colleague [Mr. GRANGER] in regard to these various schemes, and who, I thought, before the prompt responses of his colleague were completed, most heartily wished the whole of them back in the brains of the very respectable gentlemen who had concocted them. I feel under great obligations to my friend from New York [Mr. GILLET] for the labor he has so praiseworthy expended in hunting up from among the dusty files of the two Houses these various schemes, and for presenting them in so condensed and portable a form. I have had thoughts of moving the House for the printing of an extra number of copies of the gentleman's catalogue, in order that my constituents might have a perfect knowledge of the very great variety of modes by which the public money may be in generously squandered; but as I doubt whether such a motion would be in order without a suspension of the rules, I trust the gentleman will pardon me for waiving it, at least for the present. It is a little remarkable, sir, that two of the most prominent of these projects—in pursuance, perhaps, of the great anxiety of gentlemen to put down all monopolies—are for the direct benefit of corporations. I refer to the project of the grave Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. GAVNEY,] for entering into partnership with railroad companies, and to the no less commendable one of the Senator from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT,] for investing the surplus in corporation stocks! Who are to be the agents for making these investments, we have not yet been informed. I hope I shall not be considered out of order in suggesting that there are sundry very worthy gentlemen in the New York Senate, who have had great experience in these stock matters, and whose claims for services rendered, and trials and tribulations endured, in the bloody war against monopolies, ought not to be overlooked.

Fortification Bill.

Mr. Chairman, there is a very great inherent difficulty in this matter of spending the surplus. When there are really no proper objects of expenditure, it requires immense intellectual labor to discover them. I wonder, sir, that some gentleman has not introduced an appropriation (say of a million or two) to be awarded to the person who should invent the most plausible mode of draining the Treasury. I do not think it would produce many new schemes, for I believe the ingenuity of gentlemen has already been taxed to the utmost; but it would have the merit of being itself a project, and of abstracting from the Treasury precisely the amount which was appropriated as a premium. If any gentleman has a scheme in his drawer ready to offer, and thinks this a better one; or, if any gentleman who has produced a scheme, and ridden it through its butterfly life, is desirous of mounting another hobby, he is welcome to this—"free gratis for nothing." I leave the sum blank, to be filled up by whoever receives it. I do not engage that it is absolutely a proper mode of spending the public money; nor do I desire any gentleman to take the scheme absolutely at his own risk. I warrant it to be fully equal, in every respect, to most of the projects that have gone before it; and I further warrant that the people, to whom all these matters must be finally submitted, will so consider it.

Mr. Chairman, I propose to inquire into the actual state of the Treasury, with the view of ascertaining whether its condition and prospects will allow of a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands among the States, as proposed by the bill on your table from the Senate. But, before doing so, I beg leave to call the attention of the committee to the two last annual reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purpose of showing how entirely mistaken he has been in his estimates of the future revenue of the country.

In his report of December 2, 1834, he estimated the balance that would be in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1835, at - - - $5,892,858 42
He estimated the receipts during the year 1835 at - - - 20,000,000 00

Making, of available funds for that year, $25,892,858 42

By the report of December, 1835, it appears that the actual balance in the Treasury on the 1st of January, 1835, instead of being about five and a half millions, as he had before estimated, was $8,892,858 42; and by the same report we are informed that the receipts of 1835, instead of being but twenty millions, would be $28,430,381 07, exceeding by nearly eight and a half millions his previous estimate. Observe, sir, this was the estimate made at the commencement of the present session.

But on the 13th of January, the Secretary, in answer to a call from the Senate, informs us that his estimate of receipts, made in December, was quite too low, and that the actual receipts for 1835 were $34,400,733 69, being an addition of six millions, which the short period of six weeks had enabled him to discover. The account, then, between the Treasury and the Secretary's estimates for 1835, stands thus:

Ascertained balance in the Treasury,
January 1, 1835, - - -	$8,892,858 42
Actual receipts for 1835, - - -	34,400,733 69

Making the sum of - - -	43,293,592 11
Deduct balance in the Treasury and receipts as estimated, - - -	25,586,232 34

Leaving an excess of - - - $17,707,359 77 of available funds for the year 1835, over and above the sum which had been estimated by the Secretary at the commencement of the year.

Sir, in this matter of estimates, the Secretary does not seem to profit by experience, for he has been quite as wide of the mark this year as last, and he runs into the same error, that of estimating the revenue greatly too low. In his annual report, made at the commencement of the present session, he estimates the receipts for 1836, from all sources, at $19,725,700. On the 18th of April, 1836, in answer to a call from the Senate, the Secretary informs us that the actual receipts for the first quarter of 1836 amounted to the sum of $10,725,700, about one million more than one half of his estimated revenue for the whole year. Here again the Secretary, five days afterwards, finds his estimate for the first quarter to be minus about half a million. Hear his explanation. I quote from his report of April 23, 1836: "It is deemed proper to add, that some additional returns of receipts into the Treasury during some of the last days of March, which, from great distance, irregularity in the mails, or some other cause, had not arrived, and could not be ascertained by either the Treasurer or this Department at the time of my former report, have since been received, and increase the amount, as then ascertained by him in his running account to be the balance in the Treasury, about $451,545." So the actual receipts into the Treasury during the quarter ending March 31, 1836, were $11,177,245.

Sir, a man of more suspicious temperament than myself might charge this uniform system of blundering, which the Secretary seems to have fallen into, to some motive of concealment, extraneous from the public good. I make no such charge. I will not question either the integrity or general ability of the Secretary. I believe him to be in many respects an excellent officer. I impugn not his motives; but I will say this of him: that, for a Yankee, he shows very little 'cuteness at guessing. Why, sir, the dullest of the Kentuckians on Green river, who, we were the other day informed by my friend, [Mr. HAWES,] their representative, mistook an astronomical observatory for the miraculous reappearance of Jacob's ladder, would be willing to reckon on a wager against his guessing; and, in Western phrase, would be "mighty likely to beat him all hollow."

Mr. Chairman, I come now to inquire into the actual condition of the Treasury, with a view to ascertain what sum will be for disposal during the present year. In doing this, I shall rely on the statements made by the Secretary of the Treasury himself for the past, and on estimates for the future, the reasonableness of which cannot be called in question.

The balance in the Treasury January 1st, 1835, was - - -	$8,892,858 42
Revenue of 1835, - - -	34,400,733 69

Making - - -	43,293,592 11

Fortification Bill.

[MAR 24, 1836.]

Deduct expenditures of 1835,	-	18,176,141 07
Actual balance in the Treasury January 1st, 1836,	-	25,117,451 04
Actual receipts first quarter 1836,	-	11,177,245 00
		36,294,696 04
Last three quarters 1836, estimated eight and a third millions each,	-	25,000,000 00
Making in the Treasury at the end of the year,	-	$61,294,696 04

I believe my estimate of the last three quarters to be too low. I know that several gentlemen, friends to the administration, in whom as financiers I have great confidence, estimate the sum at thirty millions instead of twenty-five. I prefer to err, if at all, on the safe side, and therefore take the lowest sum. In addition to this sum, the Government has, in the United States Bank, stock to the amount of seven millions, which the bank is now ready to pay, with an addition of 14 per cent., and which will doubtless come into the Treasury during the year, with a still greater advance. I call this sum eight millions. We are informed by the Secretary, in his report of December, 1834, that there will always be, at the end of every year, a sum of several millions in the Treasury of unexpended balances of former appropriations, which may be safely relied upon to meet appropriations for the ensuing year. This sum, on the 1st of January last, was about eight millions. The amount of this sum must increase in a much greater ratio than the increase of appropriations; and as the appropriations of the present year are to be unusually large, the unexpended balance at the end of the year will be much larger than at any former period. It is impossible to form a decisive opinion as to the amount until after the appropriations are made. It cannot be less than twelve millions.

[Mr. LAWRENCE here said, "not less than fifteen millions."]

Mr. HALL continued. A member of the Committee of Ways and Means says not less than fifteen millions. Sir, if your extravagant appropriations for fortifications are made, and added to those of the like character which have already passed for the navy, the sum will be much larger than fifteen millions. I have before said that there is a limit beyond which money cannot be expended. Sir, you may go on and appropriate some half a dozen millions more for Indian wars, the causes of which yet remain unknown, and about which, or the manner of conducting them, no one seems willing to take the trouble to inquire; go on, sir, with your appropriations for fortifications and Indian treaties, and for every other conceivable object for which the most latitudinarian gentleman can make up his mind to vote; go on, until you have appropriated every dollar in the Treasury; and the great mass of the money will still remain there, undrawn and unexpended. Why, sir, if more than two millions of former appropriations for the increase of the navy could not be used during the last year, when a French war was apprehended, how are you to expend triple the sum this year, when this year's appropriation is made at a much later period in the season than the last? Sir, these appropriations cannot be expended; it is idle to talk about it. Whatever may be the amount of your appropriations, whatever may be the footing of your appropriation bills at the end of the session, it may be calculated with perfect safety that a sum greater than thirty millions cannot and will not be drawn out of the Treasury; and any amount above that sum may be considered as remaining there, a fund for distribution, with perfect security to the Treasury. But to go on with the calculation I had commenced: suppose the unexpended balance at the end of the year to be only twelve millions, making an increase over that of the present year of four millions; this four millions, with the United States Bank stock, amounts to twelve millions, which, added to the $61,294,696 04 before ascertained, gives, in round numbers, the sum of seventy-three millions, which would be in the Treasury at the end of the year, if no sums were drawn out. The proceeds of the public lands for the three past years, which the land bill proposes to distribute, together with those of the present year, at a liberal estimate, may be put down at thirty-six millions. Call the sum to be distributed thirty-six millions, and we have still left, to be appropriated to the ordinary purposes of Government, the enormous sum of thirty-seven millions—a sum greater by about nineteen millions than the expenditures of the last year, and greater by fourteen millions than the whole estimates of the Secretary, ordinary and extraordinary, for the expenditures of this. Sir, I shall not go into any particular estimate of the condition of the Treasury for the ensuing year; for, although the land bill proposes to distribute the proceeds of the public lands for 1837, I deem the inquiry wholly unnecessary. I have no manner of doubt that the revenue from the customs alone, for several years to come, will be abundantly sufficient for all the wants of the Government; but the distribution for 1837, if now ordered, will be under the perfect control of Congress at its next session, and may be recalled, if the necessities of the country shall be found to require it. I will not, therefore, enter on the discussion of a question of so complicated a character, when its final decision, if now made, would not be material to the matter I have had in hand, which was to show, what I think I have clearly shown, that the land bill may be passed with perfect safety to the Treasury.

Mr. Chairman, having shown that the state of the public funds will admit the passage of the land bill, I would now be glad, if I could, to satisfy the House that the interest and welfare of the country require its passage. But, in this undertaking, I am met in the outset with obstacles against which the demonstrative reasoning of arithmetical calculations cannot be interposed; with obstacles more powerful than those coming in the shape of strong argument or stirring eloquence; obstacles which nothing but individual self-examination and independent patriotism can remove; the obstacles of prejudice and party feeling. Sir, the great misfortune of this measure of distribution is not that it is a bad measure, but that, with the majority, it has got a bad name. I sincerely wish, for the good of the country, that it bore the name of some popular politician, rather than that of a persecuted statesman. I wish it was a Jackson or a Van Buren bill, because I believe it would then pass the House by acclamation. Sir, this ought not to be considered a party measure. It cannot operate for the peculiar benefit of any party, or of any particular section. It will operate equally on all the people and on the whole country; and whatever gentlemen may have heretofore thought in regard to it, however they may have formerly voted on it, it is now presented under circumstances so entirely new, that they may, without making themselves liable to the charge of the slightest inconsistency, give it their warm support. Heretofore, the event of there being a surplus to be divided was matter of calculation and estimate. Now, the existence of the surplus is ascertained—has become an established fact, on which we are called upon in some way to act. Will gentlemen suffer this enormous surplus to be squandered by the central Government, on objects which, when accomplished, will confer no practical benefit on the country, rather than impose on themselves the labor of independent thinking on a question of such deep importance to their constituents? Will they suffer a personal bias, perhaps hastily imbibed, under the influence of high party excitement, to shut out from their minds the light which fact and reason may shed on this question? Certainly they will not. Gentlemen will examine this measure with fairness and candor, and, having done so, I cannot doubt the conclusion to which they will arrive. They must and will unite in favor of the distribution.

Fortification Bill.

Mr. Chairman, I have said that I regretted this measure of distribution was connected with the name of a distinguished statesman. Not, sir, that I would be willing to pluck a single laurel from the brow of that individual. I have had the honor, from my youth up, through good and through evil report, to be his political friend and admirer. I now claim it as an honor; and when the mists of party rancor shall have passed away; when the name and fame of that individual shall become matter of history, and be claimed as the common property of the nation; when men shall wonder at the delusions which had seized on his contemporaries, my children will claim it as an honor to be able to say of me, My parent coolly breasted the torrent of popular clamor, and always did him justice.

But, sir, great as may be my regard for any individual, I hope my regard for my country is still greater; and believing, as I do, that this measure is of the highest importance to the welfare of our country, and to the peaceful continuance of our republican system, I would willingly give the merit of its success, if it could be justly done, to the most violent political opponent. In the hope—perhaps, sir, a vain one—of conciliating the good will of some who, from the name of this measure, may have hastily taken up an unfavorable opinion of it, and for the sake of doing justice to other statesmen of our country, and particularly to my immediate predecessor on the floor of this House, I take occasion to say, that although this measure of distribution has become the adopted child of the distinguished Senator to whom I have alluded; though it wears his dress, and has taken his name, yet he can lay no just claim to the parentage of its leading principles. Without going back to an earlier period, and without noticing various suggestions and propositions of different individuals, which had been made both in and out of Congress, it will be found that, as early as January, 1826, in anticipation that as soon as the public debt should be paid off, the revenue of the country would exceed the wants of the Government, an honorable Senator from New Jersey, now Secretary of the Navy, brought forward a proposition for distributing annually among the States a portion of the public revenue, for purposes of education and internal improvement. The resolution was entertained by the Senate, and the subject referred to a committee, of which the Senator introducing it was the chairman; and, on the 11th of May following, the committee made a detailed and able report in favor of the measure, accompanied by a bill for distributing among the States, according to their representative population, five millions annually for five years, ending with the year 1831. The recollection of gentlemen will enable them to confirm the statement which I now make, that this measure of distribution was for several years, in many parts of the country, a favorite one with the friends of the present Chief Magistrate. It had received so much attention, and was deemed so important, that General Jackson made the subject a part of his first message to Congress. In that message, delivered December 8, 1829, he enumerates with much clearness and force some of the evils which were in future to be apprehended from a surplus revenue—evils under which the country is now actually laboring. He then proceeds, as I will read to you: "To avoid these evils," says the message, "it appears to me that the most safe, just, and federal disposition which could be made of the surplus revenue, would be its apportionment among the several States, according to their ratio of representation; and should this measure not be found warranted by the constitution, that it would be expedient to propose to the States an amendment authorizing it." Sir, the President then deemed this measure of distribution so important, that, if constitutional objections should be found to present obstacles in the way of its accomplishment, he would have them removed, even by the tardy and difficult process of an amendment of the constitution. I do not find, sir, that the President's views met with any serious constitutional objections; but others, on grounds of expediency, seem to have been made from some quarter, which the President, in his next annual message, proceeds to discuss in detail, and to remove. It is somewhat remarkable that the four objections which are noticed by the President, and answered, have since been among the most prominent ones made to the land bill. The objections which are formally stated in the message, and each answered separately and at length, are these: 1. To the ratio of distribution; 2. To its tendency to produce increased taxation; 3. That the States would improvidently use the fund; and, lastly, that it would create an improper dependence of the States on the General Government. Sir, the argument of the President is so clear on these points, and so entirely conclusive, that were it not for its great length, I would ask permission of the committee for the Clerk to read it. But the time which I have prescribed for myself to occupy the attention of the committee is already so far spent that I must omit it. I commend it to the attention of all—to those who may doubt upon the points it discusses, as containing matter calculated to remove their doubts; and to those who continue making the objections, as presenting arguments which they will do well to consider how they are to answer to their own judgments, and to their constituents. You well know, sir, that this measure of distribution was once, whatever it may be now, a favorite with your own State; that in 1827 it received the strong recommendation of Governor Clinton, in his message; that it was also recommended by Governor Throop in 1831, and that, at the same session of your Legislature, a resolution approving it passed your House of Assembly by a unanimous vote; but as the particular attention of the committee has already been called to these propositions from New York, by other gentlemen, I will not dwell on them.

You will notice, sir, that all the propositions which I have yet mentioned contemplated a distribution of the revenue, without reference to the sources from which it was obtained; and included the proceeds of the public lands, as well as the revenue derived from the customs. But the proceeds of the public lands have always been looked upon as standing on a different footing from the revenue derived from other sources. I have not extended my researches very far back, but I find that in February, 1826, the standing committee of this House on the Public Lands, by Mr. Strong, one of its members, from New York, made a report to the House, recommending an annual appropriation of a portion of the nett proceeds of the public lands for the support of schools, and of apportioning the same among the States in proportion to their representation. In February, 1829, a resolution was adopted by the House, on motion of Mr. Stevenson, of Pennsylvania, a political friend of the present President, raising a committee to inquire into the expediency of distributing annually all the money arising from the sales of the public lands among the several States, in the same proportion. This reference, also, produced a report favorable to the measure. On the 17th of December, 1829, my predecessor in this House, (Gen. Hunt,) introduced a resolution directing "the Committee on Public Lands to inquire into the expediency of appropriating the nett annual proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States, for the purposes of education and internal improvement, in proportion to the representation of each in the House of Representatives." This resolution was discussed from day to day, during the morning hour, until the 19th of January, when it was adopted with some modifications, and, among others, with one changing the committee from that on the Public Lands to a select one. Mr. Hunt, as chairman of the committee, at the same session, made a report, which will be found among our printed documents, giving a succinct and lucid history of the public lands; examining with candor and skill the nature and character of the power of this Government in them, and concluding with the report of a bill in favor of the distribution of their proceeds. I am sure, sir, every individual now present, who was a member of this House at the period during which Mr. Hunt held a seat on this floor—a seat vacated by his lamented death in this city—will bear witness to the talent and assiduity with which he performed all his duties here, as well as to the high-minded and honorable motives which governed him; and it is no disparagement to any of the eminent statesmen who have since discussed the subject of the public lands, to say that he clearly foresaw the future importance of this growing resource of the public revenue; that his report contains the germe of nearly every argument which has since been urged in favor of the constitutionality and expediency of distribution; and that it has been seldom, if ever, surpassed in ability.

You will perceive, sir, that this measure is not new to this House or to the country; and that, long before Mr. Clay first introduced his bill into the Senate, my own constituents, in particular, had, through their Representative, urged upon Congress, with earnestness and skill, the justice and propriety of the measure; and that, in now standing up as its advocate, I am not following in the lead of party, but am only expressing, as well as I am able, the long-cherished and declared will of my district. Sir, I repeat what I have before said: this measure of distribution cannot, with any propriety, be called a party measure. No particular man, no particular party, can, with any justice, claim the honor of its paternity. It is not a measure, like the many schemes of squandering the public money, which the diseased political atmosphere of this Capitol has lately generated, that requires deep thought and laborious research to originate. It is the natural, spontaneous production of the minds of the great mass of the people themselves. Proceeding on the self-evident proposition, so well expressed by General Jackson in his message of 1830, that "the resources of the nation, beyond those required for the immediate and necessary purposes of the Government, can no where be so well deposited as in the pockets of the people," the people look down upon their representatives, and say to them: "Gentlemen, you have got a large amount of our money, which you can't profitably use—please give it back to us." The idea is perfectly simple and natural; and it would be doing manifest injustice to the common understanding of every man in the nation to go about hunting among the giant minds of our statesmen to discover its origin.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not trespass on the patience of the committee, by repeating the arguments which have been so well and so conclusively stated by others, to show the constitutionality and propriety of a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands. It has been shown to this committee by gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate, and particularly by the gentlemen from Virginia, [Mr. McCOMAS,] and Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] that this distribution is not only in conformity with the constitution, but is, so far as the important cession of Virginia is concerned, imposed upon Congress as a duty by the very language and spirit of the deed of cession. And I confess I am unable to see how this Government can otherwise honestly discharge the trust reposed in it by that act of cession, than by giving to Virginia and each of the other States their respective shares of the common fund. Sir, I have not heard the constitutionality of this measure seriously questioned. Any objection of that kind, it seems to me, would now come altogether too late. It has hitherto been supposed that the power of this Government over the public lands and their proceeds was unaffected by the limitations imposed in the constitution on the use of money raised for revenue purposes. I have looked into the various elementary writers on the constitution, and I find they all concur in giving to that article of the constitution which confers the power on Congress "to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States," a construction which would leave the proceeds wholly unrestrained to the purposes for which taxes and imposts may be imposed. It is an article separate from, and wholly independent of, that conferring the taxing power, and cannot be circumscribed by its limitations. From the very commencement of the Government, we have been in the constant habit of legislating on this construction, and the constitutionality of such legislation, so far as I am informed, has ever remained unquestioned. We have made grants of the public lands to States, to corporations, and to individuals, for almost all conceivable purposes—for purposes to which no one would have thought of appropriating the general revenue. We have appropriated over eight millions of acres for common schools, more than two millions for internal improvements, about five hundred thousand acres for colleges and academies, ninety thousand acres for religious and charitable institutions; and in the acts of admission into the Union of each of the seven new States, five per cent. on the amount of the sales of the public lands within their respective limits is granted by Congress, either for purposes of internal improvement or education. And are we now to be met with an argument against the power of Congress to make this distribution? I trust not. Sir, if any constitutional question can be considered as settled by a long, uniform, and uninterrupted course of practical legislation, this general power over the public lands is one of them.

I have been amused, sir, at the variety and contradictory character of the objections which are made to the distribution, as proposed by the land bill on your table. The proneness to contradiction in the arguments which are adduced against this measure is so great, that you seldom hear an objection raised by one gentleman, but the next one you listen to astounds you with one of a directly opposite character; and you rarely meet with a single speech or public document against this distribution, in which some prominent position assumed in one paragraph is not contradicted and overthrown by that contained in a succeeding one. I am persuaded, sir, that no more effectual way of overthrowing all these arguments could be devised, than by collecting them all together, and placing them in juxtaposition with each other. I think their mere contrast would be their sufficient refutation. I will not detain the committee by noticing all of the extraordinary objections which the ingenuity of gentlemen has devised against this measure of distribution, but I must beg leave to notice a few of the most prominent of them.

Sir, one person objects to this bill because it is temporary, is limited in its operation; it only proposes a distribution for five years, and is therefore no final settlement of the question in regard to the public lands. I believe this is one of the objections in the veto message to the bill which passed the two Houses in 1833. Another objection now made is, that the measure will be a permanent one. It is said, if the distribution is once made, if the States and people but once get a taste of this treasure, they will never give it up. And this last argument, so complimentary to the wisdom and intelligence of the people, is one which is urged with considerable earnestness; and I do not know but the time may soon come, if it has not already arrived, when implicit faith in it will be required as one of the qualifications for membership in what gentlemen are pleased to denominate the "democratic party." I confess my democracy is not of that character. I have entire confidence in the ultimate decision of the people. If the distribution works well, and the revenue of the country will admit it, it will be continued; otherwise, it will be abandoned.

Fortification Bill.

Sir, another objection made against this bill is, that, by placing the States in a dependent position on the General Government, it will tend to produce consolidation. This, I think, is also one of the veto objections. This objection is not only overthrown by the argument contained in the President's message of 1830, but is contradicted by a new argument which has lately come into fashion. The argument is this: that the States, by abstracting the funds from the national Treasury, will become all-powerful, and leave the General Government too weak to carry on its necessary operations. I confess, sir, that this argument, coming, as it does, from gentlemen claiming to have in their peculiar keeping the principles of the old republican party, strikes my ears rather gratefully. But this is a day of new things, and I suppose we must brace up our nerves to stand the shock of any thing, however strange or unexpected. I thought that if there was any one principle which stood out above all others as the platform on which the old republican party was founded, it was that the danger to our system arose from the weakness of the States, and the too great and absorbing power of the General Government; but now, forsooth, we are exhorted, in the holy names of republicanism and democracy, not to distribute to the States a surplus revenue which the General Government does not need, and cannot use, for fear of endangering the system, by strengthening the power of the States! Sir, this objection, like the other, taxes my democracy too heavily. I can't go it.

Mr. Chairman, an objection has been raised against the bill on your table, because it proposes to give the new States some ten per cent. on the amount of the sales of the lands within their respective limits, for the purposes of internal improvement, before the general distribution is made; and for this reason, it is said, the distribution is unequal and unjust to the old States. Sir, this objection is not only answered by the uniform practice of the Government, which I have before stated, to make, as a means of enhancing the value and increasing the sales of the residue of the lands, grants of lands for such purposes, but by the fact that the additional ten per cent. may be deemed necessary to place the new States on an actual equality with the old, for the reason that the former have increased much more rapidly in population, since the last census, than the latter—of which increase in the new States the amount of their respective land sales is the best practical admeasurement. But the objection is contradicted and overthrown by another, still more extraordinary. Sir, in a public document, where I find this objection most strongly urged, and most laboriously insisted on, the final views of the author are summed up in the following language; I give it verbatim et literatim: "I do not doubt that it is the real interest of each and all the States in the Union, and particularly of the new States, that the price of these lands shall be reduced and graduated; and that, after they have been offered for a certain number of years, the refuse remaining unsold shall be abandoned to the States." Yes, sir, we are told that it is unconstitutional, a violation of compact, and unjust to the old States, to allow the new States, in a measure of general distribution, a small per centage on the amount of the sales; and yet, that after a few thousand acres more are sold, it will be perfectly constitutional, in clear conformity with compact, and perfectly just to the old States, to cede the whole of the lands to the new. Sir, was there ever any public measure which met with such unaccountable, such extraordinary—is it too much to say, absurd—objections? And what, sir, is the object of this war upon reason and common sense? Why, sir, no other, that I can discover, than to enable the very persons who are carrying on the war to reap a rich harvest of patronage, by controlling and directing the use of the money whose distribution they oppose. And this brings me to the consideration of another objection which has been made, and the last one which I shall notice. It is said we have no security that the States will make a wise use of this money. I would ask, sir, what security have the people that we shall make a wise use of it? Have they not the strongest possible reasons to believe that, if it remains undistributed, we shall use it most wastefully and improvidently? If they are not already sensible of it, they have read but poorly the signs of the times, have watched but carelessly the movements of their representatives. Sir, I will not at this time go into this subject more fully than I have already done. But I would ask if there is a man here who seriously and truly believes that the States could not, and would not, make a much better use of this money than we should? It is notorious that the States use their funds much more economically than we do—that any State can accomplish a given object with half the amount of money that we can. Their agents are nearer to the people, and feel a much deeper and stronger responsibility. The people themselves take a deeper interest in objects of a State character than in those of the General Government, and watch the agents more closely. And what is this objection, after all, but an insult to the understandings and integrity of the people? Gentlemen talk here as if they supposed all the virtue and all the wisdom of the nation were congregated in these halls, and that nothing could be well done unless we did it.

Sir, I have no such belief. I believe that Virginia, and Maryland, and Pennsylvania—ay, and Vermont too—and every other State in the Union, would appropriate their respective shares in this fund to much better purposes than we should. And, sir, I have no fears of its corrupting the States. It is when money is collected in large masses, where it cannot be properly used, that the danger of corruption exists. That is the precise situation of the surplus revenue in reference to the General Government. We have no proper objects to which we can apply it, and therefore we must expect that it will naturally be used for improper and corrupt purposes. The condition of the States is wholly different. The great objects of internal improvement and education, which come within the peculiar province of State legislation, will furnish ample and highly beneficial uses for the application of the proceeds of the public lands for years to come; and so long as those objects require the fostering care of the State authorities, there is no possible danger that the fund will corrupt them. Appropriated under the wise legislation of the people's immediate representatives, it will infuse new life and vigor into the business of the whole country, and its usefulness be benignly felt and appreciated by every man in the Union.

Mr. Chairman, I have said this measure of the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands was a measure of the people. It has received the long-recorded approbation of the most eminent and valued men of all political parties; it cannot be resisted by any argument which addresses itself to the good sense and sound reason of men, and the powerful evidences of the most common understanding. Do you suppose the great body of the people, especially those in the interior of the country, will be satisfied to have the surplus money in the Treasury foolishly squandered on the seaboard, or that they will be content to have it remain in the custody of some thirty or forty banking corporations, for the purpose of enabling their rich stockholders to grow still richer, by loaning it out to those bloodsuckers of the community—the city brokers and stockjobbers? Sir, they will be satisfied with no such thing. I warn you, Mr. Chairman, that if this measure fails to pass—if we separate without making some distribution of the public money, the first question that will be put to you, when you reach your district, will be, “Why didn’t you pass the land bill?” And have you, sir, got your answer prepared? [Mr. MANN nodded affirmatively.] I understand your intimation. I know, sir, that you can give as ingenious an answer to a difficult question as any man in this House or out of it. But I am mistaken if you do not find yourself puzzled to make a satisfactory one to this. I suppose you will reply to your constituent in the familiar language of party, and say to him, “You know, friend, this is one of Mr. Clay’s old plans for breaking down the administration; you vote for Mr. Van Buren, don’t you?” “Oh, yes,” the constituent will say, “I go for Mr. Van Buren, to be sure; he’s the true democratic candidate; but then I don’t see how passing the land bill could hurt him; Mr. Clay’s not going to run.” “Oh, but,” says the representative, “you know General Jackson is opposed to the bill, and that it would have been vetoed if we had passed it—you wouldn’t have me go against General Jackson, would you?” “Well,” answers the constituent, “I’m a Jackson man, to be sure; I always was a Jackson man—I mean ever since it came out in the Argus that General Jackson was taken into the democratic party; but I don’t see why General Jackson should be opposed to this distribution—he used to be in favor of it. Don’t you think Mr. Van Buren could have persuaded him to sign the bill?” “I see,” says the representative, “you don’t understand this matter; this is one of the most outrageous measures that was ever presented to Congress; the very essence of it is bribery—plain, downright bribery!” “Well,” says the constituent, “I am opposed to bribery, to be sure—and General Jackson, and the whole democratic party, are opposed to all bribery, in the State Senate and every where else; but then I don’t exactly see how dividing the money among all the people, giving to every one an equal share, can be bribery, when giving it to a few men in the cities, or letting the banks use it for nothing, is not. But I’ll think of it. I go for the democratic party, to be sure; for the Benton yellow boys, and down with all monopolies, but I don’t understand how this can be bribery, after all—I must study a little more into this matter.” Mr. Chairman, I will not pursue this dialogue further. I will not suppose you would then address your constituent in what has been alleged to be the secret language of party, and say to him that the use of the money was needed by the administration to increase the patronage and secure the success of the party. I will not suppose this, because I know you to be incapable of either avowing or acting upon any such motive. I wish I could say as much of every body.

Sir, I have a few words to say in regard to the peculiar position of my own State, with reference to the expenditures of this Government, when I shall have done. I think I may safely say that no State in the Union has shared so little in the direct pecuniary benefits of the General Government as Vermont. From the very beginning she did not reap all the advantages conferred on the other States. Exercising throughout the whole of therevolutionary war an actual though unacknowledged independence, and occupying a frontier position, often the theatre of invasion, and always in imminent danger of it, her people bore their full share in the perils, the trials, the expenses, and the honors, of that contest. Yet she came into the Union in 1791, bringing not with her a State debt to cast as a burden on the nation, but to unite with her sister States in the payment of the twenty millions of their debts, which this Government had already assumed. Under the operation of the taxing power of this Government, she has paid her share of the debts of those States, in proportion to her population and resources. I speak not this by way of complaint; I make the statement as matter of fact and of history. Of the several hundred millions of the expenditures which this Government has made since its first organization under the present constitution, but a fraction has been disbursed in Vermont. I have not been able to ascertain, from printed public documents, the precise share which the State I in part represent has had in all your appropriations; but I will give you the amount for three permanent objects of local expenditure, as a sample. Your expenditures for fortifications have been 17,526,000 dollars; for internal improvements, 6,283,000 dollars; and of neither of these sums has a dollar ever reached Vermont. Your expenditures for light-houses have been 3,644,000 dollars; and of this Vermont has received the sum of 4,729 dollars and 22 cents. Sir, while other States can boast of the fortifications, the navy yards, the custom-houses, the marine hospitals, the mints, the armories, and other splendid works, which your Treasury has caused to spring into existence; of the harbors and rivers whose channels you have deepened and enlarged; of roads and canals which your munificence has constructed or aided, the only legible marks which you have made on the surface of Vermont, to which her people can point as evidence that she also belongs to the Union, is the light-house I have mentioned, and a small arsenal—both together costing the Government something less than fifteen thousand dollars. I speak not even this in the way of complaining of the past expenditures of this Government, or as putting in a claim for a large share in the future expenditures for similar objects. It is doubtless true that expenditures for national purposes should be made, where the general interest requires them, without reference to State lines; and I know that, of the vast amount of your future appropriations, but a mere trifle can ever be expected to reach the State of which I am a representative. You have ceased making appropriations for internal improvements, and we can expect nothing for such objects. Our people are hardy and brave, have always shown themselves well qualified to defend their territory, and require no fortifications; and, having no seaboard, we are cut off from reaping any local benefits from the thousand maritime objects for which the greatest proportion of the funds of this Government have been, and in all probability will continue to be, expended. Sir, the people of Vermont understand the consequences which, under the practical legislation of this Government, are to follow from their inland position; and they have been long looking forward to the period when, the national debt being discharged, and a surplus found in the Treasury, all objections to a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands would cease. The expected period has arrived, but the objections still continue; and we were warned by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in the opening of this debate, that there was not only to be no distribution, but that, if the surplus continued, the compromise tariff act would not long be respected. Sir, I know this would be the natural consequence of the accumulation of an excess of revenue and a denial of its distribution; and being very sure that the extravagant expenditures which are proposed to be made, in order to get rid of the surplus, cannot meet the deliberate approbation of the people, I believe the question will be between an abandonment of the tariff and a distribution of the surplus among the States. Yes, sir, the measure of justice which you propose to deal out to the agriculturists, the manufacturers, and the mechanics of Vermont, is not only to deny them all advantages from the common fund arising out of the public lands, but to sacrifice the rewards of their industry to the cupidity of the capitalists, and the competition of the paupers of foreign Governments. Permit me to say that this is a measure of justice, or rather of crying injustice, which they will not accept. And, sir, their position will not be a lonely one. The people of the whole country, and especially of the interior, perceiving that this measure of distribution is one which, in all its aspects, involves their highest and deepest interests, and that, compared with it, their petty contests about who, for the time being, shall enjoy the honors and emoluments of office, dwindle into insignificance, will rise in their might, and, breaking asunder the party shackles which have bound them, will speak to their representatives a language in its favor which cannot be misunderstood, and will not be resisted. But I will not dwell on this subject. I have already occupied more of the time of the committee than I intended, and I forbear to submit any further remarks.*

Mr. BEAUMONT rose and said:

Mr. Chairman: I beg leave to occupy the time of the committee for a few moments, and I assure gentlemen I will not trespass long upon their patience. The only offering I bring to conciliate their kind feelings is an honesty of purpose. I am opposed to the amendment to the bill, the amendment to the amendment, and to the bill itself, in part. I am opposed to the amendment, because it adds an extravagant item to the appropriations in the bill, already too extravagant. I am opposed to the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. ALLAN,] because, whatever be its merits, as a distinct proposition, I think it has no appropriate place in this bill; and I am opposed to the bill in its present shape, because it contains appropriations extravagant in amount, and, as I believe, uncalled for by the necessities of the public service.

*The public lands were acquired by the United States by cessions from the old States, (the most important being that of Virginia in 1783,) and by the purchase of Louisiana in 1802, and Florida in 1819. The quantity of land in the States and organized Territories, in which the Indian title still remains, is about seventy-nine millions of acres. In two hundred and sixty-eight millions the Indian title has become extinct, and of this one hundred and seventy-six millions have been surveyed, forty-four millions of it sold, and one hundred and thirty-two millions remain unsold. Besides this, there are, west of the Mississippi, and without the boundaries of the States and Territories, about seven hundred and fifteen millions of acres belonging to the United States, subject, however, to the Indian titles.

The amount of the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands for the years 1833, 1834, and 1835, which the land bill proposes to distribute, is $20,371,125 75. The amount of the sales for the first quarter of the present year exceeds five and a half millions. Estimating the proceeds of 1836 at fifteen and a half millions, the amount to be distributed at the end of the present year will be about thirty-six millions. This sum, after deducting the ten per cent. allowed to the new States, distributed among the States according to their federal popu-

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the fundamental principle of a republican Government is economy. To take no more from the people than is absolutely necessary to supply the economical and constitutional wants of the Government is the dictate of justice and of patriotism. All the money expended by the Government, whether properly or improperly, comes directly or indirectly from the people—the laboring people—a portion of whom have been recently characterized here as a mere wandering herd of reckless adventurers, having neither virtue, nor home, nor tie of affection, to bind them to the soil of their country; but whom I consider as constituting a portion of that virtuous yeomanry who are the main support of our country in peace, and its buckler in war. Labor is the foundation of all support, national or individual; and all extravagant or unnecessary expenditure by the Government is a wanton injury done to the laboring classes. To protect this most useful class, the life and soul, the bone and muscle of the nation, should be the first care of every agent or representative of the people. But, Mr. Chairman, how few real and devoted advocates have the people in the House of the people! Is there not too often a more manifest devotion here, to the interests of those who live upon the favors of the Government, than to the interests of those who furnish these favors? Is it not too often the case that Government itself rests its support on those who are supported by the means drawn from the people, more than upon the people themselves? In monarchies the maxim is, that “the people are made for the benefit of the Government;” in a free Government, such as ours was intended to be, the maxim is, “the Government is made for the benefit of the people.”

Frugality, economy, and equal justice, are the life-giving principles of a republic. Splendor, waste, and an unequal distribution of favors, are its bane. A rational people will submit to all burdens imposed for the common weal—all taxation that is necessary for the common defence, and just support of the necessary constituted authorities. Further than this submission is a crime, and a badge of servitude. That system of taxation which goes to support useless establishments—which takes from the comforts of one to add to the indulgence of another—which takes away the fruits of the labor of one man, to support the extravagance and idleness of another, under whatever name it may come, whether it lation, will give to each individual about two dollars and seventy-five cents. The share of Vermont in this distribution, with a population of 280,655, would be $771,800. If the State should make this a fund for the support of schools, it would, at an interest of six per cent., produce the amount of $46,308, equal to the sum that would be produced by a tax of two and a quarter cents on the whole grand list of the State. If the proceeds of the sales for 1837, which the land bill also provides for distributing, should equal those of the present year, the annual interest of the fund would considerably exceed the amount of the three cent tax annually assessed for the support of schools, and enable the Legislature, if it thought proper, to dispense with its future collection.

If the Legislature should, under proper regulations, provide by law for enabling the several towns in the State to take charge of their respective shares of the fund, and distribute the same among them in proportion to their population, the sum which each town would obtain at the end of the present year may be readily calculated, by allowing two dollars seventy-five cents for each individual. Thus, a town of one hundred inhabitants would receive $275; one of five hundred inhabitants $1,375; of one thousand, $2,750; of one thousand five hundred, $4,125; of two thousand, $5,500; of three thousand, $8,250, &c.—Note by Mr. H.

Fortification Bill.

assume the character of "protection" or "the general welfare," is oppression under an insidious disguise, and a speculation upon the credulity of the people. Any Government that imposes unnecessary taxation is oppressive. Has our Government at any time been guilty of this offence? Let the extraordinary increase in amount of our expenditures, the thirty-five millions of surplus said to be now in the Treasury, and the graceless scramble for its division, answer that question.

From twelve to fourteen millions of dollars, I believe, have been expended within the last twenty years, on and about fortifications, besides very large sums in their armament; and it is presumed that if a conscionable inventory were at this time taken by competent and disinterested engineers, the whole would not amount in value to four millions, perhaps not so much.

The question may be asked, where is the balance of eight or ten millions? It may, perhaps, be set down to the account of the "general welfare," or, in plain English, gone to the support of those who have rendered no equivalent in service, but have found it more comfortable to live on the public than upon their own resources.

Shall we increase the permanent expenditures of our Government because a system of unnecessary taxation has brought a surplus into the Treasury? This will only make the evil perpetual, and render permanent the vicious system of taxation.

All the modes heretofore proposed as a remedy for the surplus in the Treasury, which all seem to deprecate as an evil, only go to rivet the mischief upon the people. The wrong is in taking the money unnecessarily from the people, not in its remaining in the Treasury, for in that there can be no wrong. But if you increase your public expenditures, you can never again diminish them, however great the necessity, without almost resorting to a revolution. But it may be asked what remedy I would propose? I answer, take the taxes off the people. Suspend the sale of the public lands, except to bonafide or actual settlers, in limited quantities. Leave the money in the pockets of those who earn it, and not extort it from them, and then trifle with their understanding by pretending to render it back to them, which is only a promise made to the ear to be broken to the understanding.

The squandering the public domain in the manner in which it has been dissipated for the last two or three years, I believe to be a violent perversion of the intention of the original grantors, (of a part of that land at least,) and of the Government in making the investment. What has been sold within the last year for eight or ten millions of dollars, to capitalists and speculators, who never intended to till one foot of it, if it had been prudently retained, in a few years would have been worth to the people perhaps one hundred millions of dollars. These lands should be retained for the actual settler, as an asylum for the poor but industrious man, as land becomes high in value and the population becomes dense in the old States, and their proceeds should be made available to relieve the people from taxation. This I consider the legitimate object of the States in granting, and of the Government in purchasing, these lands.

Mr. Jefferson, who wrote almost with the pen of inspiration, when speaking of the rights of man, and the legitimate purpose of Government, after recounting the many natural advantages we enjoyed, of position, soil, and climate, asks, "what more is necessary to make us a happy and prosperous people?" and answers, "A wise and frugal Government, which shall restrain men from injuring one another, shall leave them otherwise free to regulate their own pursuits of industry and improvement, and shall not take from the mouth of labor the bread it has earned."

And again he says, "Considering the general tendency to multiply offices and dependencies, and to increase expense to the ultimate term of burden that the citizen can bear, it behooves us to avail ourselves of every occasion which presents itself for taking off the surcharge, that it may never be seen here; that after leaving to labor the smallest proportion on its earnings on which it can subsist, Government shall itself consume the residue of what it was instituted to guard."

Are there any symptoms of a disregard of this sound advice of the man whose name is so frequently invoked by us all, in the transactions of this body? A reference to the bills passed, and in the progress of passing, during the present session, will best settle this question.

My reflections, Mr. Chairman, lead me to conclude that the best preparations we can make for the defence of this country against the contingency of war and conquest, is, to preserve our free republican institutions, such as our fathers left them, unimpaired. The most impregnable breastworks we can oppose to invasion are the breasts of a free people. So long as the people of this country are left in the full and free enjoyment of their rights, and not subjected to unnecessary exactions, nor degraded by odious distinctions, they will be invincible; but whenever they shall find themselves oppressed by a corrupt and extravagant Government, and degraded by privileged orders, the charm of invincibility will be exploded; and although our whole frontiers were embossed with fortifications, and garnished with a million of cannon, our country would become the prey of the first invader who should guaranty a relief from such wrongs.

Our republic can only be maintained in vigor and health, by adhering to the first principles on which it was founded. These principles are economy, simplicity, and a severe abstinence from the corrupt practices and abuses of foreign Governments. How have we kept these observances? Are we not every day borrowing and enlarging upon these foreign examples? How long is it since we raised the salaries of our navy officers from the republican to the monarchical standard, upon the grounds urged by the friends of the measure, of enabling our officers to vie in extravagance and display with the minions of tyranny in Europe? Did we not raise the pay of a post captain from about two thousand six hundred dollars to more than four thousand six hundred, and of all the subordinate officers in pretty much the same ratio? And have not the officers of the navy been increased to near four times the number required to perform all the necessary service? Did we not increase the aggregate pay of the officers at one session, and in time of profound peace, from little more than seven hundred thousand dollars to more than one million one hundred thousand dollars? But at the same time no provision, I think, was made for the increase of the poor seaman's pay; he who, at last, must brave, through all dangers, the brunt of the battle and the storm. And where, Mr. Chairman, let me ask, are a large proportion of these very officers who receive some one, two, and three thousand dollars a year out of the public Treasury, supplied by the labor of the yeomanry of the country? Is it a fact, as has been hinted, that a large number of them are employed on board of steamboats, merchant vessels, and in other pursuits, from which they realize from twelve hundred to fifteen hundred dollars a year in addition to their public salaries? I cannot vouch for this, but I have heard it stated to be the fact.

But can these extravagances be charged to the account of the present administration and its friends? I answer no; for it will be found, by reference to the public documents, that the annual appropriations for the public service have been uniformly increased some millions beyond the estimates furnished by the executive officers.

Besides, in all the annual messages of the present Executive, he has enjoined upon the attention of Congress the necessity of retrenchment and economy in our public expenditures. Besides it will be found, by adverting to the history of the last seven or eight years, that all the extravagant measures of expenditure have been caused by a large majority of the opposition and a small minority of those who profess to be friends to republican principles, but who, it would seem, follow the flock for the fleece, rather than its safety. Look at the history of the navy-pay bill, the harbor bills, the fortification bills, the bills authorizing extra public printing, and the Documentary History of the Revolution, the increase in number and emolument of the custom-house officers, the donations to this District and its corporations, amounting to some four millions of dollars, superadded to all the other advantages it enjoys over other portions of the republic, from the location of the seat of Government here, not omitting the recent appropriations for the two custom-houses in the cities of Boston and New York, estimated by some to cost more than two millions of dollars.

The principal argument adduced to justify these extravagant appropriations, and the increase of our establishments, is the great surplus in the Treasury, not the real wants of the public service. But will this surplus always last? How has it been created? Has it not been produced by abusing the patriotism of the people; by taking advantage of their willingness to submit to almost any burden of taxation to discharge the war debt of the Revolution and of 1812, and adroitly keeping on those taxes after the debt has been discharged, by specious arguments and the magic of a pretended compromise, and by appeals to the cupidity of those "who would live every how and any how" but by fair and equal competition, the foundation of political justice?

Another source whence this surplus in the Treasury flows is the confiscation (for that seems to me to be the most appropriate term) of the public lands. But this will not last forever. A few years of wild speculation, such as has been produced in part by the dropsical state of our Treasury system, will leave scarcely an acre of valuable land in the hands of the Government this side of the Rocky mountains.

But although these sources of revenue, by the force of the "compromise," so called, (a new name for an act of Congress,) and the exhaustion of the public domain, may fail, the disposition to enjoy the benefits of the Government will not diminish. These persons, who have been indulged with a public support, cannot be so easily weaned and persuaded to resort to the dull reality of providing for their own support, but become the more ravenous as the fountains whence their sustenance flows diminish, and additional taxation must then be resorted to.

All the dependencies created by the Government, whether necessary or unnecessary—the army, the navy, the numerous corps engaged in the civil and diplomatic departments of the Government, embracing the countless hundreds engaged in the collection of the customs, with all the various ramifications inseparable from the enforcement of high tariff laws, naturally form a confederacy against the interests of the people. And is there no danger to be apprehended from this confederacy? Is there no ground to fear that this combination may become our masters, and, like the janizaries or Roman legions, crush that very liberty they were raised to defend?

It would seem, from the course of legislation in this country, that the object of one class of political economists is to impose as heavy a burden upon the people as they can bear. The expenditures are to be increased while the Treasury is full from the excess of the sales of the public lands, beyond the wants of the settlers, and the "surcharge" of the war taxes, in order to furnish an excuse for an increase of the tariff, when the land fund shall be exhausted. They seem to be unwilling that the people should be relieved from the weight of taxation, lest, after enjoying the comforts of a relief, they should refuse to submit to the burden again, without a just cause. They seem fearful of the example of strict economy in our expenditures, and a relief from taxation, lest the people should insist upon a rigid observance of the same economy in future. It would seem there was a determined purpose that the annual expenditures should not be reduced to some twelve or ten millions of dollars, (which I sincerely believe, with every liberal allowance, is all that is actually needed in time of peace,) because it would afford an example dangerous to the existence of the "American system," so called, the parent of so much extravagance, the true essence of which, after all that may be said to mystify the subject, when it extends beyond the purposes of legitimate revenue, is to take from the many and give to the few; to enable one master manufacturer, by the means of the bounty of Government in favor of capital, to subject the labor of hundreds to his sole benefit; to make one man immensely rich, while the hundreds are poor; to enable one master manufacturer to make more clear profit than a whole country of farmers and mechanics. A judicious tariff, having for its object only a revenue necessary for the legitimate and economical wants of the Government, is not objectionable; but its perversion to subserve unconstitutional purposes is the wrong to which I object.

But, Mr. Chairman, for whatever extravagances that are tolerated under this Government, this House is accountable. It must rise from the fatuity or unfaithfulness of those who are placed here as sentinels to guard the rights of the people. If their rights are impaired or suffered to be invaded, we are accountable. We ought, then, to see that not a dollar is taken from the people for an unnecessary purpose; not a dollar should be taken from the Treasury unless for an equivalent in service; not an officer should be created unless demanded by the public necessity; no one should be retained in office who does not manifest a devotion to the public interest; and the public servant should not be allowed a higher reward for his services than his masters, with equal industry, prudence, and economy.

By a system of unnecessary taxation and extravagant expenditure, we may have what is termed a splendid Government, but its necessary consequence, a poor and oppressed people. Where splendor begins, liberty declines. They both cannot subsist together. In corrupt and despotic Governments, the people are kept in awe by splendor and fear. In this country, however, we at least profess to be governed by reason. The majesty of our Government is justice, and its splendor consists in its simplicity, and its guaranty of equal rights and equal protection to all. Every attempt to assimilate this chaste fabric of civil liberty to the vices and corruptions of Europe, deforms the symmetry of its proportions; and every attempt at splendor, at the sacrifice of the happiness and welfare of the people, is a wrong done to the memory of its founders.

Mr. JENIFER then rose and spoke as follows:

H. OF R.]

Fortification Bill.

[MAY 24, 1835.]

Mr. Chairman: I desire to make a few remarks before the committee rises, as it is understood that the question will be taken to-night. I should not trespass on the patience of the committee, worn down as they must be at this late hour, after so long and fatiguing a session, from ten o'clock this morning till the present time, now past eight at night, did I believe an opportunity would be afforded me at any other time of expressing my opinion in reply to various matters which have been introduced during this discussion. I hope to find an excuse in the examples which have been set me, should my remarks not be confined to the question immediately under consideration. Many topics have been introduced which would more properly have suited other occasions; but as this appropriation bill seems to have been set apart for the expression of opinions upon each and every subject, I will avail myself of the means thus afforded of making a few remarks. In doing which, I desire that my colleague from the upper district of Maryland [Mr. THOMAS] may be present before I conclude, as I have an account to settle with him, which concerns the State of Maryland, himself, and myself.

[Mr. THOMAS announced himself as being present, and Mr. JENIFER proceeded.]

The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. CAMBRELENG] being amongst the first to embark, followed by his colleague and others, in this erratic discussion, which has given rise to a debate almost unprecedented as to latitude, character, and irrelevancy, I may be pardoned, should I, in some measure, follow in their train.

It was emphatically asked by one of his colleagues from the city of New York, [Mr. McKEON,] who so eloquently addressed the committee the other day, "Where will be the surplus revenue when the fortifications, the navy, and the Indian treaties, are provided for?" It may well be asked, if the profligate expenditures which are projected and called for are sanctioned by the country, where will be the revenue to meet the demands? Notwithstanding it is admitted that there will be upwards of forty millions in the Treasury, still we hear much in eulogy of the economy of this administration, and whilst millions are appropriated without estimates from any of the Departments of the Government, barely upon application of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who has been compelled to amend his own bills presented to the House, as inadequate to effect the objects intended, defective in the estimates which he himself has relied on, and totally repugnant to all the principles which he and his friends have heretofore advocated, of specific appropriations of the public money. This is one of the evidences of the specific economy of the friends of this administration.

Mr. Chairman, for myself, I have opposed no obstacle to the appropriation bills proper, more particularly that for the defence of the country externally, and that for the suppression of hostilities within our borders, or upon the frontier. But I confess I have looked with astonishment at the credulity of this House in taking for granted that every appropriation asked for, no matter how extravagant, was indispensable to the public interest; although bill after bill has been passed, appropriating hundreds of thousands of dollars, in addition to the amounts called for by the Departments, some not having the sanction of the Committee of Ways and Means, but, as far as we are informed, by an understanding between the chairman and the heads of some of the Departments. And yet, if a member of the opposition asks for an explanation, or a few hours to examine into the propriety of the expenditure, he is denounced, both here and elsewhere, as attempting to clog the Government, to arrest the public business, and to defeat the necessary appropriations; his sympathies are excited, and all the benevolent feelings of the heart enlisted, to expedite the passage of those bills, without time being afforded for examination. Thus many of the appropriations have been unprecedented, extravagant in the highest degree, and uncalled for by any system of economical expenditure. But the ultimate object was sufficiently avowed by the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, when, in his opening speech, he proclaimed that he "had rather see the country plunged in war, than the passage of the land bill." This explains the cause of the wasteful expenditure of the public money. It is the policy and determination to squander it away upon useless objects, sooner than there shall be a surplus to be returned to the people, by an equitable distribution amongst the States, according to the bill which has just passed the Senate, because this profligate expenditure may add to the power and patronage of the Government, by being distributed by this and the succeeding administration for their political advancement, instead of being distributed amongst the States for the benefit of the people.

The honorable chairman advanced another opinion, and declared that "the compromise bill was obnoxious and corrupting to the States—a curse to the country." The gentleman surely could not have seen the force of this remark, or, in his anxiety for denunciation, forgot to recollect that General Jackson approved and signed that compromise bill! This is the first evidence we have yet had of his friends charging him with approving a measure "corrupting to the States." Why was not his veto power exercised to save the States from this "obnoxious" measure? Or why did he become a "particeps criminis" in inflicting a curse upon his country? The gentleman has not assigned the true reason why he and his friends are so denunciatory of this bill. The compromise bill took from the nominee and his partisans one of the most efficient grounds of electioneering; it settled the then existing difference between the North and the South, between the tariff and anti-tariff parties. That exciting question being settled, no room is left, upon that subject at least, for the candidate of the honorable chairman and his party to play the same double game which the present incumbent did to insure his election to the presidential chair. The incumbent, like the expectant, was either tariff or anti-tariff—in favor of one or the other—of both or of neither, as best suited his political purposes. A judicious tariff for his motto, a non-committal deception would have pervaded the country.

What was the fact in 1832, preceding the then presidential election? During the sitting of Congress, letters were written from the seat of Government to the North and to the South, professing to express the opinions of President Jackson upon the then absorbing question of the tariff; and if I am not greatly mistaken, there is now on this floor, within the sound of my voice, an honorable member, as he then was, of this House, from the South, who wrote a letter to his constituents, which was published at the time, stating, from an intimate knowledge of the opinions of the President, that the most effectual means of prostrating the tariff system was to re-elect General Jackson. About the same time, (if I recollect right, within the same week,) another letter was published in Pennsylvania, written by a gentleman of that State, declaring that, from personal conversation with the President, the only means of preserving the tariff was to re-elect General Jackson.

Now, the inference is irresistible that those honorable gentlemen were either duped themselves by a political hypocrite, or they deceived the people by their own political hypocrisy. Be that as it may, the deception proved effective. In the North he was supported as the tariff, in the South as the anti-tariff candidate. This double game, at least upon that question, cannot be played pending the approaching election. This is the cause of the heavy denunciations of the compromise bill; and the honorable chairman will have to seek some other topic to advance the prospects of his judicious non-committal friend. Like a skilful politician, he takes all the chances; excites all prejudices, denounces all those who are not within the pale of this modern democratic church, as being federalists, and "willing to support any man, no matter what his qualifications, character, or principles."

Fortification Bill.

At this gratuitous assumption I hope none will take offence; none, I am sure, was designed to be given. The picture he has portrayed is too like his own friends for any to mistake the resemblance, and we should not complain because he has drawn them to the life. It is true, Mr. Chairman, that we have had amongst us men without principle, and who are willing to support men with any principle. But they are going to more congenial company; some have already gone, and the remaining few, who are thus properly designated, are wending their way with certain, though cautious steps. The "spoils of victory" have dazzled their eyes; the "glory of serving under such a chief" has been sounded in their ears; and can it be expected that men "whose principles are governed by their interests" can longer withstand such irresistible temptations? Let this Congress adjourn without making some disposition of the surplus revenue, and the ranks of the opposition, before the approaching presidential election, will be purged of all those who can make a political bargain, or such as are traitorously disposed to betray their friends. Such associates we desire not—they have remained too long already; and we think we see the near departure of the last of those whose political ingratitude to his friends has been commensurate with his life.

The tariff of 1816 has been denominated by the honorable chairman a "federal measure, and the opposition a party composed of incongruous elements." What was the tariff of 1824 and 1828? Who supported those measures? Did not Andrew Jackson and Martin Van Buren advocate the "bill of abominations?" If so, where was their democracy then? Was the proclamation a democratic profession of creed? Sir, that measure, which the traduced and much-abused Alexander Hamilton would have considered too ultra-federal for him, some of the principles of which, if carried out, would lead to one consolidated Government, is taken by the present party as a text-book for their modern democracy. But these are General Jackson's opinions; and so long as he fills the presidential chair, his opinions will be those of the democratic party. Am I wrong in this? Let us refer to facts: Internal improvements were perfectly constitutional, until the Maysville veto announced the opinions of the President: the Bank of the United States was both constitutional and expedient, until it refused to be subservient to the purposes of the Executive: the land bill was a favorite and popular measure, until vetoed by the President: the distribution of the surplus revenue was a measure of his own; for, in December, 1829, he recommends it to Congress in the following words: "It appears to me that the most safe, just, and federal disposition which could be made of the surplus revenue, would be its apportionment among the several States, according to the ratio of representation." And now, when the surplus revenue does arise, and the minority in both branches of Congress are anxious to make such a disposition of it as is "safe, just, and federal," it is opposed upon the ground that it would be corrupting to the States.

Is it assuming too much to say that this modern democratic party, which arrogates to itself exclusive republicanism, and denounces the minority as aristocrats, is composed of politicians whose "interests constitute their principles," and who will adopt any opinions prepared for them at the White House?

They profess a convenient creed: they may be absolved from their political sins, no matter what may have been their transgressions. If they will only swear allegiance to Andrew Jackson, and pledge a support to Martin Van Buren, however blue may have been their former federalism, they become true and trusty modern democrats, purified of the old leaven, and worthy coadjutors of the present dominant party. Do you desire examples? Look to your former and present cabinet; look to another branch of the Government; look to your ministers abroad, your Senators at home. I will not direct your attention to this hall, lest some of my New York friends might withdraw from me their present countenance. I will only refer you to my colleague, [Mr. THOMAS,] who sits by me. His political experience will inform you how easy it is to have washed out the deepest dye of federalism, even if derived from the blood of forefathers. He will tell you that this broad mantle of modern democracy is a convenient covering; it suits all ages, descriptions, opinions. Come under its shade, and all doubts are dispelled, all constitutional scruples overcome, all difficulties removed. In matters of policy, think what you please, entertain what sentiments you please, guess what you please; but express no opinion until it is officially announced: then go for it, right or wrong. That is modern democracy.

But to return, for a moment, to this compromise bill, this "obnoxious, corrupting measure." What was the situation of the country at the period of its passage? The South, which had, for some time previous, been under considerable excitement, in consequence of what they believed to be the unequal operation of the tariff laws, were driven to desperation by that ill-timed, unprecedented measure, the proclamation. In his annual message, at the commencement of the session of 1832, the President, as if participating in the feelings of the South, admits that they had cause of complaint; calls upon Congress to modify the tariff, as unequal, oppressive, and unjust; induces them to believe that his efforts would be exerted to obtain relief, and have such modifications made as would restore peace and harmony to the then distracted country. This message was producing the effect of allaying the excitement in the South. All from that section of the country seemed disposed to await the constitutional interposition of Congress. The anti-tariff party hailed the message as a measure of peace—nullification was at a stand.

On the other side, the tariff party in the Northern States were alarmed at the indications given in the message, of a determination on the part of the Executive to sacrifice their interests to gratify his caprice in carrying out his notions of a judicious tariff. They began to feel that they were deceived, and were denouncing the President and his message, and about to resort to nullification themselves. In this state of affairs, when no new manifestation of opposition to the laws had been given in the South since the pacific message had been received, yet five days after its transmission to Congress the celebrated proclamation made its appearance.

Under all the circumstances in the then existing state of things, I viewed, as I now view, the issuing of that proclamation as the most atrocious of all the acts of General Jackson's political or military life. It had the effect, as I fear it was intended it should have, of driving to desperation our excited brethren of the South. The President had sympathized with them in his message but five days before, in the oppression and injustice to which they were subjected, by what he himself had denominated their oppressive burdens; he had promised that, so far as his efforts could avail, they should be relieved from those unequal laws; when, at the moment they were relying upon his voluntary pledges to grant relief, he issues his proclamation. I do not, Mr.

H. of R.]

Fortification Bill.

[MAY 24, 1836.]

Chairman, wish to be misunderstood upon this subject. To many of the principles contained in that proclamation I give my most hearty assent, notwithstanding they were the doctrines of federalists in former times. But I believe it was issued at the time for the most unholy of purposes—for no other than those of producing civil war; of affording the President an opportunity of wreaking his vengeance upon his political opponents in the South, and of giving glory to his administration by witnessing the sword plunged in the bowels of his countrymen.

Every man who was here at that time felt as if an awful crisis had arrived; doubts existed upon the minds of many as to what should be done to arrest the impending storm; the members from the Northern States looked upon the vital interests of their constituents as forever gone, should the demands of the South be adhered to. They were combating for what they believed to be not only the constitutional rights, but the indispensable interests of their constituents. The South, deceived by the man whom they had been accessory to elect to the presidency, seeing that he had violated all the pledges he had made, and at the moment of professing sympathy for the wrongs which they had endured, denounces them as traitors, and calls upon the legislative branch of the Government to enable him, at the point of the bayonet, to execute those very laws which he had pronounced unequal and unjust. It was at a period like this that the compromise bill was projected. The provisions of that bill did not meet my entire approbation, nor did it that of many who supported it. I am sure it was not altogether such a bill as the distinguished Senator [MR. CLAY] who brought it forward would, under other circumstances, have preferred. But I take occasion here to say, that some who have since denounced that Senator and that bill, and who are now on this floor, friends of this administration, did at that time entreat his friends to urge him to interpose between the North and the South, as the only man who could restore peace and harmony to the country, and rescue it from civil war. If they were honest then, they are dishonest now; if they are honest now, they were dishonest then.

That distinguished Senator did throw himself into the breach, and, at the sacrifice of his popularity, projected, sustained, and carried through, that compromise bill; for which he merited the thanks of his whole country, and particularly those of the South. He had opposed to him upon that occasion, in another branch of the Legislature, some of his warmest friends, men of the highest order of talent, who honestly believed that the rights and interests of their constituents would be compromised by the passage of the bill; he had to meet the vindictive and insidious attacks of his political opponents, who used every means to defeat, though they dared not vote against, the bill. Through all this, one of the most eventful periods of his political life, with the most agonized feelings, justly apprehending the most direful consequences if this, or some other such measure, were not adopted, he sustained himself against friend and foe, as he has always done when his country was in danger, whether from external or internal causes, to the admiration of all who witnessed his brilliant, his powerful efforts. By this measure he saved the Northern interests, and by this measure he spared the shedding of Southern blood. How has he been rewarded? Charged, upon the one side, with having sacrificed the tariff interests; on the other, with continuing it as a "curse upon the country." This is the measure and this is the man which call down such heavy denunciations from the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Another gentleman from the city of New York, [MR. MOORE,] in a long and vehement speech, which he has obtained much credit for delivering, designated the two great political parties as the "democracy and aristocracy of the country;" the one an advocate for the rights of the people, the other a "political amalgamation and jugglery." Democracy, he says, "protects the rights and liberties of the people; wealth and aristocracy are enemies to freedom." All such professions are made for political effect. I have no very great respect for the opinion of those who endeavor to create invidious distinctions in the social relations of life. The politician who attempts to excite prejudices between the rich and the poor, the mechanic and the employer, is no friend to freedom; his object is to raise himself into distinction, regardless of the consequences to those he is endeavoring to deceive.

If the dominant party do appropriate to themselves the name of democracy, and attach to the minority that of aristocracy, be it so. After having abandoned all its tenets, brought into disrepute all its principles, if they still desire to hold to the name, it is an additional evidence of a further determination to deceive the people. But they will not longer be deceived; they begin to feel that this modern democracy is too chameleon-like for their perception, is composed of too discordant materials for consistency, and too great an amalgamation of contradictory opinions—of men in favor and against internal improvement; tariff and anti-tariff; masons and anti-masons; federalists and anti-federalists; but none, no, not one, holding and acting what Washington, Jefferson, and Madison, understood to be republican principles. Then take to yourselves the name of democracy, but be honest, and avow what it means—sworn adhesion to this administration, with a pledge even to Martin Van Buren forever.

I will now, Mr. Chairman, call the attention of the committee, and that of my colleague [MR. THOMAS] in particular, to the few remarks I intend to submit.

It will be recollected that some weeks since, resolutions, which had passed the Legislature of Maryland, were forwarded by the Governor of that State to their Senators and Representatives in Congress. Resolutions from other States, upon the same subject, had been presented both in the Senate and this House, and in every instance, when desired, printed. In fact, sir, resolutions coming from any State were so uniformly received and printed, that it could not be supposed that Maryland alone should be denied this courtesy. It was, therefore, with the utmost surprise I saw my colleague from the upper district of Maryland [MR. THOMAS] rise from his seat and object to the reception or printing of two of that series of resolutions.

[Here MR. F. THOMAS rose and explained, that it was not to the printing, or the contents of those resolutions, to which he objected, but it was to the time; and he protested against the opinion of the Legislature being considered as the expression of the voice of the people of Maryland; and expressed at some length his opinions in relation to the constitution of the State, which gave an unequal representation in both branches of the Legislature.]

MR. JENIFER said he did not desire to do injustice to his colleague, and therefore would read his remarks, as published in the Globe, which he now called on him to admit or deny. MR. J. then read from the Globe as follows:

"MR. THOMAS said he was misunderstood by his colleague. He did not object to the reception of these resolutions on account of their contents. It was unnecessary to read them. He knew they professed to express the voice of the people of Maryland. Now, whether they attempted to give that voice as to one question or another, he should equally protest against their reception this morning. The House has suspended its rules to receive petitions, and such resolutions as will give rise to no debate. Whenever any resolution shall be presented, designed to produce impressions as to the opinions of the people of Maryland, he desired to have an opportunity to show that the Legislature of Maryland ought not to be considered a fair exponent of the popular will. The character of the Government of that State is such, that the majority have been ruled by the minority for years. Under such circumstances, it ill becomes any man to parade before the country resolutions of the Maryland Legislature as evidence that the people of the State are for or against any particular measure of national policy. Let the gentleman present his resolutions on next Monday, or any other day, when the rules of the House do not forbid all explanation or discussion; and then he (Mr. T.) would take care to make such explanations as to the organization of the Government of Maryland as would guard against false impressions. He would show that, in consequence of the unjust apportionment of representation, two thirds of the people might be for, and yet two thirds of the Maryland Legislature would be against, any particular measure of national policy. If gentlemen are disposed to do that which is fair, they will not press the presentation of these resolutions now, when all explanations are out of order."

Mr. THOMAS answered that he could not vouch for the verbal accuracy of this report of what he had said on a former occasion, but he was certain that the opinions imputed to him in the article referred to were entertained, and he believed that they had been substantially expressed, when the resolutions of the General Assembly of Maryland, as to the power of either House of Congress to expunge from its journal any part of the proceedings of the body, had been presented.

Mr. Chairman, (said Mr. THOMAS,) since I have been unexpectedly called on to perform a part in this strange scene, I hope the committee will permit me to go beyond a mere response to the inquiry of my colleague. My course respecting these Maryland resolutions has been most strangely misapprehended and perverted. Notwithstanding repeated positive contradictions by me, it has been again and again alleged that I have objected to the reception and publication of these resolutions of the General Assembly of Maryland. If this averment had been accompanied by that qualification, without which manifest injustice must be done to me, I should not detain the committee, and interrupt the business before it, to make another remark.

Sir, what are the circumstances under which these resolutions were presented? We all know that, by the rules of this House, after thirty days of the session have transpired, petitions cannot be presented unless by special order, except on the first day in each week when the House is in session. Resolutions and other proceedings of the State Legislatures, designed to be presented to Congress, have always been treated by this House as memorials, and, as such, are receivable when petitions from the people are in order. Before the resolutions from Maryland were offered, the resolutions from Kentucky, recommending a distribution of the proceeds of the sales of public lands, had been presented, and were entitled to be considered on the morning of the first day of each week of the session, to the exclusion of all other business.

The protracted discussion to which the Kentucky resolutions gave origin induced the House, on the morning when the Maryland resolutions were offered, to suspend the rules so as to permit the presentation of such petitions, memorials, and resolutions, as would cause no debate. For that purpose the States were called in order; and when resolutions from Maryland were called for, one of my colleagues [Mr. WASHINGTON] rose, and presented the resolutions of the General Assembly of that State respecting the land fund; and, immediately after, my colleague [Mr. JENIFER] presented the resolutions of the same body as to the power of each House of Congress over its own journals. I now repeat, I did not object absolutely either to the reception or publication of these resolutions; but I requested my colleagues not to present them at that time, but to offer them when the rules of the House did not forbid debate, saying that I desired to offer some reasons to show that the Legislature of Maryland, as at present organized, had no right to speak for a majority of the people of the State. These explanations are superfluous here, but they may be useful elsewhere; for without them gentlemen may make a false issue before the people of my State, to my prejudice, and evade dexterously the only issue which I have tendered, and am prepared to try. We receive, and I have voted to receive and to print, petitions from individuals; and I could not and did not therefore protest against the reception of these resolutions. I was willing to receive them on a suitable occasion, and to order them to be printed, after an opportunity had been offered to me to show that they ought not to be considered conclusive evidence of the voice of the people of Maryland, but be treated as the opinions of sixty or seventy highly respectable and influential citizens of the State. The sensibility which has been displayed on this subject is somewhat surprising. These resolutions are intended to influence the legislation of Congress, by proclaiming the will of the Legislature of one of the States of the confederacy. And in the absence of those explanations which I have desired to make, this House and the country would suppose that the majority of the people of the State coincided necessarily in opinion with a majority of the members of the Legislature; because few would imagine that a high-spirited people lived submissively under a form of government where the majority cannot control either branch of the Legislature.

If it can be shown, however, that the men who have undertaken to speak for Maryland have not full authority to do so, ought it not to be done? No fair man can wish to conceal any fact calculated to confer precisely on these resolutions the influence to which they are entitled. Those by whom they have been presented must be responsible for the developments to which they may give rise.

I have said that the opinion of the Legislature of Maryland is not good evidence that the people of the State are for or against any measure of national policy, and will pause to present a few facts corroborative of that declaration.

The Senate of Maryland is chosen once in five years by an electoral college, composed of forty members. Each of the cities of the State is entitled to elect one, and each of the counties two, of the members of that college. Consequently, the people of Calvert, one of the counties represented here by my colleague, being in number only 8,899, have as much influence in the choice of State Senators as 45,793 inhabitants who are residents of the populous and wealthy county from which I come. And the city of Baltimore, with a population of 80,625, has no greater influence in the selection of our State Senators than that enjoyed by the city of Annapolis, wherein there were but 2,632 inhabitants when the census of 1830 was taken. No one, then, will contend that Senators thus chosen have a right to speak for the majority of the people of Maryland.

The condition of things in the House of Delegates is, if that be possible, still more insufferable. That body consists of eighty members; and, of these, each city is authorized to elect two, and each county four; and, thereby, in that which ought to be the popular branch of the Legislature, ten counties and one city, having less than seventy-three thousand of the white population of the State, have the power to elect a majority of the members of that House, which in conjunction with the Senate, enacts all the laws that touch the lives, liberties, and property, of all the white inhabitants of Maryland, who exceeded, according to the census in 1830, two hundred and ninety-one thousand. Mr. T. said he had referred to the number of white inhabitants, to support his positions, because he had been called on unexpectedly to speak, and did not at the moment recollect the number of all the inhabitants of the State. But that there may be no pretext for misrepresenting my motives for making the reference, I will apply another test to the State constitution of Maryland, and for that purpose will compare the representation in the House of Delegates, from the districts represented here by two of my colleagues and myself, who are friendly to the administration, with that of three of my colleagues who are in the opposition. This mode of ascertaining whether the House of Delegates can, of right, speak for the people of the State, will not be objected to by any fair man, since each congressional district has, very nearly, equal federal numbers.

In the House of Delegates there are—		Members

Here, then, are facts produced which prove incontestably that the material allegations made by me, when the Maryland resolutions were presented, are true. No one will have the effrontery to contradict these statements; and they show that the majority of the people of Maryland have been and are ruled by a meager minority. These facts ought to be known here, and to the whole country, that the resolutions which have been paraded before the House may be properly appreciated. They ought to be known, too, that the means by which party triumphs in Maryland are often gained may be understood every where; and that enlightened and liberal men of all parties may, with one voice, denounce the injustice and tyranny of those who resist all attempts to amend a constitution unworthy of the age in which we live. It is monstrous to behold a constitution, in this liberal era of the world, by the express provisions of which one third of the people living under it have absolute power to choose all the members of the Senate, and a majority of the members of the House of Delegates, and thus govern and give law to the other two thirds of their fellow-citizens. This being the case, the allegations heretofore made by me were fully warranted, and the pledges made have been redeemed. Instead of meeting the only issue I have made, and attempting to show, first, that the Legislature is not organized as I have averred, or, secondly, that our State Legislature may be relied on when it attempts to speak for the majority of the people, my colleague has avoided these matters, and has given his whole attention to things of secondary import. He has reproached me for having omitted to make these expostions of the character of our State constitution, when one of my colleagues [Mr. McKim] presented certain resolutions of the General Assembly of Maryland, and when another of my colleagues [Mr. Howard] offered other resolutions of the same body. My justification is very easy, and can be made in a very few words. The resolutions referred to did not relate to measures of national policy equally interesting to all the people of Maryland; and I did not think that the presentation of them afforded the best and most suitable opportunity to make the explanations which I have submitted, and which, my constituents had a right to expect, would be made by me, when a suitable occasion presented itself.

Mr. JENIFER continued. I know they were not the remarks as delivered, but they were published, and have gone to the world as such; and as they were calculated to deceive, and intended to operate here and elsewhere, I must be excused for referring to them.

It will be seen that my colleague has endorsed the report of his speech in the Globe; and although he says he did not object to the reception of the resolutions on account of their contents, I will undertake to show, from irresistible inference, that it was to the contents alone to which he did object. [Mr. THOMAS interrupted, and asked whether his colleague intended to impeach his motives.] I do not mean to impeach the motives of my colleague, because it would be unparliamentary so to do; but I mean to state facts, and leave it for the committee to say what inference is to be drawn from those facts. The resolutions, to the printing of which my colleague objected, were in relation to "a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands," and against the "expunging from the journals of either House of Congress the whole or any part of their proceedings."

The first of these resolutions reads as follows:

"BY THE HOUSE OF DELEGATES, April 1, 1836.

"Resolved by the General Assembly of Maryland, That each of the United States has an equal right, in its just proportion, to participate in the benefits of the public lands, the common property of the Union.

"Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives of this State, in the Congress of the United States, be requested to use their exertions to procure the passage of a law to appropriate to the use of the different States of the Union such part of the proceeds of the public lands of the United States as may be equitable and just, and in accordance with the public interest.

"Resolved, That his excellency the Governor be requested to communicate a copy of the aforesaid resolutions to each of the Senators and Representatives of this State in the Congress of the United States."

Mr. Chairman, it will not be forgotten that resolutions have been received and printed, during the present as well as former sessions, from other States in the Union, in relation to this particular subject, and from Maryland upon other subjects: one asking for a survey of certain rivers on the Eastern Shore of Maryland; another for indemnity for French spoliations; and on the same morning that the above-referred-to resolutions were objected to by my colleague, he permitted another of his colleagues [Mr. McKim] from the city of Baltimore to present, have printed, and referred to the Committee on Roads and Canals, resolutions passed by the same Legislature, and forwarded at the same time, without any objection whatever; and yet my colleague from the upper district of Maryland would have you believe that it was not the contents of those resolutions to which he objected. I will here do justice to my colleague from the city of Baltimore, [Mr. McKim.] When these several resolutions were received, he, as the senior Representative, was consulted as to their presentation. He took charge of those in relation to the survey of the Chesapeake bay and Susquehanna river; another colleague, those in relation to the French spoliations; a third, those in favor of a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands; and I, myself, those against expunging. The two former were received and printed; the two latter were objected to by my colleague, [Mr. THOMAS.] My colleague from Baltimore did no more than his duty required of him. No matter what may have been his opinion of the constitution or Legislature of his State, he felt, as every Representative should feel, that these enactments were at least entitled to a respectful consideration; and however he may have differed in political opinions from them, they, as the immediate representatives of the people, had a right to expect the same courtesy which had been extended to every other State. I do not, Mr. Chairman, mean to go beyond parliamentary rules, by attributing motives. But I will ask, if the Governor of the State of Maryland had forwarded resolutions passed by the Legislature of the State, condemning the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, or approving the expunging resolutions of the Senate, is there a member of this committee, knowing his political bias, who would have doubted for a moment that my colleague would have objected to the reception or printing of the one or the other? or that he would have complained that the Legislature of Maryland was not "a fair exponent of the popular will?" This is intended to convey the impression that the Legislature is so constructed as not to express the voice of the people; and when he adds, "that the character of the Government of the State is such, that the majority have been ruled by the minority for years," it clearly implies that the Legislature have been misrepresenting their constituents.

I regret that, in the war waged by the General Government against the rights and interests of the States, my colleague should have taken his stand in support of the former against the latter, and should have pursued a course in relation to his own State calculated to bring into disrepute her constitution, her Legislature, and her people. He admits that he has no respect for, but holds in contempt, her constitution; he charges upon the Legislature a misrepresentation of the interests and opinions of their constituents; and therefore reflects upon the people themselves for having framed and approved this constitution, and for adhering to the Legislature of their own voluntary selection. But why come here to complain of the constitution of Maryland? Does he desire that this House or this Government should reorganize it? or does he intend to invoke the aid of this administration to assist in the reform which he and his friends are now attempting throughout the State? Sir, we want no interference from this administration, or the officers of this Government, in the regulation of our affairs; we have had enough already of intermeddling in our elections, by their dependants; but the honest intelligence of the people has withstood all these efforts at corruption. I am aware that Maryland has been pledged to the support of Mr. Van Buren; but she has not yet been delivered over. Nor have we any apprehension, notwithstanding the bold attacks made upon her constitution and her Legislature, and the inducements held out to her people, but that she will be found resisting to the last all efforts to bring her in subjection to the administration, or to transfer her over to the successor. I confess I do feel a pride and gratification to be a Representative from a State, and of a district immediately adjoining, and almost surrounding, the seat of this Government, whose people have had the firm independence to withstand the temptations, however other districts and other States have yielded to the allurements of power and patronage.

My colleague, to show that "the Legislature ought not to be considered a fair exponent of the popular will," refers to the manner in which the Senators and Delegates are elected. He complains that the smaller counties have an equal representation with the larger; that his congressional district is entitled to but ten members, whilst the district represented by one of his colleagues has twenty, on the floor of the House of Delegates. This is all true. But does my colleague mean to induce a belief that the Delegates from the counties of his district were opposed to the resolutions in favor of a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands? If so, I will show from the journal of proceedings of the House of Delegates that he is either deceived himself, or is attempting to deceive others. What are the facts? The popular branch of the Legislature of Maryland is composed of eighty members, nineteen counties each sending four, and two cities each sending two. When the resolutions in relation to the public lands were under consideration, the first, as far as the journals show, passed without a dissenting voice; the second, to which I ask the attention of the committee, is—

"Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives of this State, in the Congress of the United States, be requested to use their exertions to procure the passage of a law to appropriate to the use of the different States of the Union such part of the proceeds of the public lands of the United States as may be equitable and just, and in accordance with the public interest."

Upon this resolution the ayes and noes were taken, and out of the whole number of the House of Delegates, including twenty-five in favor of Mr. Van Buren, but three recorded their votes against it—one from the city of Baltimore, and only two of the ten members of my colleague's district, and not one from his own county. Who, I ask, has misrepresented his constituents? my honorable colleague, who goes against the Legislature of his State, the people of the State, and his own district, or the Van Buren members of the Legislature who voted for the land resolutions? Thus, it appears that he goes against his State, his district, his own county, and even the Van Buren party of his State, to further the views of the party here. Disregarding the opinion of his State, as expressed by a unanimous vote of her Senators, and with but three dissenting voices in the popular branch, yet he says "it ill becomes any man to parade before the country resolutions of the Maryland Legislature, as evidence that the people of the State are for or against any particular measure of national policy." Mr. Chairman, I am sure you will agree with me that the annals of legislative proceedings do not exhibit a more flagrant violation of representative duty than is here developed.

The subject of the public lands has long since been looked to with great interest by the people of Maryland. As far back as the year 1821, their attention was more particularly directed to it by an able report made in her Senate by a member of that body, now high in office under this administration; upon which resolutions were passed in both branches of the Legislature, without I believe a dissenting voice in either, calling upon her then Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States to endeavor to procure the passage of an act to carry into effect the principles therein set forth. It may not be improper to remark, that at that period the Senate was composed of the federal, and a majority of the House of Delegates of the old democratic party—for our new distinctions had not then grown up. In 1832 their attention was again called to the subject more particularly, in consequence of the very luminous and conclusive report made to the Senate of the United States, accompanied by a bill, by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky. The provisions of that land bill met their approbation; and so important to the interests of her State, and the Union generally, did the Legislature view its passage, that they adopted resolutions, which were again forwarded to her Representatives here, which were presented, received, and printed, without any opposition whatever from my colleague, who then had a seat on this floor. But up to that period the President's opinions were not known; he had not then vetoed the land bill. Since when, it seems to be the determination of the party to retain in the Treasury, at the disposal of the Executive, all the surplus revenue which cannot be squandered away upon useless fortifications and Quixotic expeditions. I think I have satisfied the committee that my colleague is mistaken, when he says it was not to the contents of the resolutions to which he objected, and that he has failed to make good his pledge to show "that the Legislature of Maryland ought not to be considered a proper exponent of the popular will."

Upon the subject of the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, (however political divisions may have, in other respects, distracted the State,) there has been but one opinion. Looking to her rights as well as to her interests, Maryland has, upon all occasions, viewed this measure as one of the highest importance; and it has been approved by all political parties. In 1821, it received the sanction of a federal Senate and a democratic House of Delegates; in 1832, it passed again both branches of the Legislature; and, in 1836, the Van Buren and anti-Van Buren parties united in supporting it; for the former did not dare to go against it. Thus, whenever it has been before the Legislature, amidst all the conflicts of parties, the principles of the land bill have been approved, and the people of Maryland have always sustained their Representatives who advocated it.

The declaration that "the character of the Government of the State is such that the majority have been ruled by the minority for years," is such a bold assumption, contrary to the facts, that I must ask the indulgence of the committee whilst I relieve the Legislature from so unjust and so extraordinary a charge.

I am well aware that frequent attempts have been made, not only to deceive the people of Maryland upon this subject, but to induce an impression here and elsewhere that if the vote of the State, at the presidential election of 1832, had been taken by general ticket, and not by districts, as it was, the State would have been for Andrew Jackson. Now, Mr. Chairman, by reference to the returns of that election, the majority of the aggregate vote of the State was upwards of 1,000 votes against the present incumbent! And, since that period, the whigs of both branches of the Legislature have changed the mode of election from district to general ticket; which, had they done before, the whole electoral vote of the State would have been against the present incumbent, as we have no doubt it will, at the ensuing election, be against his nominated successor. Again: the returns of 1835 show that had the Representatives for Congress been elected by general ticket, as in Georgia and other States, my colleague from the upper district of Maryland would not now be honored with a seat on this floor. So with regard to the House of Delegates in 1834. In that year there were but four counties out of nineteen in favor of President Jackson's administration; and even the city of Baltimore returned Delegates against him; and more, the three counties represented by my colleague returned but two members out of ten favorable to his administration. The House of Delegates, in 1834, stood, whigs 62, for Jackson 18. How was it in 1835—the present Legislature? In the House of Delegates, 55 anti-Van Buren, 25 Van Buren. Of those 25, one member was returned from each of six counties which gave majorities against Van Buren. Therefore, take those six from his vote, and there would be but nineteen members out of eighty, in the popular branch, in favor of Mr. Van Buren; and yet my colleague asserts, boldly asserts, "that the majority has been ruled by the minority for years, and that the Legislature of Maryland ought not to be considered a proper exponent of the popular will."

Mr. THOMAS here expressed a hope that his colleague would forbear to press this discussion now, when the House must be impatient to proceed with the business immediately before it, and would publish what he had intended to say, when he (Mr. T.) would reply to it if there was any thing which required notice from him.

Mr. J. replied. I can assure my colleague that I shall say nothing I am not willing to print, or print any thing which I would not say; nor will I say or print any thing for which I am not responsible.

Mr. THOMAS rose, and inquired whether he was to understand that his colleague had said any thing which was to be considered personal.

Mr. J. said, no, sir; not at all.

Then (said Mr. THOMAS) I have nothing more to say.

Mr. J. resumed. My colleague complains that the representation in Maryland is unequal in another respect; that the smaller counties have a much larger ratio of black population, in comparison to the white, than the more populous ones. It was not to have been expected that such an objection would have been advanced by any member from a slaveholding State, and at a time, too, when the rights of those States are in danger of being invaded; when the country has for months been almost convulsed by the efforts of the abolitionists, that he should furnish them with an argument in furtherance of their unholy plans. Does not my colleague know that one of the strongest complaints urged by those Senators of the North is, that the slave population of the South should be represented in the Congress of the United States? Yet he charges it against his own State. But, sir, upon this subject I have done.

I have trespassed upon the patience of the committee much longer than I had intended or desired, and owe an apology for having so far travelled out of the question immediately before it. I have heretofore refrained from occupying the time of the House, lest it might be said that there was a disposition to delay the passage of the appropriation bills; nor would I to-night have said one word, had I believed that a more appropriate opportunity would have been afforded. But it was only this morning that the resolutions from the State of Kentucky, in relation to the proceeds of the public lands, received what I believe to be their final disposition. And I have no idea that the bill from the Senate upon the same subject will be permitted to be discussed in this House. Under these circumstances, and when weeks have elapsed since the Maryland resolutions were presented, and objected to by my colleague, and still remain without being noticed, I hope I may be excused for having thus long detained you.

One other remark, sir, and I shall have done. The same Legislature which passed those in relation to the public lands passed also the non-expunging resolutions. And as the printing of them was also objected to by my colleague, I will read them for the information of the committee:

"BY THE HOUSE OF DELEGATES, March 2, 1836.

"Whereas, by the fifth section of the first article of the constitution of the United States, it is provided that each of the Houses of Congress shall keep a journal of its proceedings; and whereas the Senate of the United States, in the year 1834, at the first session of the twenty-third Congress, did, in its legislative capacity, pass the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the President, in the late executive proceedings in relation to the public revenue, has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the constitution and laws, but in derogation of both."

"Which resolution consequently became a part of the proceedings of the Senate at that session: And whereas attempts are now making, in several of the States of this Union, to cause said resolution to be expunged from the journal of the House; which, if carried into effect, will cause said journal not to be a record of the proceed ings of the House, but of a part of its proceedings, in utter disregard of the provision already cited of the constitution of the United States: And whereas the power to expunge the record of any portion of the proceedings of the Senate necessarily implies the power to expunge or efface the whole, and may leave the country at any time, (if a bare majority should deem fit,) without an official record of the proceedings of one or both branches of the National Legislature:

"And forasmuch as the people of the State of Maryland, to whom the federal constitution is dear, by whom it has been ever cherished, and who are determined at all hazards to maintain it, view with deep solicitude this alarming infraction of one of its important provisions, and are desirous to record their solemn protest against its violation: Therefore,

"Resolved by the General Assembly of Maryland, That the expunging from the journal of either House of Congress the whole or any part of the proceedings of the body is a manifest and dangerous violation of the constitution of the United States; and be it further resolved, that our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use all constitutional means to prevent a measure fraught with such danger to constitutional freedom.

"Resolved, That his excellency the Governor be requested to transmit a copy of the preceding preamble and resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States."

It will be seen that these resolutions refer to the fact that other States in the Union were making attempts to have expunged from the journals part of the proceedings of the Senate, the perpetration of which the Legislature of Maryland believe would be a "dangerous violation of the constitution of the United States." The States of Illinois and New Hampshire had expressed their opinions in favor of those proceedings, which were printed, and had been laid on our desks. But Maryland was against them; and this, no doubt, was mortifying in the extreme, that a State which had been pledged to the support of Mr. Van Buren should, immediately under the eye of the Executive, dare to raise her voice against his will. I was anxious that these resolutions should be printed, that you and the country might see, however subservient other men and other States might be to the will and power of one man, that the people of Maryland, whom I have the honor in part to represent here, are determined to stand by the constitution of their country, to endeavor to save it from the unhallowed mutilation of the minions of power, and rescue it from the grasp of executive encroachments.

Mr. EVERETT then moved to amend the amendment pending, for $700,000 for the armament of the fortifications, by reducing the sum to $300,000; which, after some remarks by Messrs. CAMBRELENG, WISE, MERCER, and PHILLIPS, was lost.

Mr. GRANGER moved to reduce the sum to $500,000; lost.

The amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, then moved a variety of amendments to the bill; others were also moved by other gentlemen, some of which were agreed to and others rejected.

At about half past 12 o'clock the committee rose and reported the bill and amendments to the House, and they were ordered to be printed.

The House then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 25:

ABOLITION REPORT.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of Mr. PINCKNEY, from the committee on the subject of the abolition of slavery.

The immediate question pending was the motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, to recommit the report to the same committee, with instructions to report a resolution declaring that Congress has not the power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia.

Mr. ROBERTSON resumed, and spoke about an hour in conclusion of the remarks which he had commenced on former days. Mr. ROBERTSON's speech in full, as given from day to day, will be found imbedded in succeeding pages.

MAY 19th. After Mr. BYNUM and Mr. PINCKNEY had addressed the House,

Mr. ROBERTSON rose in reply to those gentlemen, and in support of his motion.

He said he ought, perhaps, to feel much honored by the special notice of so distinguished a leader of the great democratic party as the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. BYNUM.] That gentleman, Mr. Speaker, seems greatly at a loss to comprehend my reasons for submitting the resolution now under consideration, which, in his opinion, it seems, is fraught with danger to the Union. Sir, I am not to be deterred from defending the rights and interests of my constituents, by groundless charges or apprehensions of danger to the Union. The Union is always in danger, in the estimation of the dominant party, from all who dare to resist its schemes or measures. Similar efforts were made by the federalists, when in power, to bring suspicion and odium upon the old republican party, by ascribing their opposition to French influence, and enmity to the Union. But, sir, I rise with no view of replying to remarks of this character, nor with the vain expectation of satisfying the gentleman from North Carolina. My object is to endeavor to vindicate the resolution upon your table, to the satisfaction of this House, and more especially of those who sent me here, and who have a right to know the reasons which influence my public conduct.

I must confess, sir, that to me it seems not a little strange, that objections should be so vehemently urged to this resolution by the gentleman from North Carolina and the chairman of the select committee. They both admit the justice of the principle it asserts, and are prepared, as they tell us, to sustain it by their votes; yet they are both unwilling that a direct vote should be had upon it, and resist every effort to bring it before the House. They denounce a measure they themselves proclaim to be just. Surely it ought to be a sufficient answer to these gentlemen to say, I urge it, on the contrary, because it is just, and asserts, as they themselves concede, the constitutional rights of the people.

But though this reason ought to be sufficient, there is an additional consideration, Mr. Speaker, by which I am influenced, the force of which none can deny. With me, it carries the weight of the most direct and positive instructions. I allude to the sentiments expressed throughout the whole Southern country, and more especially by my own State, in regard to the very question involved in the resolution. I set up no pretensions, sir, to be the exclusive representative of the South; but I may at least be allowed to understand something of the views and feelings of my native State. Are gentlemen aware that a resolution, denying the power of Congress to interfere with slavery, in the precise terms of the resolution on your table, was adopted by the General Assembly of Virginia during its late session, by an almost unanimous vote, and transmitted to each of her representatives on this floor? In taking the course, then, so much disapproved by these gentlemen, I do but speak the voice of my constituents—of the entire State, indeed, which I have in part the honor to represent; and maintain their rights upon the very ground they themselves have placed it. Knowing their wishes, and satisfied with the justice of their cause, I could not shrink from maintaining it, without being a recreant to my trust. Are gentlemen answered?

But we are told, if we press this question we must inevitably lose it; that there is an overwhelming majority against us. How have gentlemen ascertained the fact asserted with so much confidence? What vote has ever yet been taken, from which the sense of the House could be known.

[Mr. PINCKNEY explained. He did not say that he knew of his own knowledge that the resolution would be negatived. He merely apprehended that such would be the case. As the matter now stood, Congress was uncommitted on the subject.]

Mr. ROBERTSON. Sir, I am opposed to all non-commitments upon so vital a question. I desire to see a direct vote upon it. It is necessary that the people should know the extent of their danger, that means may be taken in time to provide against it.

The gentleman from South Carolina informs us that there are 34,000 names subscribed to the abolition memorials. Of these, about 15,000 are the names of females; the residue, nineteen or twenty thousand, of males; all of whom, perhaps, are entitled to the right of suffrage. These constitute the vanguard; the bold, the daring, the reckless, of the abolitionists. There are doubtless many more; double, triple, perhaps quadruple the number, who secretly wish well to the cause. It is impossible to measure the power and influence of this formidable band. I repeat that they have obtained all that they could rationally have anticipated; and even more. They must have known that they could not, at this session, procure the passage of a law abolishing slavery: it is not the proper time to press it. But they have succeeded in getting up agitation from one extremity of the Union to the other; and this report, in waiving the question of constitutional power, upon the ground now avowed, that a majority of Congress is prepared to assert it, is calculated to inspire them with fresh hopes, and to increase, rather than to allay, the apprehensions of the South. It is not to be expected that the abolitionists, under these circumstances, will desist from their nefarious schemes. I am unwilling, therefore, to give up the only barrier which can effectually protect us, without a struggle to defend it. I will not believe that Congress is disposed to wrest that barrier from us, or to deny us its protection. But, if such be the fact, let us know it, that, by an amendment to the constitution, we may put an end to a pretension so incompatible with our safety. It is for this reason, sir, I wish the question met and decided by a direct and unequivocal vote. I desire to see the rights of the Southern people rested, not on the fluctuating and capricious notions of moral obligation, or the shifting ground of political expediency, but on the firm basis of the constitution, on fixed principles, on principles which all may appeal to, and which are the same to-day, to-morrow, and forever.

[The morning hour having expired, the House proceeded to the orders of the day.]

MAY 21st. Mr. ROBERTSON, who was entitled to the floor, again addressed the House.

I avail myself of the permission of the Chair, said Mr. R., to enter into a fuller exposition and vindication of the resolution I had the honor to submit a few days past, than I then had an opportunity of doing. This is due to myself, to those who sent me here; but, above all, to the solemn importance of the question, and the vast magnitude of the interests it involves. I shall endeavor, sir, to perform this task, for which, however, I am conscious of possessing no adequate powers, either physical or mental, as calmly and dispassionately as the nature of the subject will permit; and to abstain, if possible, from those exciting topics by which its discussion has been almost invariably characterized.

I have already assigned some reasons for dissatisfaction with the report of the select committee, and for the opinion expressed, that it would be considered as virtually surrendering the constitutional question. If it could have been met satisfactorily to the South, no sufficient excuse can be offered for waiving it; and all will believe it was avoided because of the difficulty of making good the position for which we contend. The chairman tells us, as an apology for taking this course, that the committee abstained from examining it, "because they were not instructed to discuss it." Sir, the instructions, so far from prohibiting this discussion, plainly authorized and required it. They enjoined it upon the committee to report that, "in the opinion of this House, Congress ought not to interfere, in any way, with slavery in the District of Columbia, because it would be a violation of the public faith, unwise, impolitic, and dangerous to the Union; assigning such reasons for these conclusions as, in the judgment of the committee, may be best calculated to enlighten the public mind, to allay excitement, to repress agitation, to secure and maintain the just rights of the slaveholding States and of the people of this District, and to restore harmony and tranquillity among the various sections of this Union." Thus it appears that full latitude was allowed the committee in supporting the conclusions which the House desired to see maintained; and what stronger reason could they have assigned, than that the proposed interference with slavery in this District would be a direct infraction of the constitution? This reason alone would have been sufficient. It embraced all the positions the House had taken; for, if the measure could be shown to be unconstitutional, it must, of necessity, be a breach of faith, unwise, impolitic, and dangerous. Sir, the committee were not justified in omitting to interpose this constitutional barrier in defence of the rights they were instructed to maintain.

Independently of his instructions, the chairman of the committee, especially, stood bound to demonstrate the unconstitutionality of the proposed interference. In a letter to which his name is affixed, addressed to the electors of the Charleston electoral district, (South Carolina,) he uses this language:

"And now I ask my fellow-citizens seriously to consider, and candidly to decide, whether, as I have already succeeded in obtaining a solemn declaration by Congress that 'any interference with slavery in the District of Columbia would be a violation of the public faith,' if I should also succeed in procuring the adoption of a report, insisting and demonstrating that a violation of the public faith is unconstitutional, and that therefore, and upon that ground, Congress will not, and ought not to, interfere in any way with slavery in the District of Columbia: whether doing this, I really deserve to be stigmatized as a traitor to the South."

Sir, I will apply no such epithet to the chairman of the committee, whether he succeed or fail. But is he likely to realize the expectations he has raised? Does not the report declare that the committee have abstained even from the examination of the constitutional question? It is true that, in another part of the report, the ground indicated in this letter is approached. Even there, however, it is not directly occupied. It is not alleged, nor demonstrated, that a breach of faith is unconstitutional; but that, to prove the act in question a breach of faith, is tantamount, in its binding obligation, to a positive declaration that it would be so. The moral obligation does not necessarily import a constitutional obligation, but is something of equivalent force. Not satisfied, however, with this position, the report goes on to insist that the moral obligation is even more efficacious:

"What is the meaning of the declaration adopted by the House, in relation to the District of Columbia? Is it not that Congress cannot and will not do an act which it has solemnly proclaimed to involve a violation of the public faith? Does it not afford every security to the South which it is in the power of the Federal Government to afford? Is it not tantamount, in its binding obligation upon the Government, to a positive declaration that the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia would be unconstitutional? Nay, is it not even more efficacious in point of fact? Constitutional provisions are matters of construction. The opinion of one House upon an abstract controverted point may be overruled and reversed by another. But when Congress has once declared that a particular act would be a violation of the public faith, is it to be supposed that it would ever violate a pledge thus given to the country?"

Abolition Report.

[H. OF R.]

The whole stress of the argument is to prove, not that to violate the pledge would violate the constitution, as the letter proposes, but that such a pledge gives a security equal, or even superior, to the constitution itself. But does not every man see that this argument is unsound and fallacious? I confess I was surprised to hear it addressed at this time of day to the representatives of the American people—by a gentleman, too, coming from the South.

What folly was it in our ancestors, if this be so, to spend days and months in anxious deliberation, framing written constitutions for each of the States and for the Union, containing guarded limitations against abuses of power? Why did they not discover the superior efficacy of this moral obligation which prohibits every act that violates good faith between man and man, and reposes the rights of their countrymen upon the good faith, the good sense, and the justice, of those who are to administer their Government? If, as the report declares, a succeeding Congress may reverse the opinion of a prior one, in reference to the construction of a written constitution, may they not also controvert an opinion in respect to the existence or efficacy of a moral obligation? Must there not exist even greater contrariety of opinion, upon questions of moral propriety, than of legal construction?

Sir, if the chairman of the committee could have placed the rights of the District upon the ground of the constitution, he has neglected to place them upon the strongest of all positions—upon the only ground on which they can long or successfully be defended. I cannot agree that notions of moral obligation, merely, are higher security than the positive injunctions of our fundamental law. As our sole dependence, they are not worth a rush. Give us the constitution as our defence; we want no higher security. We had a right to expect this from him. It has been affirmed on this floor by one of my colleagues, [Mr. WISE,] that the chairman gave an explicit pledge that the question should be placed upon that ground. I have heard no denial of this statement. But the gentleman, I observe, is not now in his seat, and I forbear, therefore, to make any further remark upon that subject. Perhaps he will insist that he has redeemed his promise—that he has convinced, or will convince, the House, that every breach of good faith is a violation of the constitution. I fear he will find himself mistaken; but if not—if he shall succeed in producing this conviction—then the House, I trust, as well as himself, will concur in supporting the resolution now under consideration. If the majority shall be of opinion that the measure is unconstitutional, and will unite in saying so, it is immaterial by what course of reasoning each may arrive at that conclusion. Let us declare the opinion that it is a violation of the constitution, and each reconcile his vote to his constituents, or his own conscience, upon whatever grounds his judgment may best approve. It is to the constitution, Mr. Speaker, that those whom I have the honor to represent, nay, sir, the entire State, itself, from which I come, acting through her immediate representatives, has appealed for protection.

I have already adverted, Mr. Speaker, to the resolution on this subject, adopted at the last session of the General Assembly of Virginia, of which the instruction I have moved is an exact copy. That resolution was adopted in the House of Delegates by a vote of 106 to 13. It was offered, permit me to say, not by one of those whose patriotism might be questioned, on the ground of opposition to the ruling powers, but by one of the orthodox faith—by a staunch friend of the administration. The administration majority in that House almost unanimously, perhaps without an exception, sustained it. Nor does Virginia alone assume this position; the Legislatures of Georgia, Mississippi, and Louisiana, if I have not been misinformed, have adopted similar resolutions; one of them, perhaps, going still farther, and threatening to secede from the Union if any measure should be adopted endangering the security of the slaveholding States. I do not advert to these threats as approving them; they ought, perhaps, never to be made. It will be time enough to talk of secession when the crisis shall arrive, if it ever should, when no other alternative is left us but to sever the Union or surrender the rights it was intended to protect. But such language shows, what ought to be known, the danger to result from countenancing, in any way, the schemes of the abolitionists.

The States of South Carolina and Alabama, also, it is said, have denounced the measure in question as a usurpation. This is precisely equivalent, all will admit, to a declaration that it is unconstitutional.

Thus six Southern States have concurred in pronouncing the contemplated interference an infraction of the constitution. With this fact before us, who shall condemn their Representatives, believing that ground to be just, for maintaining it on this floor.

But, say gentlemen, where is the policy of assuming this position? There is an overwhelming majority against you! The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PICKENS] asks, why occupy this ground, with a moral certainty of being driven from it? Sir, the same rules that should govern us in our private transactions should govern us in our representative character. In both, honesty is the best policy. This may not be the politician's creed; and, if not, I thank God, I am no politician. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. BRUNN] can see no reason for pressing this proposition, unless it is that the party, with which he supposes me to act, are more accustomed to defeats than he is. Sir, it may be so. I vote for every measure which I consider constitutional, and beneficial to my country; otherwise I vote against it, and never stop to inquire whether the administration party, or the opposition, vote with me or against me. The idea of being in a minority has for me no terrors. We may be defeated by this overwhelming majority; but in contending against it, the fewer our numbers the greater the honor of the struggle.

In vindicating the claims of the South, on the very grounds it has assumed, I trust her representatives will be united. In an early period of the discussions on this subject, this was the view, as I understood it, of almost the whole Southern delegation; especially of that of my own State. My colleagues, three of whom now sit near me, were, for the most part, decidedly of opinion that we should insist upon a direct and unequivocal vote, a disclaimer of the power to do what the abolitionists demanded. In a speech delivered by one of them, [Mr. GARLAND,] much commended in the loyal prints of the day—and I do not mean to question its merits—I find this passage: "But, say gentlemen, why press the constitutional question now? I reply, we press it from the most urgent and imperious necessity. It is due to our safety, to our quiet, that we press it. Every other form in which this question has been presented has failed to secure us against the repetition of these memorials and petitions. Nothing, it seems, short of a declaration on the part of Congress of their want of constitutional power, will restrain these fanatical crusaders from seeking the intervention of Congress in aid of their diabolical schemes, and perpetually harassing the country."

Abolition Report.

[MAY 25, 1836.]

[Mr. GARLAND rose and said he not only had taken the ground, as stated by his colleague, but desired distinctly to repeat that he still adhered to it.]

Mr. ROBERTSON. I did not suspect my colleague of any intention to abandon it; nor will I believe there is one of them who has maintained it, that can be seduced or driven from it. They are prepared, I trust, to meet all the consequences it may involve; to make a voluntary sacrifice, if necessary, of political prospects, of life itself, sooner than shrink from what they consider their duty to their country and its constitution. They are assigned to defend the pass which may lead to its destruction. In defending it, hopeless as it may seem, they may maintain it; or, should they fail, may yet afford time for those whom they would protect to prepare for a better defence.

We are stationed on the ramparts of the constitution. Shall we be induced to march out of our safe entrenchments and meet the enemy in the open field? Sir, if the commander-in-chief, on a memorable occasion, had committed this folly, we should never have heard of the glorious victory of New Orleans. No, sir; never let us give up the strong-hold of the constitution. Let us not repose too much confidence in the good faith or the justice of those who have power over our lives or our liberties. Those who trust too much to the mercy of men in power may possibly realize the fate of the unfortunate Texians who fell at Goliad. They may surrender at discretion, and be destroyed in detail—murdered by divisions. For myself, if I stood alone, never but with life would I yield up the citadel of our rights. If the day shall come when it must fall, I am content to perish with it.

Mr. R. gave way, without concluding, for the orders of the day.

Mr. Speaker: I have said more than I had intended on the preliminary grounds justifying the submission of the resolution now under discussion. I come now directly to the question involved in it.

In examining that question, I shall enter into no discussion of what the venerable member from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] tauntingly terms the sublime merits of slavery; which, however, sir, permit me to say, whatever they may be, are not perhaps greatly excelled by the sublime merits of modern abolitionism.

Nor will I bestow a moment's attention upon the resolution of the select committee, denying the right of Congress to interfere with slavery in the States. I have never considered that question proper to be debated in this hall. I voted against its reference, because such reference seemed to imply a doubt respecting rights held by a title paramount to the authority of Congress, and too firmly settled to receive any additional strength from its concessions.

The question before us, Mr. Speaker, is one that admits of little play of the fancy; and rejects, even were it in my power to command them, all rhetorical ornaments. It is a dry question of constitutional law; and from its nature, however all must acknowledge its intrinsic importance, little calculated to attract the attention of any but gentlemen accustomed to legal investigations.

In discussing it, from all that has been said, it is my fate, I fear, to address an unwilling auditory—one, perhaps, that has already prejudged the question. A very general impression, none can doubt, exists among our fellow-citizens of the North, that the abolition of slavery is clearly within the constitutional power of Congress. Nothing is more natural. Born or raised under institutions adverse to slavery, and under which it has, in most cases, been long abolished, they readily adopt the opinion that it is lawful for every other Government to do the same. It is natural, sir, but not logical, that they should jump to this conclusion, without nicely examining into its grounds. It falls in with all their early habitudes of thought, with their feelings, and I may add, what is still more difficult to encounter, with their prejudice. They have probably, in a few instances, ever thought to inquire whether the provisions of the federal constitution, which bear upon this question, correspond with their own. Yet every candid man will admit that that constitution is the test by which the proposition is to be tried. I have endeavored to examine into this matter with some care, and think I may venture to say that while there is, perhaps, not one of the Northern States whose fundamental law may not be reasonably construed to give the power of abolishing slavery to the respective legislative bodies, they all of them, in this particular, vary essentially from that of the State of Virginia, and of the United States, under both of which such power is denied to exist. I do not entertain the vain hope of removing the impressions or changing the opinion of any gentleman on this floor. The powers of a Chatham or a Cicero would in all probability work no such effect. But we may hope, from the interesting nature of the subject, that every gentleman will examine, fully, into the reasons of his belief, renounce it if his own reflections prove to him that it rests upon fallacious principles; or, if otherwise, show us the substantial grounds upon which it can be maintained.

The reasons, Mr. Speaker, why the institutions of the Northern States admit or require the interpretation I have mentioned, must occur at once to every one. In those States, during our revolutionary struggle, slaves were comparatively few, and the intention of abolishing slavery, if not actually carried into effect, entertained in almost all. It would have been absurd, therefore, in framing their constitutions, to close the door to abolition, or throw any serious obstacle in its way. The reverse, however, was the case in the South; and there it was reasonable to expect that the fundamental law would be more guarded, in protecting what was a most important interest in a large proportion of the community. The fact, it is believed, will be found, in a great degree, to correspond with these views.

Look, sir, to the constitution of New Hampshire. The clause which may be regarded as bearing upon this point is a part of the 12th section of the bill of rights. It is in these words:

"Every member of the community has a right to be protected by it in the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property; he is therefore bound to contribute his share in the expense of such protection, and to yield his personal service, when necessary, or an equivalent; but no part of a man's property shall be taken from him, or applied to public uses, without his own consent, or that of the representative body of the people." Provisions nearly or precisely similar are to be found in the bill of rights of Massachusetts, section 10; of Delaware, section 10; of Vermont, section 10. The constitution, moreover, of each of these States confers ample power on its legislative body to pass all laws for the good and welfare of the Commonwealth, not repugnant to the constitution itself. (Constitution of New Hampshire, constitution of Massachusetts, article 4; constitution of Vermont, section 2.) Taking these provisions together, it may be fairly contended that there is full authority to take away private property, whether wanted for public use or otherwise, whenever, in the opinion of the Legislature, the measure would conduce to the "good and welfare" of the Commonwealth.

Rhode Island derived her institutions from King Charles II, of blessed memory, and still reposes under the protection of the royal charter. That charter gave to the Governor and company authority to pass all laws, as to them might seem meet for the "good and welfare" of the said company, &c., so as such laws be not contrary and repugnant to the laws of England; and, as slavery was an institution not recognised by the laws of England, whatever doubts may exist of the right to establish it in Rhode Island, none can possibly exist as to the right to abolish it.

Connecticut, like Rhode Island, remained during our revolutionary struggle under the regulations of a charter granted by Charles II. She never formed a constitution till the year 1818. By a provision of her bill of rights adopted in 1784, section 2, it was declared that "no man's goods should be taken unless clearly warranted by law." All that was necessary to justify the taking of them was to pass a law to that effect; and the royal charter gave full authority to pass all laws not contrary to the laws of England. An act, accordingly, for its gradual abolition was passed in 1784, and it ceased, probably, to exist before the adoption of the new constitution.

In New York, the old constitution of 1777 gave, if possible, still greater latitude. It vested the supreme legislative power in two bodies; it contained no direct provision, as far as I have seen, protecting private property from seizure, except what is contained in the 13th section, which declares "that no member of this State shall be disfranchised, or deprived of any of the rights or privileges secured to the subjects of this State, by this constitution, unless by the law of the land, or the judgment of his peers." Thus, then, in New York, not only was the right of the citizen in his property not secured by any constitutional provision, but, even if it was, it might at any time be wrested from him, by any "law of the land," passed by the supreme legislative power: supreme, indeed, since it might abrogate the constitution itself.

Nor do I find in the constitution of New Jersey any recognition of inviolability of private property. The Legislature is clothed with power simply "to pass laws." The common law of England is declared to be in force: and it follows, consequently, that the Legislature might, (as the omnipotent Parliament of Great Britain might,) under the common law, and in the absence of any restrictive clause, exercise the power of abolishing slavery.

Pennsylvania, it is known, passed a law abolishing slavery as early as 1780. I have already shown that the right to do so existed under similar provisions to those which existed in the institutions of New Hampshire, and other Northern and Eastern States.

It would be tedious, and unnecessary to the purpose of my argument, to enumerate in detail the various provisions in the constitutions of those States where slavery still exists. It is enough to say, in general, that Maryland, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Tennessee, in reference to the security of private rights, adopted, with perhaps slight modifications, the provisions of the 29th chapter of magna charta. [9 Hen. III.]

One example, taken from the bill of rights of Tennessee, (article 8,) may suffice for all. It is in these words: "That no freeman shall be taken, or imprisoned, or disseized of his freehold or privileges, or outlawed, or exiled, or in any manner destroyed, or deprived of life, liberty, or property, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land."

The constitution of Kentucky contains a special provision on the subject of emancipation. It declares that "The General Assembly shall have no power to pass laws for the emancipation of slaves without the consent of their owners, or without paying their owners, previous to such emancipation, a full equivalent in money for the slaves so emancipated."

Virginia, in her bill of rights, inserted the provisions of the 29th chapter of magna charta; and, in regard to private property, adopted a provision varying from those in the other States, and closely resembling that in the constitution of the United States. In the sixth article, the language is this: "All men having sufficient evidence of permanent common interest with, and attachment to, the community, have the right of suffrage, and cannot be taxed or deprived of their property for public uses without their own consent, or that of their representatives so elected."

But whatever opinions, Mr. Speaker, we may form, from the peculiar structure of the different State constitutions, or from general reasoning, as to the legislative power of abolishing slavery, when we look to the constitution of the United States, to which alone we must refer to ascertain the extent of our authority, we shall find little room for doubt or difficulty.

The fifth article of the amendments to the federal constitution is in these words: "Nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation."

What is the just interpretation of this provision? Is it not obviously this? Private property may be taken for public use: and when so taken, must be paid for. This construction is, indeed, expressly maintained in the report of the select committee. "The true meaning (says the report, p. 15) of this provision obviously is, that private property shall be taken only for public use, but shall not be taken even then without adequate remuneration."

It is impossible to deny this, without perverting the terms from their ordinary signification. To found a claim for taking private property, it must be wanted for the public use. No learned lawyer need be consulted to give the true meaning of this simple language. You can have it expounded without difficulty, by the plainest farmer or mechanic of the country. Can it be pretended that those who framed the constitution could be ignorant of the import of the terms they employed? No attempt can be successfully made to construe these terms as conferring a right on Congress to seize upon private property, whenever they may suppose the public good, the general welfare, require it. No expression can be found justly warranting so bold a proposition. The enlightened men who framed the provision would never have consented to such a grant of power, which would indeed authorize the invasion of private property at the mere will and discretion of Congress. They designed that it should be held sacred and inviolable by the Government, unless it was necessary to appropriate it to the exigencies of the public. When that was the case, and then only, could it be touched. For example, is land wanted for an encampment? it may be lawfully occupied; slaves, servants, and horses, munitions of war, provisions, may be impressed, when the country requires them for its own uses or necessities: but for no other purpose. You cannot take the property of one man to bestow upon another; still less can you confiscate it under a pretext of the general welfare; nor, under an authority to use it, render it absolutely incapable, as property, of any future use whatever. Such would be the necessary consequence of abolition. In this view, Congress has no more right to effect it under the constitution, than to confiscate a merchant's goods, and throw them into the Potomac, or to waste and destroy his lands, or turn them out as a common.

An attempt, however, has been made to call in aid that provision of the constitution which gives to Congress the right to exercise exclusive legislation over the

H. OF R.]

Abolition Report.

[MAY 25, 1836.]

District. Exclusive legislation for what? For all purposes? No, sir. For all lawful and constitutional purposes; for no others. You cannot break over the limits of the constitution within the District, more than in the States. The claims of our citizens to its protection are not forfeited within the magic circle of the ten miles square. Can Congress establish a national church in the District of Columbia? put down the press? suppress the liberty of speech? or take away the trial by jury? No man will assert this; yet these infractions of the rights of the citizens are prohibited by no higher authority than that which forbids the Government from laying its hands upon private property, unless for the use of the public.

If under this clause you can abolish slavery in the District, it is because you interpret the words public use, as of the same import with public good and general welfare. The doctrine of the general welfare breaks down all limitations of power. Where, sir, would this construction stop? The clause in question was not designed solely for the protection of this District. If, by this forced construction, Congress can seize upon the slaves of the District, what is to prevent it from stretching its arm across the ten miles square, and seizing upon those in the States? If you may confiscate that property in the District upon the plea of the general welfare, constitutionally, may you not, with still greater propriety, use that power to remove the supposed evil existing in the State, on so much more extensive a scale? The inference cannot be resisted. Human ingenuity cannot assign a solid reason for expounding the clause in question so as to protect the citizens of the States, and yet leave those of the District exposed. I call upon gentlemen to show, if they can, any solid reason for the distinction. There is none. Wherever a citizen of the United States may be, within the limits of the Union, the constitution throws its mantle around him. If you may trample upon his privileges here, you may trample upon them every where: if you may seize upon one, you may seize upon all; and there is no barrier against the absolute power of the Federal Government.

[The House proceeded to the orders of the day.]

MAY 24th. It is with unfeigned reluctance, Mr. Speaker, that I throw myself once more upon the indulgence of the House. I trust to their kindness to make allowances for the frequent interruptions to which I have been subjected, during the brief hour allotted to the consideration of the question before us, by the pressure of other important business. I will hasten, sir, to a close, as speedily as possible, that I may relieve the House from what, I fear, so far as I am concerned, must be a dry and uninteresting discussion, and yield the floor to gentlemen every way better entitled to its attention. Permit me, sir, briefly to connect the broken thread of my argument.

The positions which I have endeavored to establish are:

That under a reasonable interpretation of the fundamental institutions of all those States in which slavery has been abolished, private property may be taken, at the discretion of the Legislature, for any purpose whatever, deemed conducive to the public welfare.

That under the constitution of the United States, on the contrary, private property can be taken for no other purpose than for the use of the public.

The clause referred to, "nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation," admits, as I have already shown, of no other reasonable construction. To say that it was designed solely to award compensation, where private property was wanted for public use, but nevertheless to leave, or confer, full power to take it when not so wanted, would be manifestly absurd; it would be to hold that the public must pay for all property which their necessities require;

but that they may confiscate it, at will, when they have no occasion for it, without making any compensation whatever. But again: if it was intended that Congress might take private property at its discretion, whether wanted for public use or not, then the expression, "for public use," was wholly improper and superfluous; for the clause immediately preceding had already declared that no person should "be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law;" and if it was not intended to restrain the generality of this last expression, by limiting the seizure of private property to the case of public necessity, but simply to provide for compensation, the supposed intent would have been effected by connecting with the clause just read the provision relative to compensation, and omitting the words "for public use," so carefully inserted. These words, therefore, could have been inserted with no other view than to limit and define the object or purpose for which private property might be lawfully taken. The framers of the constitution were desirous of guarding it, in every way, against the capricious invasion of the Government. They hedged it around with numerous provisions. Not satisfied with declaring that it should not be taken without due process of law, they withheld, in terms so plain that those who run may read, all authority to touch it, unless when wanted for public use; and, even then, without just compensation.

The gentleman from Massachusetts who sits immediately before me, [Mr. HOAR,] when giving us his views on a former occasion, made a remark which ought not to pass unnoticed. If slavery, said the gentleman, cannot be abolished in this District, without violating the principle which prohibits Government from taking private property for public use without compensation, slavery here must remain undisturbed. Admitting the consequence to be as supposed, how does that settle the question of power? The gentleman has not informed us. But this mode of reasoning has been resorted to by others. The power, say they, must exist somewhere: it does not belong to the people of the District, for they have no political power whatever; it cannot be exercised by the States, or either of them, because the constitution places the District under the exclusive legislation of Congress; if, therefore, it does not belong to Congress, it exists nowhere. The premises may be true, and yet the conclusion is erroneous. It may be safely admitted that the power in question cannot be exercised by the people of the District, nor by the States; and yet it is clear that it is not only not given, but plainly prohibited, to Congress. Where, then, it may be asked, does it exist? Sir, it exists, like the power to abolish jury trials, to restrain the freedom of conscience, of speech, or of the press, with those who have a right to prescribe limits to all Governments; it remains in the people, the great reservoir from whence all power flows. I protest against the doctrine which would make Congress the residuary legatee of all undelegated powers. If the one in question, or any other not conferred, be deemed essential for the public good, it can only be obtained by an amendment of the constitution.

The gentleman from Massachusetts laid great stress upon that section of the constitution which gives Congress exclusive legislation over this District. He too seemed to consider the terms "exclusive legislation" as synonymous with absolute power. I have already shown that this pretension cannot be maintained; that the moment it is asserted the constitution itself repels it. If it be true, then the liberty of speech or of the press may be invaded, the trial by jury abolished.

[Mr. Hoar said the gentleman from Virginia was mistaken in supposing him to contend that the terms exclusive legislation conferred absolute power.]

MAY 25, 1836.]

Abolition Report.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. ROBERTSON. I could not suppose the gentleman would assert a proposition so indefensible. It is one that cannot be maintained, without stripping the people of the District, nay, every citizen who may enter its bounds, of all constitutional protection.

But though the gentleman from Massachusetts admits this, he attempts to connect the clause giving exclusive legislative power over the District with what he supposes to have been the intention of the parties, so as to make good the power in Congress to abolish slavery within its limits. The rule of construction upon which he relies, that the intention of the parties ought to prevail, cannot be denied; but there is another rule which must not be overlooked—that where the language is plain and unambiguous, you are not at liberty to go out of the instrument in search of the intention. Here there is no ambiguity. The language, it is true, gives exclusive legislation; but that legislation cannot, as all admit, transcend the restrictions imposed by the constitution; and one of those restrictions secures private property from seizure, or confiscation, unless when required for the use of the Government.

But if we may desert the instrument itself, to seek elsewhere for the intention of the parties, I insist that it is demonstrable they never could have intended what the gentleman from Massachusetts supposes. Observe, sir, the clause to be interpreted is that giving exclusive legislation to Congress over the District of Columbia. But the same clause, in the same terms, gives exclusive legislation over all places purchased for forts, arsenals, magazines, and other public buildings. Now, sir, let us read it as interpreted by the gentleman from Massachusetts; Congress shall have power to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia, and in all places purchased for forts, arsenals, magazines, and other public buildings. This is the reading his interpretation requires. If it be the true reading, then is the proposition boldly asserted, that Congress has the power to abolish slavery, not in this District merely, but in the States. Not the District only, but every place purchased for the use of the United States, may be converted into a sanctuary for fugitive slaves, who may be declared entitled to freedom the moment they enter it. Every fort may thus become a stronghold of abolitionism, every magazine a magazine of mischief, from whence the enemies of our peace may hurl their firebrands and bombshells among us.

These are the consequences of the position that Congress has power, under the clause in question, to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. The same reasoning that would establish such a power over the District equally maintains it within the limits of the States; yes, in the very heart of every State in the Union. I, sir, claim the benefit of the rule laid down by the gentleman from Massachusetts. I ask him, I appeal to every reasonable and candid man, whether such an interpretation is not wholly irreconcilable with the intentions of those who framed the constitution? Whether they do not know that, had such a provision been inserted in that instrument at the time, or such an interpretation anticipated, there is not a single Southern State that would have ever entered into the Union?

Once concede to Congress the constitutional power to abolish slavery, here or elsewhere, and all that remains for the abolitionists to do is to show that it is expedient to exercise it. They are to prove this to those who assert the power, and who come from States which have already shown their belief of the expediency of exercising it within their own limits.

But, the committee say, it would be a breach of faith! Sir, the answer will be, there can be no breach of faith where no promise has been exacted, no pledges given. If the power was granted, it was granted like all others, that it might be exercised, whenever it should be thought expedient by those intrusted with it. Appeals to honor and good faith were not sufficient to prevent the strenuous efforts to enforce the unconstitutional Missouri restriction. No, sir; if we yield this power, the day is not far distant when it will be exerted. And what then will be our condition? If we resist it, instead of a rightful resistance of usurpation, we shall be regarded, upon our own concession, as in rebellion to constitutional power; our resistance will therefore be denounced as unlawful. We shall be put under the ban of an ultra-federal proclamation, and subjected, by a democratic republican majority, to the tender mercies of a force bill. Sir, the South never can consent, never ought to consent, to occupy this position.

Mr. Speaker, the doctrine contended for by the Southern States is not, as seems to be supposed, asserted now for the first time. If it has not been often urged, it is because no serious apprehensions were entertained, until of late, of attempts to interfere with their rights. But gentlemen seem to have forgotten that it was maintained in this very hall on a former occasion. In the session of 1828-'9, memorials praying for abolition in the District were referred to a select committee, of which Mr. Alexander, of Virginia, was the chairman, and he made a report directly controverting the power of Congress, upon constitutional principles.

Upon what grounds, sir, give me leave to ask, can Congress show a valid title to such a power?

It is nowhere expressly granted.

It is not essential to the due execution of any granted power.

It cannot be assumed upon the pretext that slavery may otherwise be perpetual, or that abolition would conduce to the general welfare.

It is not conferred by the clause giving Congress exclusive legislation over the District of Columbia.

So far from being in conformity with the expressed or implied intention of the parties, it is absolutely incompatible with such intention.

It is interdicted by the provision that forbids the taking of private property, unless when the public themselves have occasion to use it.

Nor are these the only grounds, Mr. Speaker, that disprove the existence of the power in question. There is still another clause of the constitution which appears to me equally to forbid it: still another defence thrown around the rights of the people. The 4th article of the amendments of the constitution declares that

“The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.”

This clause, we are bound to suppose, meant something. The expression “unreasonable searches and seizures” is certainly a vague one: but it necessarily admits of construction. It is not more vague than the subsequent provision, that excessive bail shall not be required. It may be difficult to define what is excessive bail. Yet if a law should authorize bail to be demanded for a debt of ten dollars, in a penalty of $10,000, no judge or legislator would hesitate to say such bail was excessive, and its requisition unconstitutional. The constitution thus gives a practical security. Now, sir, I proceed to show that the power contended for cannot be exercised without a palpable violation of the article which prohibits unreasonable searches and seizures. In doing this, I shall invoke the aid of the select committee. All that is necessary is to concede that the propositions are true which they have maintained—and maintained, I trust, to the satisfaction of all—that the abolition of slavery in the District would be a breach of faith, unwise, impolitic, and dangerous to the Union. The abolition of slavery, without the consent of the owner, necessarily implies his dispossession—a forcible seizure of his property. Can a seizure, then, I would ask, be deemed a reasonable seizure, which violates good faith, is unwise—unwise, sir—impolitic, and dangerous to the Union?

To hold one to bail in a penalty fifty or one hundred fold the amount of the debt would be to demand excessive bail, and therefore unconstitutional; to seize a large amount of property to satisfy a trifling debt would, it must be admitted, be unreasonable; and therefore unconstitutional. But to seize his whole estate, without any charge of crime or debt, under circumstances of such outrageous injustice and folly as to threaten the very dissolution of the Government itself, is no violation of the provision which prohibits unreasonable seizures. It is reasonable, then, to violate good faith, common sense, and common justice, and to subvert the Union!

It may be said, the clause in question applies only to seizures by color of legal process. Be it so; but dispossession under a law abolishing slavery would be a seizure under legal process—under authority or color of law. If it be not, then, though this clause of the constitution would not apply, there is another that would; that already cited, declaring that property shall not be taken without due process of law. If the seizure be, therefore, by due process of law, it is unreasonable, because unwise and unjust, and therefore unconstitutional; and if without such process, it is equally unconstitutional, since all seizures are prohibited without due process of law. Unless this construction of the clause in question be adopted, it affords no security for the rights it professes to protect. Congress is supreme, despotic: and the property of the citizen may be confiscated, and his body imprisoned, at its will and pleasure.

This view must have presented itself to the committee: it lay directly in their path; but they shunned it as though it had been an adder. The elementary principles were before them which demonstrated the unconstitutionality of the proposed interference of the abolitionists; but they evaded the conclusion. The route prescribed to them led directly to the door of truth: they refused to enter. They were sent forth to battle for the rights of the people, armed with the ægis of the constitution: they gave it up for the frail paper shield of morality. They threw away the sword, and fought with the scabbard.

It is much to be regretted, Mr. Speaker, that the select committee should have been influenced, by any considerations, to place the great question confided to their examination exclusively upon the grounds they have taken, instead of that contended for by the South. In exploring the coast, to find some safe landing place for our rights, they might have rested them upon the firm ground of the constitution: it was full in their view: they circumnavigated it without even attempting to land. But in their homeward voyage they touched, it seems, at Albany—a place famous, it is said, for coining new-fangled doctrines—and have brought us a cargo of Albany notions: among them this notion of relying on speculative opinions of morality, not in aid merely, but in place of the plain provisions of a written law or compact. To show you, sir, that this notion had its birth in Albany—for one, I could have rejoiced, had it been suffered to die, and be buried, on the spot where it was born—I refer you, sir, to a celebrated letter of one of the candidates for the presidency. I allude to the letter of Mr. Van Buren to certain gentlemen in North Carolina—a letter, I will take occasion to say, characterized throughout by artful and disingenuous evasions.

[Mr. ADAMS inquired if the gentleman from Virginia had the letter: he wished it read.]

Mr. ROBERTSON replied, that he had not intended to fatigue the House with reading the letter; it was a very long one. His chief object in adverting to it was to show the coincidence between the doctrines of Mr. Van Buren and the Albany meeting, and those maintained in the report of the select committee; but he had no objection to the reading, if any gentleman desired it.

[Mr. ADAMS said he was exceedingly anxious to have that part read, considered by the gentleman from Virginia as evasive.]

Mr. ROBERTSON requested the Clerk to read the following passage:

“These views, thus expressed and sanctioned by myself, appear to me to cover the whole ground, save the abstract question, to which you have been pleased to call my attention, and I cheerfully embrace the opportunity you have felt it your duty to afford me, to explain myself fully on that also. As anxious as you can possibly be to arrest all agitation upon this disturbing subject, I have considered the question you have propounded to me, with a sincere desire to arrive at the conclusion that the subject, in respect to the District of Columbia, can be safely placed on the same ground on which it stands in regard to the States, viz: the want of constitutional power in Congress to interfere in the matter. I owe it, however, to candor, to say to you, that I have not been able to satisfy myself that the grant to Congress, in the constitution, of the power of exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever over the federal District, does not confer on that body the same authority over the subject that would otherwise have been possessed by the States of Maryland and Virginia; or that Congress might not, in virtue thereof, take such steps upon the subject, in this District, as those States might themselves take within their own limits, and consistently with their rights of sovereignty.

“Thus viewing the matter, I would not, from the lights now before me, feel myself safe in pronouncing that Congress does not possess the power of interfering with or abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia. But, whilst such are my present impressions upon the abstract question of the legal power of Congress—impressions which I shall at all times be not only ready, but disposed, to surrender upon conviction of error—I do not hesitate to give to you as my deliberate and well-considered opinion, that there are objections to the exercise of this power, against the wishes of the slaveholding States, as imperative in their nature and obligations, in regulating the conduct of public men, as the most palpable want of constitutional power would be.”

Sir, this letter was obviously framed to suit all parties—all things to all men. To the North, it seems to concede the power; to the South, it protests against exercising it; and then, as if apprehensive of going too far, seeks to conciliate the good will of the Quakers. The question was a plain one: one that might have been answered in three lines; in two words, yes or no. Do you, or do you not, believe in the constitutional power of Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia? How is it met? I repeat, sir, by a tissue of evasions. The question was put to him here, in Washington; down he dives, out of sight, and rises at Albany. He begins with expressing his great desire that his views should be thoroughly understood, and his intention to disclose them in the fullest manner: but, in the first place, as the sentiments he has avowed for the last two years may not be known, he must communicate them, before answering the specific inquiry. Then follows an account of the Albany meeting, and the sentiments there expressed, in which he declares his full concurrence. Leaving Albany, on he moves, dodging and shuffling, until at length he approaches the point to which he was bound. But does he approach it by a direct, manly, unequivocal course? Does he, sir, after all, express any decided opinion one way or the other? Mark his language. He owes it to candor to say that he has not been able to satisfy himself that the grant of the power of exclusive legislation does not confer the power of abolishing slavery in the District. But is he satisfied that it does? Thus viewing the subject, he would not feel himself safe—I believe it, sir, he did not feel himself safe; he was looking, I fear, sir, more to his own safety than to that of the South—he would not feel himself safe in pronouncing that Congress does not possess the power. But does he feel himself safe in pronouncing that Congress does possess the power? No, sir, he speaks of his impressions; his present impressions upon the abstract question; impressions which he is ready and disposed to surrender, upon conviction of error. I should hope these slight impressions, which he is so willing to renounce, have yielded to a more deliberate examination. They do not deserve the name of opinions. Suppose, sir, by way of illustration, the question were propounded to me, whether certain gentlemen in this House, in my opinion, were or were not abolitionists? and I should reply, I owe it to candor to say that I have not been able to satisfy myself that the gentlemen in question are not abolitionists, would the gentleman from Massachusetts understand me to affirm that they are? And if I should add, I do not, from the lights now before me, feel myself safe in pronouncing that they are not abolitionists—would he undertake to say that I expressed a decided opinion the one way or the other?

But it was with no view, Mr. Speaker, of commenting at large upon the equivocating language of this letter, that I thought proper to advert to it. It was principally with the view of pointing the attention of the House to the doctrine it inculcates, that moral obligations are equally imperative in regulating the conduct of public men, as the prohibitions of the constitution itself; and more especially to point out the coincidence between this Albany doctrine and that of the report of the select committee. In carrying out this doctrine, as I have already shown, the committee have even gone further than its original authors, by asserting the superior efficacy of moral over legal restrictions. Sir, I regret to see the attempt in that report to maintain a doctrine like this; an attempt to reconcile us to a surrender of power, on the faith that it will not be exercised to our injury: to substitute the notions of justice, wisdom, or policy, entertained by moralists and politicians, as a sufficient restraint upon men in power, in lieu of the fixed and permanent landmarks of a written law.

Nor is this the only novel doctrine we have heard upon this occasion. Not only is this moral obligation a better security, but it is even dangerous, it seems now, to rely at all on our constitutional rights. Sir, it is more dangerous to surrender them. If the temple of our liberty is indeed in so tottering a condition that we dare not enter it, it is time to repair it, or look out for better shelter. But where is the danger? Are we to be told, and that by democratic republicans, that it is dangerous the people should know what they know, and what greatly concerns their safety? Are the people, like children passing a church-yard, to shut their eyes for fear of seeing ghosts? The abolitionists, it seems, will be encouraged, if they discover that a majority of this House is with them on the question of power: yet gentlemen tell them it is morally certain that the fact is so, and object to bring the question to a vote, on the ground of our inevitable defeat. Sir, the abolitionists are awake; they know all that we know, and probably much more: and I am unwilling that the people should not be as well informed as their enemies, of the extent of the danger. We should not consent that they shall be hoodwinked, and bound hand and foot, while we unmuzzle the dogs that worry them.

There is one other constitutional objection, Mr. Speaker, to the power claimed for Congress of abolishing slavery in the District of Columbia, which it would not be proper to omit—that to be deduced from a just view of the power of appropriation. It is important to recur, occasionally, to fundamental principles; to the doctrines and opinions entertained, at an earlier period of our history, by the sages who were called on to frame, or expound, the institutions under which we live. On a question like this, the opinions of none are entitled to greater weight than those of the venerable Madison. According to the creed of the old federal party, the power of appropriation had no other limit than the general welfare; or, in other words, the discretion of Congress. But this was not the doctrine of the republicans of 1798. They insisted that public money could not be constitutionally expended, to effect any objects, except such as were expressly enumerated in the constitution. This was the principle maintained in Mr. Madison's celebrated report of 1799, on the alien and sedition laws. That report has been regarded as the text-book of State-right politicians; the standard of republican orthodoxy. I request that the Clerk may read a passage from the argument upon this question, in which the import of the terms general welfare is commented upon.

The Clerk read the following passage:

"The true and fair construction of this expression, both in the original and existing federal compacts, appear to the committee too obvious to be mistaken. In both, is subjoined to this authority an enumeration of the cases to which their powers shall extend. Money cannot be applied to the general welfare, otherwise than by an application of it to some particular measure conducive to the public welfare. Whenever, therefore, money has been raised by the general authority, and is to be applied to a particular measure, a question arises, whether the particular measure be within the enumerated authorities vested in Congress. If it be, the money requisite for it may be applied to it; if it be not, no such application can be made. This fair and obvious interpretation coincides with, and is enforced by, the clause in the constitution which declares that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations by law." An appropriation of money to the general welfare would be deemed rather a mockery than an observance of this constitutional objection.

"Whether the exposition of the phrase here combated would not by degrees consolidate the States into one sovereignty, is a question concerning which the committee can perceive little room for difference of opinion. To consolidate the States into one sovereignty, nothing more can be wanted than to supersede their respective sovereignties in the cases reserved to them, by extending the sovereignty of the United States to all cases of the general welfare; that is to say, to all cases whatsoever."

Yes, sir, such a power would indeed lead to consolidation. Give the power to Congress of unlimited appropriation; give them with it, what they now have, a Treasury overflowing with millions beyond what the public necessities require, and an unprincipled party will not scruple to use the public treasure to perpetuate, by every scheme that can be devised, its own power and influence. The people, the source of all power, will be corrupted by their own money; and what should be the life-blood of our system will be converted into its poison.

But I proceed to apply the principles maintained by Mr. Madison, in this unanswered and unanswerable report.

The enactment of a law abolishing slavery necessarily supposes an appropriation of money to pay for the emancipated slaves. No one on this floor has ever yet asserted the principle, that such abolition can be effected, against the consent of the owner, without adequate compensation. Such an act would be simply an act of sheer robbery. But the abolition of slavery, or the purchase of slaves with a view to emancipation, are not, as all will agree, among the objects expressly enumerated in the constitution. Neither are they, in any way, essential to the attainment of any specified object, nor to the due execution of any specific power. If the power to appropriate money draws to it the power to create or select the objects of appropriation, and may be extended to embrace the abolition of slavery, it must be on the pretext assumed by the federal party, because such a measure is conducive to the general welfare. Where, sir, will this doctrine lead us? If we may apply the public treasure, upon this ground, to pay for this property when taken from the owner against his consent, surely we may compensate him for it when freely surrendered by sale or contract. If, by virtue of the power to appropriate, we may confiscate or purchase slaves in the District, so may we, under the same authority, purchase or confiscate them in the States. Or say that we are confined to the District; that we may open a market here, and here only, for the purchase of slaves, with a view to emancipation; then the District may become a great mart for slaves, and the Treasury exhausted in purchasing them, brought in, as they would be, from all the slaveholding States. Whether the power of appropriation imply or confer the power of abolition, or not, there is no doubt that abolition or emancipation necessarily supposes and authorizes appropriation. If slaves be purchased, or taken against the owner's consent, they must be paid for. Now, I inquire of the State-right politicians, the democratic republican majority of this House, if they are prepared to assert this doctrine? Have we not heard from them heavy denunciations of one of the candidates for the presidency, for having, as it is said, expressed the opinion that public money may be lawfully applied for the liberation of slaves, in aid of the Colonization Society? And will they now, by affirming the constitutionality of abolishing slavery, and the consequent appropriation of money to that object, assert the very doctrine they have condemned?

H. OF R.]

If we can lawfully emancipate slaves, here or elsewhere, we must have the power of determining what shall be done with them; of providing the means, if necessary, of removing them; and, in that case, there can be surely no impropriety in putting them under the care of the Colonization Society. I warn the party that they cannot maintain the power it is supposed they are prepared to assert, without splitting upon the doctrine they profess so much to abhor. But if they will assert it, I trust we shall at least hear from them no more denunciation against others for defending the same principle.

Let us trace a little farther the consequences of this power.

If you may confiscate or purchase slaves, you may hold them. Has the House considered the consequences of authorizing the General Government to become a slaveholder? How will you dispose of them? Where will you place them? If you can confer the right to freedom, you may prescribe the conditions on which it shall be enjoyed; and, if these be not complied with, reconvert them, as is done in some of the States, to slavery. You may make it a condition that, unless they depart from the District within a limited time, they shall forfeit their freedom. But suppose the States will not consent that such a crew of ignorant and unprincipled paupers and vagabonds shall be turned loose upon them: have you the power to compel their admission? will you attempt to enforce that power? or will you confine them within the bounds of the District? or give them up to the Colonization Society? When you shall have emancipated them, what, sir, let me ask, is to be their condition? Are they to be regarded as citizens of the United States? I know of no means whereby the United States can acquire citizens but two: by birth or by naturalization; but emancipated slaves are neither citizens by birth nor by naturalization. Will you, then, admit them to an equality of rights with the free citizens of the different States? make them eligible to all offices, civil and military, foreign embassies, the presidency itself? or are they to be freedmen, and not freemen? citizens without the privileges of citizenship? But perhaps you will enlist them as soldiers! It must be confessed better materials could not be found for a standing army. They might serve an admirable purpose, too, to keep the South quiet; or the Capitol may be surrounded by a chosen band of black janizaries; and the day may come when no man shall dare to raise his voice in this hall, in defence of right against power. Are gentlemen prepared to assert a claim fraught with these monstrous, these momentous consequences. I trust not; for, sir, I repeat, the people of the South can never admit it. They cannot consent to hold their property, their lives, and their liberty, at the mere discretion of a majority of Congress. They never will be, they never ought to be, satisfied until a power so dangerous to their rights, so fatal to their peace, shall be solemnly disclaimed by this Government; or, if a doubt exist, the pretension forever put to rest by a constitutional provision, too plain to be perverted.

When Mr. ROBERTSON had concluded his speech,

Mr. OWENS expressed an opinion that the discussion ought not to be continued, and moved the previous question.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, called for the orders of the day.

Mr. GRENNELL asked if it was competent for the gentleman from Georgia to make any motion, without leave of the House, after the morning hour had expired; and if the orders would not come up, of course.

The CHAIR said the orders might be called for at any time after the hour had expired; but, until one o'clock, a majority could rule the action of the House in respect to the order of business, and any motion was in order, as in any other stage of the discussion.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative: Yeas 64, nays 86. So the House refused to proceed to the orders of the day.

Mr. ADAMS expressed his desire to say a few words on the subject of the report and resolutions. If the House wished to proceed to the orders of the day, he would be willing to postpone his remarks to tomorrow; but he hoped the previous question would not be pressed.

Mr. WISE asked if the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. OWENS] was in order. It was made after the expiration of the morning hour, and before the House refused to proceed to the orders of the day; and before the gentleman from Georgia had a chance to renew it, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] had obtained the floor.

The CHAIR decided that the motion was in order.

Mr. ADAMS requested the gentleman from Georgia to withdraw the motion, and not call for the previous question without giving any one an opportunity to discuss the question.

Mr. OWENS said he had made the motion after much deliberation, and would not withdraw it.

Mr. ADAMS was about to make some remarks, but was interrupted by

The CHAIR, stating that the question was not debatable.

Mr. ADAMS appealed from the decision of the Chair that the motion was in order, on the ground that the gentleman from Georgia, at the time he made the motion, was not competent to make it.

The CHAIR called upon Mr. ADAMS to reduce his appeal to writing.

Mr. ADAMS, after a moment, said he perceived that a majority of the House was determined to stifle discussion, and he would withdraw his appeal, and consent that the vote should be taken.

Mr. PATTON rose to appeal to the gentleman from Georgia to withdraw his motion.

Mr. OWENS repeated that he would not withdraw it.

Mr. PATTON hoped he would not denounce every man who should not vote for his motion.

The question was then taken, and the motion for the previous question was seconded by the House: Yeas 95, nays 82.

Mr. WISE then demanded the yeas and nays on the previous question, and they were ordered.

The CHAIR, in reply to an inquiry, said the previous question would be on concurring in the resolutions, and not on the motion to recommit or print the report.

Mr. ADAMS appealed from that decision.

The CHAIR said it was what he would decide if the main question should be ordered.

Mr. ADAMS said, then I will appeal when the decision is made. I am aware that there is a slaveholder in the chair.

Messrs. WISE and EVERETT simultaneously moved a call of the House.

Mr. WISE asked for the yeas and nays on the call; which were ordered, and, being taken, stood: Yeas 97, nays 108.

Mr. STORER moved to lay the subject on the table, and that motion was negatived without a division.

Mr. ADAMS asked if there was then time to ascertain what the decision of the Chair will be upon what is the main question?

The CHAIR said he had stated, for the information of the House, what the decision would be; but the time to make a decision had not arrived.

Mr. ADAMS demanded that it should be decided what was the main question, that the House might know upon what they were voting, and that it might be entered on the journals.

The CHAIR said he had not decided what the main question was, and could not, because the House might negative the demand for the main question. The gentleman from Massachusetts could attain his object as well after the House had decided whether the main question should be then put.

Mr. ADAMS said he could not, and was proceeding to show the difference in the points of time, when

Mr. BOON called him to order.

Mr. ADAMS said he was speaking to order. He would ask the Chair to decide what the main question is, in order that the House might have an opportunity to decide, before they were obliged to vote for the putting of the main question, whether the decision of the Speaker was correct or not.

Mr. PATTON thought the decision ought to be made then, for the Chair might decide the main question to be one which the House would not desire to have put, and which they would not vote for; and it might influence their votes upon the main question.

The CHAIR then decided that the main question would be on the resolutions, and would cut off all other questions or motions to amend or commit.

Mr. HUNTSMAN said he would object to having the decision made out of order.

The CHAIR said that, upon the suggestion that the decision might affect the votes of the House upon the main question, he would entertain the appeal then.

Mr. PHILLIPS said that the committee had been charged with instructions to report two resolutions: one had been reported in the words directed by the House; the other was reported in part only, omitting the latter half. He wished to know to which of them the main question would apply.

The CHAIR said to both, but they were capable of division; and he announced the question then pending to be, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?"

Mr. ADAMS said he understood that question to be debatable.

The CHAIR said it had been decided that an appeal, while the previous question was pending, was not debatable, by an express vote of the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, moved the previous question on the appeal, and said he was sure that would stop debate.

Mr. WISE rose to a question of order. He said the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] appealed from the decision of the Chair, and was proceeding to argue the subject, when the Chair decided it was not debatable. He then wished to know to what the previous question would apply.

As the Chair was stating the question that would arise, Mr. WILLIAMS withdrew the motion.

Mr. ADAMS asked if he was gagged or not.

The CHAIR said he had decided, according to a previous decision of the House, that the motion was not debatable.

Mr. ADAMS was going on with some remarks, but was interrupted by loud calls to order. He stated that he wanted the decision of the Chair in writing, that it might be entered on the journal.

The CHAIR said he had no right to make such a demand.

Mr. ADAMS appealed from that decision.

The CHAIR decided the appeal to be out of order. He said one appeal was then pending, and another appeal could not be piled upon it.

The question was then taken, and the decision of the Chair was sustained by the House.

The question "Shall the main question be now put?" was then taken, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 109, nays 89, as follows:

So it was determined that the main question be now put; and the Speaker decided that the main question was upon agreeing to the above resolutions.

Mr. HIESTER called for a division of the question, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The first resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That Congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere in any way with the institution of slavery in any of the States of this confederacy."

Mr. ADAMS said, if the House would allow him five minutes' time, he pledged himself to prove that resolution false and utterly untrue.

Mr. A. was here called to order in different parts of the House, and resumed his seat.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the first resolution, as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Clark, Denny, Everett, W. Jackson, James, Phillips, Potts, Slade—9.

During the call, Mr. GLASCOCK said he had constitutional scruples, and asked to be excused from voting.

Mr. ADAMS said he hoped the gentleman would be excused, and would be called upon to assign his reasons.

The CHAIR said the subject was not debatable.

Mr. ADAMS asked for the yeas and nays upon the question of excusing the gentleman from Georgia.

The CHAIR said it was not in order to call for the yeas and nays during a call of the House; and directed the Clerk to proceed, that the question might be taken afterwards.

Messrs. PICKENS, WADDY THOMPSON, and ROBERTSON, when their names were called, severally asked to be excused; and the question was postponed.

Mr. WISE said he should positively refuse to vote upon these resolutions.

The roll having been called,

The CHAIR read the 28th rule: "Every member who shall be in the House when the question is put, shall give his vote, unless the House, for special reasons, shall excuse him;" and said the question would be on excusing the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. GLASCOCK.]

Mr. ADAMS asked that the reasons required to be given should be reduced to writing, and entered on the journal, according to rule.

The CHAIR requested Mr. GLASCOCK to reduce his reasons to writing.

Mr. GLASCOCK said his reasons had been given on a former occasion, and would be found in the protest he had signed, entered on the journal.

Mr. ADAMS said the rule required that "special reasons" should be given; the gentleman could not be excused but upon "special reasons;" and he asked to have those special reasons entered on the journal.

The CHAIR said the rule was silent as to whether the reasons should be entered on the journal or not.

Mr. ADAMS said the House and the country were in a situation unprecedented upon this subject. He called for the execution of the rule in such a way as to have the reasons of the gentleman appear upon the journal. He made the call by right as a member of the House—by his right as a representative of the people; and he would set aside all precedents in this case.

The CHAIR said it was not a debatable question under the operation of the previous question.

Mr. ADAMS asked if the Chair undertook to decide that no possible question could arise which would be debatable while the previous question was pending.

The CHAIR said he decided no supposable cases. It was soon enough to decide upon each case as it occurred.

Mr. ADAMS read the rule, and was remarking upon the propriety of having the special reasons written and entered, which the gentleman himself might give, as well as the reasons for which the House might excuse him; when

Mr. HAMER called to order. He wanted to know, first, if the question was debatable; and, second, if any member had a right to demand that the reasons should be recorded.

Mr. PHILLIPS called Mr. HAMER to order.

The CHAIR said that he did not know that this question had ever been pressed to a decision; and by the concurrence of the House he had been willing to hear the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] with a view to enlighten his own understanding. He then announced that the hour of one had arrived, and as these resolutions would come up at the next morning hour, he would announce the orders of the day; and, in the mean time, would take the opportunity to deliberate upon the very delicate questions involved.

RATIONS TO INHABITANTS OF ALABAMA.

The joint resolution from the Senate, authorizing the President of the United States to cause rations to be distributed to suffering fugitives from Indian hostilities in Alabama and Georgia, coming up, in the following words, viz:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be authorized to cause rations to be delivered from the public stores to the unfortunate sufferers who are unable to provide for themselves, and who have been driven from their homes by Indian depredations in Alabama and Georgia, until they can be re-established in their possessions, or so long as the President shall consider it necessary."

Mr. LEWIS urged the speedy action of the House upon this resolution, in consequence of the disastrous condition of the country.

Mr. HAWES moved that it be referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Agreed to.

On motion of Mr. LEWIS, and by general consent, the House then went into committee on the above resolution, (Mr. A. H. SHEPHERD in the chair.)

Mr. HAWES briefly opposed the resolution, on the ground that it was both impolitic and unconstitutional.

Mr. LEWIS addressed the committee in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky. He said the gentleman had very suddenly sprung a grave constitutional question upon a very small matter. The gentleman was mistaken if he supposed that it was proposed that all the settlers from the Creek country who had been thrown on the frontier of Alabama and Georgia, were to be fed at the public expense. On the contrary, sir, this boon was asked only for the poor, and the extreme poor, who had been driven from their homes by the savages, and in many instances were forced to abandon, not only their homes, but their provisions, stock, and, in some instances, even their negroes. It was said that, in the little town of Columbus, there were now twelve hundred persons from the Creek country who were living upon the liberality and hospitality of the people of that town. Children were there whose parents had been murdered at night by the Indians; widows whose husbands had fallen under the tomahawk; some driven from their midnight slumbers, and forced, even in a state of nudity, to fly to the adjoining frontier for protection.

Sir, the Government surely owed protection to these people: they are now endeavoring to afford them that protection; and is not subsisting these people a part of that protection for which we are sending armies and voting appropriations for their defence? Sir, I ask nothing except for the poor and the unfortunate. Our wealthy citizens will never call on the commissary for their provisions; and even the poor, I trust, will not need it long. All that I ask is, to grant us that protection against the consequences of Indian hostilities, which we have a right to claim from this Government. I see no difference, sir, between this case and the one under which this House has already voted rations to the sufferers in Florida.

Sir, I respect the constitutional scruples of every gentleman on this floor. I ask no gratuity, no charity, but simply demand justice of this Government. I require of this Government merely to repair the losses which have resulted for want of that protection which the people have not received, and which, if they had received, would have enabled them to have subsisted themselves at home, without calling on this Government. In making this remark, I do not intend to censure the Government, but merely to state the circumstances under which this application is made. It is a requisition of sheer justice, growing out of the obligation of this Government to protect the persons to whom they have sold land in the Creek country against the hostility of these Indians, until they are removed west of the Mississippi.

Mr. TOWNS moved an amendment to extend the provisions of the resolution to citizens of Georgia, under the same circumstances as the citizens of Alabama, provided for in the resolution.

Mr. T. then addressed the committee as follows:

Mr. Chairman: In support of the amendment I have had the honor to offer, no particular argument is necessary, as it does not vary the principle of the resolution. I must confess that I heard with regret the remarks of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HAWES,] in opposition to the resolution. I should always be pleased to have the co-operation of that gentleman on any question, and on none more than the present. The gentleman has placed his opposition on the ground that there is no power in the House to adopt the resolution. I do not intend to meet this objection by any thing like argument on the constitutional question; it is not necessary. It has fallen to the lot of the gentleman, oftener than once during the present session, to make the same objection to other resolutions involving the same principle; and, as often as made, have uniformly been voted down by the House. Sir, I have information in my possession of a character that would excite the deepest sympathy. Yes, sir, every mail from Georgia tells me the story of death; butcheries the most revolting are perpetrated every day in the borders of Alabama, and on the frontiers of Georgia. The merciless savage has overrun almost the entire country from Columbus to Montgomery. One scene of wide-spread desolation alone is to be seen in that quarter, where but a short time since there was peace, quiet, and prosperity. And such, sir, has been the unparalleled devastation of property and life, that there is scarcely a human being to be seen in all that country, unless it be the merciless foe, or some unfortunate settler flying from the tomahawk and scalping-knife. So sudden has been this war, when the Indian was ready to deal out death in all its horrors, few, if any, were prepared to give the slightest resistance; unprotected with arms or ammunition, the honest settler of the country felt it to be his first duty to yield to the entreaties of wife and children, to fly for safety; and the melancholy story but too often reaches us, when thus flying, that many of them have fallen victims to the most cruel of all deaths, the scalping-knife and tomahawk. This population, under such a panic, could not be expected, even if they had had the means, of removing their property. Delay was death, and to collect the women and children, and bid them fly, was the first and the only thing either thought of or desired. Perhaps, sir, at no former time was ever a panic more general, or danger greater. Can it, then, sir, could it be expected, that a whole population, driven before a savage foe beyond the limits of their own State, could have provided themselves with the ordinary comforts of life? Can it be expected, when deprived of house, home, and property, that they can supply themselves with the necessary means of subsistence? Can it be supposed that the citizens of Georgia, however charitable and benevolent, (and I am proud to say they are entitled to that character,) can support a population of such vast numbers that must have been suddenly thrown upon them in the severest season of the year? Sir, I know too well the feeling of this House to doubt for one moment the fate of the resolution. Let it pass speedily; and let that aid, so indispensable to the very existence of the unfortunate people on the frontiers of Georgia, be afforded with the promptness and efficiency that a wise and humane policy would demand. Let us not consume the time of the committee by useless discussion, when, but for the aid of the relief intended by this resolution, hundreds of your valuable citizens may be reduced to the greatest distress.

The amendment was briefly discussed by Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, and Mr. PARKER.

Mr. PARKER moved to amend the resolution by inserting a specific sum of $20,000.

This amendment was briefly discussed by Messrs. WHITE of Florida, WHITTLESEY of Ohio, HUNTS-MAN, LEWIS, GRANTLAND, HOLEY, and HOWARD, when Mr. PARKER withdrew it.

Rations to Inhabitants of Alabama.

The question then recurred upon the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. Towns,] which, after a few remarks from Mr. LANE, was agreed to.

Mr. HAWES again opposed the resolution. He condemned the policy of providing for our citizens in this way; for it was holding out an inducement to them not to take measures to protect themselves.

The resolution was advocated by Messrs. LEWIS, LANE, and GLASCOCK.

Mr. CUSHING said that the object of this resolution, as expressed in the terms of it, and as explained by the gentlemen who brought it forward, was to give bread to those distressed inhabitants of Alabama and Georgia, who might be driven from their homes by the hostile Creeks, and fly for temporary refuge to the military posts of the United States. In this understanding of its import, he was ready to vote for the measure.

Its constitutionality had been called in question. Mr. C. said if he entertained any doubts on that score, he certainly should not be in favor of the resolution. But, in his view, Congress clearly possessed the requisite power. The objections to the measure proceed upon the supposition that it is a charity. Not so. The constitution empowers Congress to provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States. He would not rely upon the last expression, "general welfare." Its very vagueness and extreme generality should inspire us with caution in the application of this clause to the legislation of Congress. What he relied upon was, the power and the obligation of "common defence;" that is, in an especial manner, the protection of the citizens under the immediate exigencies of war, which was the primary object and paramount duty of the Union.

Analyze the facts in the case. A war exists; our citizens are assailed by armed enemies, seeking their destruction. Manifestly, we may defend them against the weapon of the foe. May we not equally defend them against the endeavor of the foe to destroy them by starvation, when that endeavor is just as much a belligerent measure, an act of war, as it was to shoot them down in the field? Such a necessity is among the ordinary exigencies of war at all times. It would be strange, indeed, if when a war is raging in any part of the United States, and suffering families are expelled from their homes by the enemy, houseless, penniless, and without provision, and they take shelter under the guns and the flag of their country, they must be refused a pittance of the public rations for the time being, and left to starve, under the pretence that the constitution does not authorize Congress to afford them such relief. The power to defend the citizen under the actual exigencies of war, was the very last which he would consent to construe out of the constitution.

Of the propriety of the measure, supposing it to be constitutional, there was sufficient evidence in the facts before the House. The Creeks in Alabama and Georgia were emulating the example of the Seminoles in Florida. It was the bounden duty of Congress to extend to the inhabitants protection and relief, promptly, thoroughly, and suitably to the condition of the country and the character of the foe. Whether the policy of our Government, or the conduct of individuals, were right or wrong, in the acts which had led to the present state of things, we must, at all events, defend the lives of our countrymen; and this resolution is one of the forms of relief and protection which had been called for in the similar case of Florida. Some gentlemen had objected to the introduction into these debates of a reference to the tomahawk and scalping-knife of the Indian. Mr. C. said he did not feel the force of this objection. Can the horrors of border warfare, of a warfare between a civilized and a savage race, be too vividly pictured to the understanding of the House?

There was another argument urged against the resolution, which (Mr. C. said) did not engage his concurrence. It is alleged that, if the people of the disturbed districts may obtain succor at our military posts, they will be less likely to defend, resolutely, their own homes. Mr. C. said he could not assent to this doctrine. Are we to abandon our people to their fate, and drive them to desperation, by refusing a refuge to their wives and children, in order to compel them to fight it out as a sort of forlorn hope, sacrificed for the public advantage? They fly to a frontier fort; they ask for shelter and sustenance there, until they may organize for the contest themselves, and bestow their wives and children among their friends. We say to them—No: go back to your scattered dwellings; fight singly, each one for the defence of his own house, so long as a bushel of corn remains in it, regardless of all odds, and even with certain destruction to yourself, and those you hold most dear, before your eyes. Is this language for the United States to hold to our people, when the knife of the Indian is at their throats? While we proclaim to the inhabitants of Alabama and Georgia that we expect them to be true to themselves, to yield to no panic fears, and to maintain their own cause in arms, let us, at the same time, enable them to feel that they are forever under the broad ægis of the Government of the United States. Thus, and thus only, and not by forcing them to contend single-handed with the foe, shall we infuse into the whole country a spirit worthy of patriots and of brave men.

Mr. C. said that, for these considerations, and under the ample security to the Treasury afforded by the regulations of the War Department in the case of Florida, he should vote for the resolution.

The resolution was further advocated by Messrs. HOLSEY, WISE, MAURY, LAWLER, and UNDERWOOD; and opposed by Messrs. THOMPSON of South Carolina, and EVERETT.

Mr. ADAMS, after observing that there was no appropriation annexed to the resolution, which, if there had been, the resolution must, by the constitution of the United States, have been made to assume the form of a bill, proceeded to address the chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in substance as follows:

Mr. Chairman, there is no appropriation annexed to this resolution. We are called to vote upon it without knowing how deep it will dive into the public purse. We have no estimate from any executive department; no statement of the numbers of the distressed and unfortunate persons whom we are called upon to relieve, not with our own moneys, but with the moneys of our constituents. By an exception to the ordinary rules of the House, especially established to guard the public Treasury against the danger of rash and inconsiderate expenditures, we are to drive this resolution through all its stages in a single day. And it is, I believe, the first example of a system of gratuitous donations to our own countrymen, infinitely more formidable by its consequences as a precedent, than from any thing appearing upon its face. I shall, nevertheless, vote for it. But answerable to my constituents, as I am in this as in all other cases for voting away their money, I seek for a principle which may justify me, to their judgment and my own, in this lavish disposal of the public funds.

It is but one, sir, of a class of legislative enactments now upon the pages of our statute book, introduced first, I believe, during the present session of Congress; but with which we are already becoming familiar, and which I greatly fear will, ere long, grow voluminous. I shall take the liberty to denominate them the scalping-knife and tomahawk laws. They are all urged through by the terror of those instruments of death, under the most affecting and pathetic appeals from the constituents of the sufferers, to all the tender and benevolent sympathies of our nature. It is impossible for me to withhold from those appeals a responsive and yielding voice. I have voted for all those bills, devoting million after million from the public chest, for the relief and defence of these the suffering fellow-citizens of my constituents. I will vote for this resolution. I will vote again and again for drafts from the Treasury for the same purpose, should they become necessary, till the Treasury itself shall be drained; but, for so doing, I must seek for a principle which may be satisfactory, first, to my own mind, and, secondly, to my constituents.

And here, sir, the gentlemen who call upon us for these bountiful contributions from the public treasure are compelled to resort to that common defence and general welfare declared by the constitution of the United States to be among the purposes for which the constitution itself was ordained by the people. I admit their claim. There are, indeed, two grounds upon which some of them think their claim sustainable. One of them produces precedent for this exercise of power, and yet disclaims the authority of the precedent itself. You have already, by a resolution in the same words with those of the resolution now before this committee, extended this same relief to the inhabitants of Florida. But Florida is one of your Territories, and you are under obligations of protection more comprehensive to its inhabitants than those which bind you to the people of the States. These receive and are entitled to the protection of their State Government, and you are bound to extend that species of protection to the inhabitants of the Territories, besides the protection which the inhabitants of the several States are entitled to, as members of the great confederation. The precedent, therefore, of the resolution of relief to the inhabitants of Florida, does not cover the case. We are reminded, however, that some twenty years or more ago, the people of Caraccas were visited at once with a tremendous earthquake, with famine, and with the still more heavy misfortune of a civil war. The convulsions of nature by earthquakes, the ravages of famine, and the raging passions of man in the desolations of civil war, are as destructive to human life, and as calamitous to multitudes whom they do not absolutely destroy, as the tomahawk and the scalping-knife. But whatever may have been the motives or the justifying authority of Congress, more than twenty years ago, for appropriating any portion of the public moneys to the relief of the inhabitants of Caraccas, it could not establish the principle that Congress have the constitutional power to appropriate money for the relief of all human suffering, whether by earthquake, famine, civil war, or Indian ferocity. And the gentleman from Alabama himself, who so ardently urges the adoption of this resolution, tells you that he should have voted against that measure of relief to the wretched sufferers in Caraccas. Mere commiseration, though one of the most amiable impulses of our nature, gives us no power to drain the Treasury of the people for the relief of the suffering object. You must, therefore, seek another, an additional source of power, for authority to pass this resolution; and where will you, where can you, find it but in the war power, and its limitation, not its enlargement, in that very declaration of the transcendent purposes for which the people of the United States ordained their constitution—the common defence and general welfare? Step one hair's breadth out of the circle bounding the true intent and meaning of these words, and you have no more authority to pass this resolution, than you have, by an act of Congress, to saddle the people of the United States with the insupportable burden of the whole system of the poor laws of England.

Sir, in the authority given to Congress by the constitution of the United States to declare war, all the powers incidental to war are, by necessary implication, conferred upon the Government of the United States. Now, the powers incidental to war are derived, not from the internal municipal sources, but from the laws and usages of nations. In your relations with the Indian tribes, you never declare war, though you do make and break treaties with them, whenever either to make or to break treaties with them happens to suit the purposes of the President and a majority of both Houses of Congress. For, in this matter, you have set aside the judiciary department of the Government as effectually as if there were none such in the constitution.

There are, then, Mr. Chairman, in the authority of Congress and of the Executive, two classes of powers, altogether different in their nature, and often incompatible with each other—the war power and the peace power. The peace power is limited by regulations and restricted by provisions, prescribed within the constitution itself. The war power is limited only by the laws and usages of nations. The power is tremendous: it is strictly constitutional, but it breaks down every barrier so anxiously erected for the protection of liberty, of property, and of life. This, sir, is the power which authorizes you to pass the resolution now before you, and, in my opinion, there is no other.

And this, sir, is the reason which I was not permitted to give this morning for voting with only eight associates against the first resolution reported by the committee on the abolition petitions; not one word of discussion had been permitted on either of those resolutions. When called to vote upon the first of them, I asked only five minutes of the time of the House to prove that it was utterly unfounded. It was not the pleasure of the House to grant me those five minutes. Sir, I must say that, in all the proceedings of the House upon that report, from the previous question, moved and inflexibly persisted in by a member of the committee itself which reported the resolutions, [Mr. OWENS, of Georgia,] to the refusal of the Speaker, sustained by the majority of the House, to permit the other gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GLASCOCK] to record upon the journal his reasons for asking to be excused from voting on that same resolution, the freedom of debate has been stifled in this House to a degree far beyond any thing that ever happened since the existence of the constitution of the United States; nor is it a consolatory reflection to me how intensely we have been made to feel, in the process of that operation, that the Speaker of this House is a slaveholder. And, sir, as I was not then permitted to assign my reasons for voting against that resolution before I gave the vote, I rejoice that the reason for which I shall vote for the resolution now before the committee is identically the same with that for which I voted against that.

[Mr. ADAMS at this, and at many other passages of this speech, was interrupted by calls to order. The chairman of the committee, (Mr. A. H. SHERFF, of North Carolina,) in every instance, decided that he was not out of order, but at this passage intimated that he was approaching very close upon its borders; upon which Mr. ADAMS said, Then I am to understand, sir, that I am yet within the bounds of order, but that I may transcend them hereafter.

Mr. Chairman, I claim the privilege of speech accorded to every other member of this House. I will not advert to the latitude in which that privilege has been, throughout this session, enjoyed in Committee of the Whole by every member of the House who has chosen to exercise it. I will appeal only to what happened no longer ago than the sitting of yesterday and of this morning, when, at the hour of one, the Speaker adjourned the House, not in the usual form to ten o'clock to-morrow morning, but to ten o'clock of Wednesday morning, that is, of this day. Is it not within the recollection of every one who hears me, that two gentlemen, both distinguished members of the House, from the State of Maryland, from the hour of seven to that of ten, or little short of that time, last evening, entertained and instructed the Committee of the Whole House with a controversial disquisition upon the constitution of the State of Maryland, and upon the very important question whether the voice of the Legislature of that State was or was not an exponent of the popular will? Is it not remembered that this disquisition was held in the form of a dialogue so animated, that the retort courteous, the quip modest, the counter-check quarrelsome, and almost the lie circumstantial, passed between those gentlemen, without interruption from the chairman, and without call to order, till at last an honorable member from Tennessee proposed that the difference between the two members should be settled by arbitration? And what was the question before the committee, sir, upon which this spirited and eloquent conference was held? Was it upon an appropriation of seven hundred thousand dollars for arming the fortifications of the United States? Or upon an amendment to that proposal by a reduction of the salaries of all your principal executive officers, and of the compensation of members of Congress? Sir, it was upon one of these two propositions, so exceedingly relevant to each other, that the colloquy between the two gentlemen from Maryland, upon the constitution, Legislature, and people, of that highly respectable State, was held, for hours, without interruption or call to order. And now, sir, am I to be disconcerted and silenced, or admonished by the Chair that I am approaching to irrelevant matter, which may warrant him to arrest me in my argument, because I say that the reason for which I shall vote for the resolution now before the committee, levying a heavy contribution upon the property of my constituents, is identically the same with the reason for which I voted against the resolution reported by the slavery committee, that Congress has no authority to interfere, in any way, with slavery in any of the States of this Union? Sir, I was not allowed to give my reasons for that vote, and a majority of my constituents, perhaps proportionably as large as that of this House, in favor of that resolution, may and probably will disapprove my vote against it, unless my reasons for so voting should be explained to them. I asked but five minutes of the House to give those reasons, and was refused. I shall, therefore, take the liberty to give them now, as they are strictly applicable to the measure now before the committee, and are my only justification for voting in favor of this resolution.]

I return, then, to my first position, that there are two classes of powers vested by the constitution of the United States in their Congress and Executive Government: the powers to be exercised in time of peace, and the powers incidental to war. That the powers of peace are limited by provisions within the body of the constitution itself, but that the powers of war are limited and regulated only by the laws and usages of nations. There are, indeed, powers of peace conferred upon Congress, which also come within the scope and jurisdiction of the laws of nations, such as the negotiation of treaties of amity and commerce, the interchange of public ministers and consuls, and all the personal and social intercourse between the individual inhabitants of the United States and foreign nations, and the Indian tribes, which require the interposition of any law. But the powers of war are all regulated by the laws of nations, and are subject to no other limitation. It is by this power that I am justified in voting the money of my constituents for the immediate relief of their fellow-citizens suffering with extreme necessity even for subsistence, by the direct consequence of an Indian war. Upon the same principle, your consuls in foreign ports are authorized to provide for the subsistence of seamen in distress, and even for their passage to their own country.

And it was upon that same principle that I voted against the resolution reported by the slavery committee, "that Congress possess no constitutional authority to interfere, in any way, with the institution of slavery in any of the States of this confederacy," to which resolution most of those with whom I usually concur, and even my own colleagues in this House, gave their assent. I do not admit that there is even among the peace powers of Congress no such authority; but in war there are many ways by which Congress not only have the authority, but are bound to interfere with the institution of slavery in the States. The existing law prohibiting the importation of slaves into the United States from foreign countries, is itself an interference with the institution of slavery in the States. It was so considered by the founders of the constitution of the United States, in which it was stipulated that Congress should not interfere, in that way, with the institution, prior to the year 1808.

During the late war with Great Britain, the military and naval commanders of that nation issued proclamations inviting the slaves to repair to their standards, with promises of freedom and of settlement in some of the British colonial establishments. This, surely, was an interference with the institution of slavery in the States. By the treaty of peace, Great Britain stipulated to evacuate all the forts and places in the United States, without carrying away any slaves. If the Government of the United States had no authority to interfere, in any way, with the institution of slavery in the States, they would not have had the authority to require this stipulation. It is well known that this engagement was not fulfilled by the British naval and military commanders; that, on the contrary, they did carry away all the slaves whom they had induced to join them, and that the British Government inflexibly refused to restore any of them to their masters; that a claim of indemnity was consequently instituted in behalf of the owners of the slaves, and was successfully maintained. All that series of transactions was an interference by Congress with the institution of slavery in the States in one way—in the way of protection and support. It was by the institution of slavery alone that the restitution of slaves enticed by proclamations into the British service could be claimed as property. But for the institution of slavery, the British commanders could neither have allured them to their standard, nor restored them otherwise than as liberated prisoners of war. But for the institution of slavery, there could have been no stipulation that they should not be carried away as property, nor any claim of indemnity for the violation of that engagement.

But the war power of Congress over the institution of slavery in the States is yet far more extensive. Suppose the case of a servile war, complicated, as to some extent it is even now, with an Indian war; suppose Congress were called to raise armies, to supply money from the whole Union, to suppress a servile insurrection: would they have no authority to interfere with the institution of slavery? The issue of a servile war may be disastrous. By war the slave may emancipate himself; it may become necessary for the master to recognise his emancipation by a treaty of peace; can it for an instant be pretended that Congress, in such a contingency, would have no authority to interfere with the institution of slavery, in any way, in the States? Why, it would be equivalent to saying that Congress have no constitutional authority to make peace.

I suppose a more portentous case, certainly within the bounds of possibility—I would to God I could say not within the bounds of probability. You have been, if you are not now, at the very point of a war with Mexico—a war, I am sorry to say, so far as public rumor may be credited, stimulated by provocations on our part from the very commencement of this administration down to the recent authority given to General Gaines to invade the Mexican territory. It is said that one of the earliest acts of this administration was a proposal, made at a time when there was already much ill-humor in Mexico against the United States, that she should cede to the United States a very large portion of her territory—large enough to constitute nine States equal in extent to Kentucky. It must be confessed that a device better calculated to produce jealousy, suspicion, ill-will, and hatred, could not have been contrived. It is further affirmed that this overture, offensive in itself, was made precisely at the time when a swarm of colonists from these United States were covering the Mexican border with land-jobbing, and with slaves, introduced in defiance of the Mexican laws, by which slavery had been abolished throughout that republic. The war now raging in Texas is a Mexican civil war, and a war for the re-establishment of slavery where it was abolished. It is not a servile war, but a war between slavery and emancipation, and every possible effort has been made to drive us into the war, on the side of slavery.

It is, indeed, a circumstance eminently fortunate for us that this monster, Santa Anna, has been defeated and taken, though I cannot participate in that exquisite joy with which we have been told that every one having Anglo-Saxon blood in his veins must have been delighted on hearing that this ruffian has been shot, in cold blood, when a prisoner of war, by the Anglo-Saxon leader of the victorious Texian army. Sir, I hope there is no member of this House, of other than Anglo-Saxon origin, who will deem it uncourteous that I, being myself in part Anglo-Saxon, must, of course, hold that for the best blood that ever circulated in human veins. Oh! yes, sir! far be it from me to depreciate the glories of the Anglo-Saxon race; although there have been times when they bowed their necks and submitted to the law of conquest, beneath the ascendancy of the Norman race. But, sir, it has struck me as no inconsiderable evidence of the spirit which is spurring us into this war of aggression, of conquest, and of slave-making, that all the fires of ancient hereditary national hatred are to be kindled, to familiarize us with the ferocious spirit of rejoicing at the massacre of prisoners in cold blood. Sir, is there not yet hatred enough between the races which compose your Southern population and the population of Mexico, their next neighbor, but you must go back eight hundred or a thousand years, and to another hemisphere, for the fountains of bitterness between you and them? What is the temper of feeling between the component parts of your own Southern population, between your Anglo-Saxon, Norman French, and Moorish Spanish inhabitants of Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Missouri? between them all and the Indian savage, the original possessor of the land from which you are scourging him already back to the foot of the Rocky Mountains? What between them all and the native American negro, of African origin, whom they are holding in cruel bondage? Are these elements of harmony, concord, and patriotism, between the component parts of a nation starting upon a crusade of conquest? And what are the feelings of all this motley compound of your Southern population towards the compound equally heterogeneous of the Mexican population? Do not you, an Anglo-Saxon, slaveholding exterminator of Indians, from the bottom of your soul, hate the Mexican-Spaniard-Indian, emancipator of slaves and abolisher of slavery? And do you think that your hatred is not with equal cordiality returned? Go to the city of Mexico, ask any of your fellow-citizens who have been there for the last three or four years, whether they scarcely dare show their faces, as Anglo-Americans, in the streets. Be assured, sir, that, however heartily you detest the Mexican, his bosom burns with an equally deep-seated detestation of you.

And this is the nation with which, at the instigation of your Executive Government, you are now rushing into war—into a war of conquest; commenced by aggression on your part, and for the re-establishment of slavery, where it has been abolished, throughout the Mexican republic. For your war will be with Mexico—with a republic of twenty-four States, and a population of eight or nine millions of souls. It seems to be considered that this victory over twelve hundred men, with the capture of their commander, the President of the Mexican republic, has already achieved the conquest of the whole republic. That it may have achieved the independence of Texas, is not impossible. But Texas is to the Mexican republic not more nor so much as the State of Michigan is to yours. That State of Michigan, the people of which are in vain claiming of you the performance of that sacred promise you made them, of admitting her as a State into the Union; that State of Michigan, which has greater grievances and heavier wrongs to allege against you for a declaration of her independence, if she were disposed to declare it, than the people of Texas have for breaking off their union with the republic of Mexico. Texas is an extreme boundary portion of the republic of Mexico; a wilderness inhabited only by Indians till after the revolution which separated Mexico from Spain; not sufficiently populous at the organization of the Mexican confederacy to form a State by itself, and therefore united with Coahuila, where the greatest part of the indigenous part of the population reside. Sir, the history of all the emancipated Spanish American colonies has been, ever since their separation from Spain, a history of convulsionary wars; of revolutions, accomplished by single, and often very insignificant battles; of chieftains, whose title to power has been the murder of their immediate predecessors. They have all partaken of the character of the first conquest of Mexico by Cortez, and of Peru by Pizarro; and this, sir, makes me shudder at the thought of connecting our destinies indissolubly with theirs. It may be that a new revolution in Mexico will follow upon this captivity or death of their President and commanding general; we have rumors, indeed, that such a revolution had happened even before his defeat; but I cannot yet see my way clear to the conclusion that either the independence of Texas, or the capture and military execution of Santa Anna, will save you from war with Mexico. Santa Anna was but one of a breed of which Spanish America for the last twenty-five years has been a teeming mother, soldiers of fortune, who, by the sword or the musket ball, have risen to supreme power, and by the sword or the musket ball have fallen from it. That breed is not extinct; the very last intelligence from Peru tells of one who has fallen there as Yturbide, and Mina, and Guerrero, and Santa Anna, have fallen in Mexico. The same soil which produced them is yet fertile to produce others. They reproduce themselves, with nothing but a change of the name and of the man. Your war, sir, is to be a war of races—the Anglo-Saxon American pitted against the Moorish-Spanish-Mexican American; a war between the Northern and Southern halves of North America; from Passamaquoddy to Panama. Are you prepared for such a war?

And again I ask, what will be your cause in such a war? Aggression, conquest, and the re-establishment of slavery where it has been abolished. In that war, sir, the banners of freedom will be the banners of Mexico; and your banners, I blush to speak the word, will be the banners of slavery.

Sir, in considering these United States and the United

Mexican States as mere masses of power coming to collision against each other, I cannot doubt that Mexico will be the greatest sufferer by the shock. The conquest of all Mexico would seem to be no improbable result of the conflict, especially if the war should extend no farther than to the two mighty combatants. But will it be so confined? Mexico is clearly the weakest of the two Powers; but she is not the least prepared for action. She has the more recent experience of war. She has the greatest number of veteran warriors; and although her highest chief has just suffered a fatal and ignominious defeat, yet that has happened often before to leaders of armies too confident of success and contemptuous of their enemy. Even now, Mexico is better prepared for a war of invasion upon you, than you are for a war of invasion upon her. There may be found a successor to Santa Anna, inflamed with the desire, not only of avenging his disaster, but what he and his nation will consider your perfidious hostility. The national spirit may go with him. He may not only turn the tables upon the Texian conquerors, but drive them for refuge within your borders, and pursue them into the heart of your own territories. Are you in a condition to resist him? Is the success of your whole army, and all your veteran generals, and all your militia calls, and all your mutinous volunteers against a miserable band of five or six hundred invisible Seminole Indians, in your late campaign, an earnest of the energy and vigor with which you are ready to carry on that far otherwise formidable and complicated war?—complicated, did I say? And how complicated? Your Seminole war is already spreading to the Creeks, and, in their march to desolation, they sweep along with them your negro slaves, and put arms into their hands to make common cause with them against you; and how far will it spread, sir, should a Mexican invader, with the torch of liberty in his hand, and the standard of freedom floating over his head, proclaiming emancipation to the slave and revenge to the native Indian, as he goes, invade your soil? What will be the condition of your States of Louisiana, of Mississippi, of Alabama, of Arkansas, of Missouri, and of Georgia? Where will be your negroes? Where will be that combined and concentrated mass of Indian tribes, whom, by an inconceivable policy, you have expelled from their widely distant habitations, to embody them within a small compass on the very borders of Mexico, as if on purpose to give that country a nation of natural allies in their hostilities against you? Sir, you have a Mexican, an Indian, and a negro war upon your hands, and you are plunging yourself into it blindfold; you are talking about acknowledging the independence of the republic of Texas, and you are thirsting to annex Texas, ay, and Coahuila, and Tamaulipas, and Santa Fe, from the source to the mouth of the Rio Bravo, to your already over-distended dominions. Five hundred thousand square miles of the territory of Mexico would not even now quench your burning thirst for aggrandizement.

But will your foreign war for this be with Mexico alone? No, sir. As the weaker party, Mexico, when the contest shall have once begun, will look abroad, as well as among your negroes and your Indians, for assistance. Neither Great Britain nor France will suffer you to make such a conquest from Mexico; no, nor even to annex the independent State of Texas to your confederation, without their interposition. You will have an Anglo-Saxon intertwined with a Mexican war to wage. Great Britain may have no serious objection to the independence of Texas, and may be willing enough to take her under her protection, as a barrier both against Mexico and against you. But, as aggrandizement to you, she will not readily suffer it; and, above all, she will not suffer you to acquire it by conquest and the re-establishment of slavery. Urged on by the irresistible, overwhelming torrent of public opinion, Great Britain has recently, at a cost of one hundred millions of dollars, which her people have joyfully paid, abolished slavery throughout all her colonies in the West Indies. After setting such an example, she will not—it is impossible that she should—stand by and witness a war for the re-establishment of slavery where it had been for years abolished, and situated thus in the immediate neighborhood of her islands. She will tell you, that if you must have Texas as a member of your confederacy, it must be without the taint or the trammels of slavery; and if you will wage a war to handcuff and fetter your fellow-man, she will wage the war against you to break his chains. Sir, what a figure, in the eyes of mankind, would you make, in deadly conflict with Great Britain; she fighting the battles of emancipation, and you the battles of slavery; she the benefactress, and you the oppressor, of human kind! In such a war, the enthusiasm of emancipation, too, would unite vast numbers of her people in aid of the national rivalry, and all her natural jealousy against our aggrandizement. No war was ever so popular in England as that war would be against slavery, the slave trade, and the Anglo-Saxon descendant from her own loins.

As to the annexation of Texas to your confederation, for what do you want it? Are you not large and unwieldy enough already? Do not two millions of square miles cover surface enough for the insatiate rapacity of your land-jobbers? I hope there are none of them within the sound of my voice. Have you not Indians enough to expel from the land of their fathers' sepulchres, and to exterminate? What, in a prudential and military point of view, would be the addition of Texas to your domain? It would be weakness, and not power. Is your Southern and Southwestern frontier not sufficiently extensive? not sufficiently feeble? not sufficiently defenceless? Why are you adding regiment after regiment of dragoons to your standing army? Why are you struggling, by direction and by indirection, to raise per saltum that army from less than six to more than twenty thousand men? Your commanding general, now returning from his excursion to Florida, openly recommends the increase of your army to that number. Sir, the extension of your seacoast frontier from the Sabine to the Rio Bravo would add to your weakness tenfold; for it is now only weakness with reference to Mexico. It would then be weakness with reference to Great Britain, to France, even perhaps to Russia, to every naval European Power, which might make a quarrel with us for the sake of settling a colony; but, above all, to Great Britain. She, by her naval power, and by her American colonies, holds the keys of the Gulf of Mexico. What would be the condition of your frontier from the mouth of the Mississippi to that of the Rio del Norte, in the event of a war with Great Britain? Sir, the reasons of Mr. Monroe for accepting the Sabine as the boundary were three. First, he had no confidence in the strength of our claim as far as the Rio Bravo; secondly, he thought it would make our Union so heavy that it would break into fragments by its own weight; thirdly, he thought it would protrude a long line of sea coast, which, in our first war with Great Britain, she might take into her own possession, and which we should be able neither to defend nor to recover. At that time there was no question of slavery or of abolition involved in the controversy. The country belonged to Spain; it was a wilderness, and slavery was the established law of the land. There was then no project for carving out nine slave States, to hold eighteen seats in the other wing of this Capitol, in the triangle between the mouths and the sources of the Mississippi and Bravo rivers. But what was our claim? Why, it was that La Salle, having discovered the mouth of the Mississippi, and France having made a settlement at New Orleans, France had a right to one half the seacoast from the mouth of the Mississippi to the next Spanish settlement, which was Vera Cruz. The mouth of the Rio Bravo was about half way from the Balize to Vera Cruz; and so as grantees, from France, of Louisiana, we claimed to the Rio del Norte, though the Spanish settlement of Sante Fe was at the head of that river. France, from whom we had received Louisiana, utterly disclaimed ever having even raised such a pretension. Still we made the best of the claim that we could, and finally yielded it for the Floridas, and for the line of the 42d degree of latitude from the source of the Arkansas river to the South sea. Such was our claim; and you may judge how much confidence Mr. Monroe could have in its validity. The great object and desire of the country then was to obtain the Floridas. It was General Jackson's desire; and in that conference with me to which I have heretofore alluded, and which it is said he does not recollect, he said to me that so long as the Florida rivers were not in our possession, there could be no safety for our whole Southern country.

But, sir, suppose you should annex Texas to these United States; another year would not pass before you would have to engage in a war for the conquest of the island of Cuba. What is now the condition of that island? Still under the nominal protection of Spain. And what is the condition of Spain herself? Consuming her own vitals in a civil war for the succession to the crown. Do you expect that, whatever may be the issue of that war, she can retain even the nominal possession of Cuba? After having lost all her continental colonies in North and South America, Cuba will stand in need of more efficient protection; and above all, the protection of a naval Power. Suppose that naval Power should be Great Britain. There is Cuba at your very door; and if you spread yourself along a naked coast, from the Sabine to the Rio Bravo, what will be your relative position towards Great Britain, with not only Jamaica, but Cuba, and Porto Rico, in her hands, and abolition for the motto to her union cross of St. George and St. Andrew? Mr. Chairman, do you think I am treading upon fantastic grounds? Let me tell you a piece of history, not far remote. Sir, many years have not passed away since an internal revolution in Spain subjected that country and her King for a short time to the momentary government of the Cortes. That revolution was followed by another, by which, under the auspices of a French army with the Duke d'Angouleme at their head, Ferdinand VII was restored to a despotic throne; Cuba had followed the fortunes of the Cortes when they were crowned with victory; and when the counter revolution came, the inhabitants of the island, uncertain what was to be their destination, were for some time in great perplexity what to do for themselves. Two considerable parties arose in the island, one of which was for placing it under the protection of Great Britain, and another was for annexing it to the confederation of these United States. By one of these parties I have reason to believe that overtures were made to the Government of Great Britain. By the other I know that overtures were made to the Government of the United States. And I further know that secret though irresponsible assurances were communicated to the then President of the United States, as coming from the French Government, that they were secretly informed that the British Government had determined to take possession of Cuba. Whether similar overtures were made to France herself, I do not undertake to say; but that Mr. George Canning, then the British Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, was under no inconsiderable alarm, lest, under the pupillage of the Duke d'Angouleme, Ferdinand VII might commit to the commander of a French naval squadron the custody of the Moro Castle, is a circumstance also well known to me. It happened that just about that time a French squadron of considerable force was fitted out and received sailing orders for the West Indies, without formal communication of the fact to the British Government; and that, as soon as it was made known to him, he gave orders to the British ambassador at Paris to demand, in the most peremptory tone, what was the destination of that squadron, and a special and positive disclaimer that it was intended even to visit the Havana; and this was made the occasion of mutual explanations, by which Great Britain, France, and the United States, not by the formal solemnity of a treaty, but by the implied engagements of mutual assurances of intention, gave pledges of honor to each other, that neither of them should in the then condition of the island take it, or the Moro Castle, as its citadel, from the possession of Spain. This engagement was on all sides faithfully performed; but, without it, who doubts that from that day to this either of the three Powers might have taken the island and held it in undisputed possession?

At this time circumstances have changed—popular revolutions both in France and Great Britain have perhaps curbed the spirit of conquest in Great Britain, and France may have enough to do to govern her kingdom of Algiers. But Spain is again convulsed with a civil war for the succession to her crown; she has irretrievably lost all her colonies on both continents of America. It is impossible that she should hold much longer a shadow of dominion over the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico; nor can those islands, in their present condition, form independent nations, capable of protecting themselves. They must for ages remain at the mercy of Great Britain or of these United States, or of both; Great Britain is even now about to interfere in this war for the Spanish succession. If by the utter imbecility of the Mexican confederacy this revolt of Texas should lead immediately to its separation from that republic, and its annexation to the United States, I believe it impossible that Great should look on while this operation is performing with indifference. She will see that it must shake her own whole colonial power on this continent, in the Gulf of Mexico, and in the Caribbean seas, like an earthquake; she will see, too, that it endangers her own abolition of slavery in her own colonies. A war for the restoration of slavery where it has been abolished, if successful in Texas, must extend over all Mexico; and the example will threaten her with imminent danger of a war of colors in her own islands. She will take possession of Cuba and of Porto Rico, by cession from Spain or by the batteries from her wooden walls; and if you ask her by what authority she has done it, she will ask you, in return, by what authority you have extended your seacoast from the Sabine to the Rio Bravo. She will ask you a question more perplexing, namely—by what authority you, with freedom, independence, and democracy, upon your lips, are waging a war of extermination to forge new manacles and fetters, instead of those which are falling from the hands and feet of man. She will carry emancipation and abolition with her in every fold of her flag; while your stars, as they increase in numbers, will be overcast with the murky vapors of oppression, and the only portion of your banners visible to the eye will be the blood-stained stripes of the taskmaster.

Mr. Chairman, are you ready for all these wars? A Mexican war? a war with Great Britain, if not with France? a general Indian war? a servile war? and, as an inevitable consequence of them all, a civil war? For it must ultimately terminate in a war of colors as well as of races. And do you imagine that while with your eyes open you are wilfully kindling, and then closing your eyes and blindly rushing into them; do you imagine that while, in the very nature of things, your own Southern and Southwestern States must be the Flanders of these complicated wars, the battle-field upon which the last great conflict must be fought between slavery and emancipation; do you imagine that your Congress will have no constitutional authority to interfere with the institution of slavery in any way in the States of this confederacy? Sir, they must and will interfere with it—perhaps to sustain it by war; perhaps to abolish it by treaties of peace; and they will not only possess the constitutional power so to interfere, but they will be bound in duty to do it by the express provisions of the constitution itself. From the instant that your slaveholding States become the theatre of war, civil, servile, or foreign, from that instant the war powers of Congress extend to interference with the institution of slavery in every way by which it can be interfered with, from a claim of indemnity for slaves taken or destroyed, to the cession of the State burdened with slavery to a foreign Power.

Sir, it is by virtue of this same war power, as now brought into exercise by this Indian war in Florida, Alabama, and Georgia, that I vote for the resolution before the committee. By virtue of this, I have already voted in the course of this session to increase your standing army by a second regiment of dragoons, to authorize your President to accept the services of ten thousand volunteers, and to appropriate millions of the public money to suppress these Indian hostilities—all for the common defence, all for the general welfare. And if, on this occasion, I have been compelled to avail myself of the opportunity to assign my reasons for voting against the first resolution reported by the slavery committee, it is because it was the pleasure of the majority of the House this morning to refuse me the permission to assign my reasons for my vote, when the question was put upon those resolutions themselves.

Sir, it is a melancholy contemplation to me, and raises fearful forebodings in my mind when I consider the manner in which that report and those resolutions have been disposed of by the House. I have twice asked permission of this House to offer two resolutions calling for information from the President upon subjects of infinite importance to this question of slavery, to our relations with Mexico, and to the peace of the country. When I last made the attempt, a majority of the House voted by yeas and nays to suspend the rules to enable me to offer one of the two resolutions—but the majority not amounting to two thirds, my resolution has not yet obtained from the House the favor of being considered. Had it been the pleasure of the House to indulge the call, or to allow me the privilege of assigning my reasons for my vote on the resolution this morning, the remarks that I have now made might have been deemed more appropriate to those topics of discussion, than to the question more immediately now before the committee. They are reflections, however, which I deem it not less indispensable to make than they are painful to be made—extorted from me by a condition of public affairs unexampled in the history of this country. Heretofore, calls upon the executive department for information, such as that which I have proposed to make, were considered as among the rights of the members of this House, which it was scarcely deemed decent to resist. A previous question, smothering all discussion upon resolutions reported by a committee, affecting the vital principles of the constitution, moved by one of the members who reported the resolutions, and sustained by the members of that committee itself, is an occurrence which never before happened in the annals of this Government. The adoption of those resolutions of the House had not even been moved. Upon the mere question whether an extra number of the report of the committee should be printed, a member moves the recommitment of the report, with instructions to report a new resolution. On this motion the previous question is moved, and the Speaker declares that the main question is not on the motion to recommit, not on the motion to print an extra number of copies of the report, but upon the adoption of three resolutions, reported, but never even moved in the House. If this is to be the sample of our future legislation, it is time to awake from the delusion that freedom of speech is among the rights of the members of the minority of this House.

To return, Mr. Chairman, to the resolution before the committee. I shall vote for this application of moneys, levied by taxation upon my constituents, to feed the suffering and starving fugitives from Indian desperation and revenge. How deeply searching in the coffers of your Treasury this operation will ultimately be, no man can at this time foretell. The expenditure authorized by this resolution may be not in itself very considerable; but in its progress it has already stretched from Alabama to Georgia—how much further it may extend, will be seen hereafter. I turn my eyes away from the prospect of it now; but am prepared to meet the emergency, if it should come, with all the resources of the Treasury.

But, sir, I shall not vote for this relief to the suffering inhabitants of Alabama, and of Georgia, upon the ground on which the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. LEWIS,] and the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. THOMPSON,] have been disposed to place it. Little reason have the inhabitants of Georgia and of Alabama to complain that the Government of the United States has been remiss or neglectful in protecting them from Indian hostilities: the fact is directly the reverse. The people of Alabama and Georgia are now suffering the recoil of their own unlawful weapons. Georgia, sir, Georgia, by trampling upon the faith of our national treaties with the Indian tribes, and by subjecting them to her State laws, first set the example of that policy which is now in the process of consummation by this Indian war. In setting this example, she bade defiance to the authority of the Government of the nation; she nullified your laws; she set at naught your executive and judicial guardians of the common constitution of the land. To what extent she carried this policy the dungeons of her prisons and the records of the Supreme Judicial Court of the United States can tell. To those prisons she committed inoffensive, innocent, pious ministers of the gospel of truth, for carrying the light, the comforts, and the consolations of that gospel to the hearts and minds of these unhappy Indians. A solemn decision of the Supreme Court of the United States pronounced that act a violation of your treaties and of your laws. Georgia defied that decision; your executive Government never carried it into execution; the imprisoned missionaries of the gospel were compelled to purchase their ransom from perpetual captivity by sacrificing their rights as freemen to the meekness of their principles as Christians; and you have sanctioned all these outrages upon justice, law, and humanity, by succumbing to the power and the policy of Georgia; by accommodating your legislation to her arbitrary will; by tearing to tatters your old treaties with the Indians, and by constraining them, under peine forte et dure, to the mockery of signing other treaties with you, which, at the first moment when it shall suit your purpose, you will again tear to tatters and scatter to the four winds of heaven, till the Indian race shall be extinct upon this continent, and it shall become a problem beyond the solution of antiquaries and historical societies what the red man of the forest was.

This, sir, is the remote and primitive cause of the present Indian war; your own injustice, sanctioning and sustaining that of Georgia and Alabama. This system of policy was first introduced by the present administration of your National Government. It is directly the reverse of that system which had been pursued by all the preceding administrations of this Government under the present constitution. That system consisted in the most anxious and persevering efforts to civilize the Indians; to attach them to the soil upon which they lived; to enlighten their minds; to soften and humanize their hearts; to fix in permanency their habitations; and to turn them from the wandering and precarious pursuits of the hunter, to the tillage of the ground, to the cultivation of corn and cotton, to the comforts of the fire-side, to the delights of home. This was the system of Washington and of Jefferson, steadily pursued by all their successors, and to which all your treaties and all your laws of intercourse with the Indian tribes were accommodated. The whole system is now broken up; and instead of it you have adopted that of expelling by force or by compact all the Indian tribes from their own territories and dwellings to a region beyond the Mississippi, beyond the Missouri, beyond the Arkansas, bordering upon Mexico; and there you have deluded them with the hope that they will find a permanent abode—a final resting-place from your never-ending rapacity and persecution. There you have undertaken to lead the willing and to drive the reluctant, by fraud or by force, by treaty or by the sword and the rifle, all the remnants of the Seminoles, of the Creeks, of the Cherokees, of the Choctaws, and of how many other tribes I cannot now stop to enumerate. In the process of this violent and heartless operation you have met with all the resistance which men in so helpless a condition as that of the Indian tribes could make. Of the immediate causes of the war we are not yet fully informed; but I fear you will find them, like the remoter causes, all attributable to yourselves. It is in the last agonies of a people, forcibly torn and driven from the soil which they had inherited from their fathers, and which your own example, and exhortations, and instructions, and treaties, had riveted more closely to their hearts; it is in the last convulsive struggles of their despair that this war has originated; and if it brings with it some portion of the retributive justice of Heaven upon our own people, it is our melancholy duty to mitigate, as far as the public resources of the national Treasury will permit, the distresses of the innocent of our own kindred and blood, suffering under the necessary consequences of our own wrong. I shall vote for the resolution.

Abolition Report.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. HAYNES, of Georgia, said, however fashionable it might be in this House to discuss every thing but the subject under consideration, he would not follow the example of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS.] But, should a proper occasion occur, he pledged himself to meet and overthrow the allegations which that honorable gentleman had thought proper to prefer against the State of Georgia; and should it become proper for him to do so, he would take occasion to blend with that subject the inquiry, by what constitutional authority a President of the United States can arrest the operation of a supreme law of the land? As it respected the amendment before the committee, he did not think it was embarrassed by any constitutional difficulty whatever. The provision asked for the unfortunate fugitives from the Indian tomahawk and scalping-knife, who might be unable to provide for themselves and their families, stood, in his opinion, upon the obligation of protection due by this Government to its citizens, and not upon the exercise of the naked power of making war upon an Indian tribe in hostility against us. Anxious as he was to economize the time of the committee, he would content himself with the expression of the hope that the amendment would be adopted.

Mr. THOMPSON, of South Carolina, moved the following amendment, to come in at the end of the resolution. With this amendment, he said he could alone vote for the resolution: "the Government having failed to extend that protection to those sufferers which it was its bounden duty to have done."

The resolution was further discussed by Messrs. WISE and MILLER.

On motion of Mr. BOYD, the committee then rose and reported.

The SPEAKER having resumed the chair,

Mr. LANE then moved that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from the further consideration of the resolution; which was agreed to.

All amendments being cut off by the discharge of the Committee of the Whole from the resolution,

Mr. MILLER renewed the amendment moved by Mr. TOWNS in committee; which was agreed to.

Mr. WHITE, of Florida, moved to strike out the words "who are unable to provide for themselves."

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON demanded the previous question; which was seconded: Yeas 88, nays 34.

The main question was then ordered to be put, and the resolution was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. Having been engrossed, it was read a third time and passed.

The House then adjourned.

THURSDAY, MAY 26.

ABOLITION REPORT.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of Mr. PINGKNEY, from the select committee on the subject of abolition.

The CHAIR stated the present condition of the subject before the House. The select committee had made a report concluding with three resolutions. The previous question had been demanded, and was ordered to be put by a vote of the House. The main question was on concurring with the committee in their resolutions. Before the question was put, a division was called, and the vote taken by yeas and nays on agreeing to the first resolution. Pending the call of the yeas and nays on this vote, several members declined voting, and asked to be excused; other members declined to vote, but did not ask to be excused. After the list of members was called through, and before the result of the vote was announced, some other points were raised upon the question of excusing a member; and at this stage of the proceedings on yesterday, the House passed to the special order of the day.

He stated that in 1832 a case had occurred where a member declined voting, and asked to be excused, and the decision of the question before the House was announced without his vote, though the House had refused to excuse him, leaving the incidental question connected with his refusal to vote for the after consideration of the House. Were a different course to be pursued, it would lead to much embarrassment, as upon the question to excuse one member from voting, taken by yeas and nays, another might decline voting on that question, and ask to be excused; and this course might be pursued still further, so as to prevent any decision upon the original question before the House. And as the result in this case could not be affected by the votes of those who had declined voting, whether given to the one side or the other, the Chair was of opinion that the vote of yesterday should not be suspended, but the decision upon the resolution of the committee should be announced, leaving the incidental questions which had arisen to be subsequently settled; whenever it should suit the pleasure of the House to take them up for consideration.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, appealed from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. ADAMS said the case cited by the Chair was one in which he was personally concerned. On that occasion he had asked to be excused from voting, and had stated his reasons in writing, which were entered on the journal. This was precisely what he required of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. GLASCOCK.] He thought the case cited not in point.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, desired to say a word or two on the subject of his appeal.

The CHAIR said that, under the rule, this appeal could not be debated.

Mr. WHITTLESEY then asked for the yeas and nays on the appeal; which were ordered.

Mr. LEWIS did not vote yesterday. If he had been in his seat, he should not have voted. He made this statement, in order that he might take his part of the responsibility.

Before the vote was announced on the appeal, Mr. ROBERTSON said he had not voted, because he might, perhaps, be personally concerned in the result.

The decision of the Chair was then sustained: Yeas 137, nays 47, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Ash, Barton, Bean, Bockee, Boon, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Briggs, Brown, Buchanan, Burns, William B. Calhoun, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carr, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, N. H. Claiborne, John F. H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coffee, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cramer, Cushing, Cushman, Deberry, Denny, Dickerson, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Fairfield, Farlin, French, Fry, Philo C. Shepperd, Slade, Sprague, Standefer, Steele, Taliaferro, Underwood, Vinton, Whittlesey, L. Williams, S. Williams, Wise—47.

In answer to inquiries, as to what would become of the votes of those gentlemen who had asked to be excused, if they should hereafter be required to vote, the CHAIR said that the failure of gentlemen to vote could not arrest the decision of the House.

The first resolution was then declared to have been adopted: Yeas 132, nays 9.

The second resolution was read, as follows:

"Resolved, That Congress ought not to interfere in any way with slavery in the District of Columbia."

The House proceeded to vote by yeas and nays upon the adoption of this resolution.

When the name of Mr. ADAMS was called, he asked to be excused from voting.

The CHAIR said the gentleman's name would be passed for the present.

Mr. GRANGER, also, when his name was called, rose, and commenced reading from a manuscript to this effect:

"I decline voting on the second resolution reported by Mr. PINCKNEY, from the select committee"—Mr. G. was here called to order by various members.

Mr. G. continued. "I do not ask to be excused, because"—Mr. G. was again loudly called to order in every part of the House.

The CHAIR said it was not in order for the gentleman to make an argument pending the vote by yeas and nays.

Mr. GRANGER then yielded the floor.

Mr. WISE declined voting, for reasons which he sent to the Chair, but which were not read.

Before the vote was announced,

Mr. COFFEE asked the permission of House to record his vote. He had risen from a sick bed, contrary to the advice of his friends and physician, for the purpose of voting on these resolutions. He had been in an adjoining room, and the officers of the House had neglected to comply with his request to be notified when the vote was taken. It was under these peculiar circumstances that he had made the request.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, objected.

The second resolution was then declared to be adopted: Yeas 132, nays 45, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. C. Allan, Anthony, Ash, Barton, Bean, Beaumont, Bell, Bockee, Boon, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd Brown, Buchanan, Bunch, Burns, Cambreleng, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, N. H. Jones, Kilgore, Lane, Lawrence, Joshua Lee, Lincoln, Samson Mason, McCarty, McKennan, Morris, Parker, Phillips, Potts, Reed, Russell, Slade, Sprague, Vinton, Whittlesey—45.

The preamble and third resolution were then read, as follows:

"And whereas it is extremely important and desirable that the agitation of this subject should be finally arrested, for the purpose of restoring tranquillity to the public mind, your committee respectfully recommend the adoption of the following additional resolution, viz:

"Resolved, That all petitions, memorials, resolutions, propositions, or papers, relating in any way, or to any extent whatever, to the subject of slavery, or the abolition of slavery, shall, without being either printed or referred, be laid upon the table, and that no further action whatever shall be had thereon."

Abolition Report.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. PHILLIPS rose to make a point of order, and was proceeding to state the same, when

Mr. HAWES called him to order, on the ground that he was making an argument.

The CHAIR requested the gentleman from Massachusetts to reduce his point of order to writing.

The hour of eleven having arrived, the Chair announced the special order of the day.

Mt. PATTON moved to suspend the rule, for the purpose of disposing of the subject before the House; which was agreed to: Yeas 126, nays not counted.

Mr. PHILLIPS then sent to the Chair the following point of order:

"Can a committee, specially instructed to report two resolutions, the form of which was given by the House, report another resolution changing the rules and orders of the House in regard to the management of its business, and depriving citizens of the privilege of obtaining the usual consideration of petitions on subjects other than those referred to the committee?"

The CHAIR stated that it was not within the competency of the Speaker to draw within the vortex of order the question raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Questions relating to the jurisdiction of the committees of the House, or whether they had or had not exceeded that jurisdiction, or transcended the authority conferred upon them by the House, were for the House, and not the Speaker, to determine. If gentlemen were of opinion that committees in their reports had exceeded the authority given them by the House, there were other modes of correcting what they had done; as, for example, the report may be recommitted, with instructions; or the House on that, as well as other grounds, may refuse to concur in their report.

The point now raised could not therefore be considered as a point of order to be decided by the Chair. It was in some respects analogous to the case of inconsistent amendments proposed, in which case it was well settled, that "if an amendment be proposed, inconsistent with one already agreed to, it is a fit ground for its rejection by the House; but not within the competence of the Speaker to suppress, as if it were against order. For were he permitted to draw questions of consistency within the vortex of order, he might usurp a negative on important modifications, and suppress, instead of subserving, the legislative will."

So in this case, if the House shall be satisfied that the committee were not clothed with authority, by the order of the House under which they were appointed, to report this resolution, "it may be a fit ground for its rejection by the House, but not within the competence of the Speaker to suppress, as if it were against order."

Mr. PHILLIPS then moved to lay the preamble and third resolution on the table.

Mr. GRENELL asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and the motion to lay on the table was negatived: Yeas 69, nays 118.

The question recurring upon the adoption of the preamble and third resolution, the Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

When the name of Mr. ADAMS was called, that gentleman rose and said: I hold the resolution to be a direct violation of the constitution of the United States, the rules of this House, and the rights of my constituents. Mr. A. resumed his seat amid loud cries of "order," from all parts of the hall.

The third resolution was then agreed to: Yeas 117, nays 68, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. C. Allan, Ash, Ashley, Barton, Bean, Bockee, Boon, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Burns, Cambreleng, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, N. H. Claiborne, J. F. H. Claiborne, Cleveland, Coffee, Coles, Connor, Craig, Cramer, Cushman, Deberry, Dickerson, Double-

Sheperd, Shields, Sickles, Smith, Spangler, Speight, Standefer, Sutherland, Taliaferro, Taylor, Toucey, Towns, Turner, Turrill, Underwood, Vanderpoel, Wagener, White, Lewis Williams, Sherrod Williams--117.

NAYS--Messrs. H. Allen, Bailey, Beaumont, Bond, Borden, Briggs, Buchanan, W. B. Calhoun, Carr, G. Chambers, Childs, Clark, Corwin, Crane, Cushing, Denny, Everett, P. C. Fuller, J. Garland, Glascock, Granger, Grennell, Haley, H. Hall, Hard, Harper, Hazeltine, Henderson, Hiester, Hoar, Holsey, Howell, Hunt, Ingersoll, William Jackson, James, John W. * To the Editors of the Intelligencer:

GENTLEMEN: Having reason to believe that the negative vote recently given by me on the resolution declaring "that Congress possess no constitutional authority to interfere, in any way, with the institution of slavery in any of the States of this confederacy," may be understood as implying that I hold the opinion that Congress may abolish slavery in the States, I deem it proper to say that I entertain no such opinion. My vote was given on other grounds. The resolution declared, not merely that Congress has "no constitutional authority" to abolish slavery in the States, but that it has "no authority to interfere, in any way, with the institution of slavery" within their jurisdiction. I was not prepared to vote in favor of such a proposition, because I was not prepared to say that Congress might not abolish the slave trade between the States. This is an "interference with the institution of slavery in the States," which, I am inclined to think, is within the constitutional competency of Congress. The reasons for this opinion I should have given, if I had not been prevented by the extraordinary and oppressive application of the "previous question," which left me no alternative which I was willing to adopt, but that of giving a silent vote in the negative. The peculiar liability of that vote to misconstruction induces me to make this explanation.

I deem it proper to add, that I voted against the next resolution, which declares "that Congress ought not to interfere, in any way, with slavery in the District of Columbia," not only because it denies the right of Congress to abolish slavery here, but for the additional reason, that it also manifestly denies, and was, no doubt, intended to deny, the power of Congress to abolish the slave trade in this District—a trade carried on in sight of the Capitol, where this resolution was adopted, to as great an extent, probably, as in any other portion of the United States.

Respectfully, yours,

WILLIAM SLADE.

Post Office Department.

Mr. MANN, of New York, called for the special orders of the day.

The CHAIR stated that there were incidental questions which had arisen in the progress of the subject upon which the House had just been acting. Several gentlemen had declined voting, and it was for the House to make such disposition of these questions as it might deem proper. The Chair had also received two communications from members, assigning their reasons for not voting on a portion of the resolutions.

Mr. GLASCOCK desired to have the reasons which had induced him to move to be excused from voting entered upon the journal. He was proceeding to address the House, when he was called to order.

Numerous suggestions and points of order were made by several members, when

Mr. MANN, of New York, called for the special orders of the day.

The CHAIR entertained the motion, when

Mr. ROBERTSON appealed from this decision of the Chair.

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. ROBERTSON called for the yeas and nays; which were not ordered, and the appeal was laid on the table without a count.

The motion to proceed to the orders of the day was then agreed to.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

In execution of the special order adopted some days since, the House proceeded to the consideration of the "bill to change the organization of the Post Office Department, and to provide more effectually for the settlement of the accounts thereof."

The bill had been reported from the Committee of the Whole with sundry amendments, and the question was on concurring with the committee in their proposed amendments.

Various amendments were then read and concurred in.

The clause, as amended, defined the duties of the Auditor of the Post Office Department, and particularly that part of it requiring him to perform such duties as might be assigned him by the Postmaster General and the Secretary of the Treasury, or either of them. In the original bill he was made responsible to the former officer only; it was excepted to, and the amendment was opposed by Mr. MCKAY, and advocated by Messrs. HARPER and EVERETT, when it was concurred in.

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON moved to non-concur in the following amendment to the twenty-third clause: "And the contracts, in all cases, shall be awarded to the lowest bidder."

Mr. J. briefly explained what he considered would be the inevitable result if this provision should be retained.

Mr. EVERETT deemed this a very important amendment, after the knowledge they now had of the abuses in relation to this matter.

The amendment was further discussed by Messrs. BRIGGS, HARPER, and CAVE JOHNSON.

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved to amend the amendment by adding the following thereto: "except in cases wherein the lowest bidder shall hereafter fail to perform the contract entered into by him for the transportation of the mail, or shall fail to comply with the requisitions of this act."

After some discussion, in which Messrs. EVERETT, HAWES, HUNTSMAN, CONNOR, and BRIGGS, took part,

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, suggested to the mover of the amendment the following: "except in cases wherein the lowest bidder shall wilfully neglect to perform his contract, if a contractor at the passage of this act, or shall wilfully neglect hereafter to perform a contract entered into with the Department."

Mr. MANN accepted this as a substitute for his own amendment; and, after some discussion by Messrs. PEARCE of Rhode Island, WHITTLESEY of Ohio, McCOMAS, P. C. FULLER, MANN of New York, EVERETT, and HARPER,

Mr. MANN withdrew the amendment, and the amendment of the committee was concurred in.

Mr. HUNTSMAN moved to amend the 24th section, so as to provide that no person engaged in the printing, publishing, or distributing, of newspapers, periodicals, or tracts, shall be a contractor or postmaster; and that any such person shall be forthwith dismissed from office.

After a few words from Messrs. HUNTSMAN, MANN of New York, ROBERTSON, EVERETT, CAVE JOHNSON, and GILLET,

Mr. MANN called for such a division as confined the operation of the amendment to postmasters; which branch of it was agreed to.

On the second branch of the amendment Mr. EVERETT asked for the yeas and nays, when it was found that there was no quorum present.

Mr. HALL, of Maine, moved a call of the House, when the Chair counted ayes 40, noes 45—still no quorum.

Mr. MANN, of New York, made a few remarks in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. HUNTSMAN briefly supported it.

After a few remarks from Mr. BRIGGS, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved an amendment to the following amendment of the Committee of the Whole to the 34th section of the bill: "And no person shall be appointed or hold the office of deputy postmaster, who shall not be an actual resident of the city or town where the office is situated," by adding the following: "or the district of country usually supplied by said office."

After some remarks by Messrs. GRAVES, PEARCE of Rhode Island, PARKER, EVERETT, REED, ADAMS, MCKAY, and WARDWELL, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCKAY then moved to amend the original amendment by striking out the words "be appointed or;" which was agreed to: Ayes 92, noes not counted.

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved to strike out the word "deputy;" agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was then concurred in. The following additional clause, agreed to in Committee of the Whole, was then read:

"SEC. 38. And be it further enacted, That from the thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, the following rates of postage shall be charged upon all letters and packets carried in the mail of the United States, excepting such as are by law exempt from postage, to wit:

"For every single letter, or letter composed of one piece, carried not exceeding fifty miles, five cents.

"Over fifty, and not exceeding one hundred miles, ten cents.

"Over one hundred, and not exceeding two hundred miles, fifteen cents.

"Over two hundred, and not exceeding four hundred miles, twenty cents.

"Over four hundred, and not exceeding eight hundred miles, twenty-five cents.

"Over eight hundred miles, thirty cents.

"And for every letter or packet composed of two pieces, double these rates; and for every letter or packet composed of three pieces, triple these rates; and for every letter or packet composed of four or more pieces, quadruple these rates: Provided, That all letters and packets of one ounce, avoirdupois, in weight, or more, shall be charged single for every quarter of an ounce."

MAY 27, 1836.]

Amendment of the Journal.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, moved to strike out "thirty cents," in the fifteenth line, and insert "twenty-five." He considered twenty-five cents quite sufficient for any distance.

Mr. MANN, of New York, drew the attention of the House to the great reduction in the minor rates of postage; in addition to which, it should be borne in mind that more than one half of the whole revenue of the Post Office was derived from the lower rates. The effect of the reduction of the tariff was not to increase, but to reduce, the income of the Department, and such was the object of the committee who had reported this bill.

After some further discussion, on motion of Mr. MANN, the bill under consideration, together with the "post route" bill, were made the special order for tomorrow, from and after eleven o'clock.

The House then adjourned.

FRIDAY, MAY 27.

AMENDMENT OF THE JOURNAL.

The Clerk commenced the reading of the journal of yesterday, when

Mr. ADAMS requested that the names of the members should be repeated upon the several votes on Mr. PINCKNEY's resolutions; which was accordingly done.

After the yeas and nays upon the adoption of the first resolution, the journal stated that several members (naming them) had asked to be excused from voting, and that Messrs. THOMPSON of South Carolina and WISE had declined voting.

Mr. ADAMS moved to correct the journal in reference to Mr. WISE, by stating that he refused to vote. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. THOMPSON] had declined voting.

Mr. WISE said that both the gentleman from South Carolina (not then in his seat) and himself had positively refused to vote.

The CHAIR said it was not usual, in making up the journal, to give the precise language used by a member. It would be difficult for the Clerk to do so; and when it was stated that the gentleman from Virginia declined voting, the Chair supposed that the entry was substantially correct.

Mr. ADAMS simply desired that the journal should state the facts as they occurred.

Mr. HUNTSMAN contended that it was not proper to enter upon the journal every thing that was said by a member. Were they to do so, it might lead to the most inconceivable mischief. A member might in this way introduce into the journal a few chapters of Vattel, or a speech two hours in length. They had assembled there for a very poor purpose, if every thing said by them was to be spread upon the journals. There was a great deal said there, which, for the sake of those concerned, had better never be repeated. If the practice and rules of the House did not warrant the amendment proposed, he hoped it would not prevail.

Mr. WISE wished to see the journals speak the truth, and the space which might be occupied in giving the facts was a matter of no consequence. He had gone farther than merely declining to vote, and had refused to vote. He desired that the journal might be so amended as to read that he declined and refused to vote. This was all he asked.

Mr. ROBERTSON thought the journal should simply state the facts, but not the reasons upon which they were founded.

Mr. HAMER recollected that on the day before yesterday the gentleman from Virginia had positively refused to vote upon the first resolution; but he did not recollect that he yesterday refused to answer to his name.

The CHAIR said it was in reference to the vote on the former day that the question had arisen.

Mr. WISE had refused to vote yesterday in stronger terms than those used on the day before.

Mr. PARKS objected to amending the journal, so far as regarded Mr. THOMPSON, as he was not in his seat.

Messrs. WISE and PICKENS affirmed that Mr. THOMPSON did refuse to vote.

Mr. LEWIS stated to the Chair that he had declined voting on either of the resolutions, for the reason that he did not think the House had any thing to do with the subject of slavery, any more than of religion; not wishing, however, to embarrass the House, or delay its proceedings, he had not made any objections at the time. He believed that no petition on the subject ought to be received, and, of course, no disposition could be made of them.

The motion to amend the journal in reference to Messrs. WISE and THOMPSON was then agreed to.*

* To the Editor of the U. S. Telegraph.

As I had not an opportunity of giving, on the floor of Congress, the reasons of my refusal to vote upon the resolutions of the select committee on the subject of slavery, and as those reasons and my conduct have been greatly misrepresented, I am forced, against my will, to resort to the public press. I will only premise that it is, in my judgment, an evil portent of the times, that a representative of the people has no opportunity afforded him of expressing the reasons of his course upon a question of deep importance to the country, as well as to himself. I think I may say, without any impropriety, that my general conduct in the House, and more particularly on the occasion referred to, should protect me from the imputation of contumacy, or a desire to interrupt the business of the House, or to defy its authority.

When Mr. Pinckney's resolutions were first presented, and as in one of those resolutions a proposition was asserted which had my assent, I felt at the moment, having no time for reflection, that I ought to vote for it. I very soon saw my vote paraded by Mr. Pinckney as authority in favor of that resolution, although he knew I was decidedly opposed to its introduction. I resolved not again to give such authority, however slight it might be. I could not vote against the first resolution, because as far as it went I assented to it. I could not vote for it, because my whole course on the subject had been in the nature of a plea to the jurisdiction, which jurisdiction I should have as much recognised by voting for one resolution as for another. Once let the subject be submitted to the jurisdiction of Congress, and it is manifest that one Congress may resolve directly the reverse of a preceding Congress. And again: I regarded the negation of constitutional power as to slavery in the States, when taken in connexion with the second resolution, as an admission of that power in this District; and the report itself regards the two objects as inseparably connected, both in the designs of the abolitionists and in practical results.

I could not, for the same reasons, vote for the second, and for the additional reason, that this resolution only asserts that Congress ought not to interfere with slavery in the District, omitting the words in the instructions, "because it would be a violation of public faith," &c., which is all that ever was pretended either by the chairman of that committee, or by the report itself, as furnishing any guarantee to the South, and leaves it purely a question of expediency, changing with every change of the opinions of the majority on that question; a resolution for which any abolitionist might have voted, and for which some, as I believe, did vote. I have no doubt that this concession in the resolutions reported, and departure from instructions given, was to get as large a vote as

Amendment of the Journal.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the journal, but, in a short time,

Mr. ADAMS said there was another inaccuracy in the journal. A decision of the Speaker was given in reference to the failure of members to vote, without previously giving the reasons which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GLASCOCK] had reduced to writing and sent to the Chair, and upon which the Chair had made his decision. The journal therefore would, unless amended, not state the truth, as there would appear nothing upon which the decision was based. He therefore moved to amend the journal, so as to embrace what he had stated, and reduced his amendment to writing.

The CHAIR had, upon the reading of the journal yesterday, stated the question before the House, and had decided the point which arose the day before upon the failure of several gentlemen to vote. His decision was not based upon any paper presented by the gentleman from Georgia, nor had he received any such paper. After the resolutions were adopted, the gentleman from Georgia had moved to have his reasons for not voting entered on the journal.

Mr. GLASCOCK had, yesterday morning, in compliance with the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] made the day before, reduced to writing his reasons for asking to be excused from voting; and when the question was announced yesterday, in order to avoid further difficulty, he rose and stated he was prepared to offer this paper.

Mr. ADAMS said the statement of the gentleman was substantially correct.

After some conversation between the CHAIR and Messrs. ADAMS and GLASCOCK, the latter stated that he had proposed to offer the written paper after the Speaker had commenced giving the decision referred to; but that it was not sent to the Chair, and the latter proceeded with the decision which he was delivering at the time.

Mr. ADAMS's proposition to amend the journal was then modified, according to the recollections of Mr. GLASCOCK, in substance, "that whilst the Speaker was delivering his opinion, Mr. G. offered to present a paper containing his reasons," &c.*

possible for the resolution; and, on the other hand, as far as it went, the resolution asserted what I believe to be true, and I could not therefore vote against it. I refused to vote, and did so in the most courteous and least defying manner. I could not vote, for the reasons given. I could not ask to be excused, because, by admitting the right to excuse, I should have admitted the right of the House to force me to vote, and of consequence its jurisdiction of the subject. I had not the slightest objection to being excused, if it was done not on my own application, or by any agency of mine.

Your obedient servant,

W. THOMPSON.

*To the Editors of the Globe:

GENTLEMEN: Having declined voting on the two following resolutions of Mr. Pinckney, and being deprived by the House of making known my reasons for doing so, I now feel it due both to myself and my constituents, to make them public through the columns of your paper.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOS. GLASCOCK.

1st resolution. That Congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere in any way with the institution of slavery in any of the States of this confederacy.

2d. That Congress ought not to interfere in any way with slavery in the District of Columbia.

I declined voting on the first, because I considered the resolution in its origin as wholly gratuitous and un-

Mr. GLASCOCK might have withdrawn his request. His recollection did not serve him as to the fact.

Mr. SPEIGHT hoped the amendment would not be made. If every proposition which was discussed or offered to be presented there was to go on the journal, it would be extended to a most unwarrantable length. He moved to lay the resolution to amend on the table.

Mr. ADAMS said the gentleman would save much time and trouble by withdrawing this motion.

Mr. G. LEE called the gentleman to order, on the ground that it was not competent to debate the motion.

Mr. ADAMS. This is a motion that, to speak the truth upon the journal, shall be laid upon the table.

Mr. HUNTSMAN suggested to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SPEIGHT] to withdraw his motion, and let them reject the proposition to amend.

Mr. SPEIGHT then withdrew the motion to lay the amendment on the table.

After some further remarks by Messrs. SUTHERLAND, ADAMS, and REED, in reference to the precise phraseology of the amendment,

Mr. GLASCOCK remarked that the motion to correct the journal was made without his knowledge, and he was indifferent as to the result, but he felt it his duty, in justice to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] to state the facts as they occurred and were recollected by him.

Mr. POTTS recollected that the gentleman from Georgia had proposed to offer a paper when this question was first taken up yesterday, but, upon the suggestion of the Chair, had declined pressing it upon the consideration of the House.

The question was then put upon the motion to amend, but, before the decision was announced, Mr. ADAMS asked for the yeas and nays. Ordered.

The hour of eleven having arrived, Mr. MANN, of New York, called for the orders of the day.

The CHAIR said the reading of the journal must first be completed.

Mr. A. H. SHEPPERD desired to know, distinctly, whether the decision of the Chair, which had been referred to, was consequent upon the paper, or the offer to present the paper, drawn up by the gentleman from Georgia?

The CHAIR and Mr. GLASCOCK simultaneously replied that it was not.

Mr. HAMER said it was evident that the mere offer to present the paper, whilst the Chair was delivering an opinion, was an interruption not necessary to be noticed on the journal.

Mr. SUTHERLAND said the facts of the case were now settled by the recollections of his colleague, [Mr. POTTS.] The request to present the paper had been waived. He must, therefore, vote against the amendment.

called for, and can never consent to make or argue a question as to the right of Congress to abolish slavery in the States, and because Congress has no jurisdiction over the subject; and any resolution either disclaiming or affirming jurisdiction is virtually an admission of it. I did not vote on the second, from a full conviction that it is an implied admission of the right of Congress to interfere with slavery in the District of Columbia, and adopted to evade the constitutional question, and because the committee failed to incorporate into the resolution, as they were specially instructed to do, "That to interfere in any way with slavery in the District of Columbia would be a violation of the public faith, unwise, impolitic, and dangerous to the Union," without assigning reasons for the same, leaving it wholly unexplained and unaccounted for, notwithstanding it is fully argued in the report itself.

Amendment of the Journal.

[H. of R.]

The motion to amend the journal was then negatived: Yeas 67, nays 111.

Mr. PHILLIPS said it was proper for him to state that he had voted in the negative upon the appeal from the decision of the Chair, and that his vote was not recorded. He moved that the vote be entered. Agreed to.

The reading of the journal was then resumed. It was stated that, on the second resolution, several gentlemen declined to vote, and, among others, Mr. GRANGER, of New York.

Mr. ADAMS said that the gentleman from New York had assigned, or attempted to assign, his reasons for declining to vote. That fact did not appear on the journal.

Mr. GRANGER moved to amend the journal by stating that he "declined to vote upon the second resolution, and was proceeding to assign his reasons, when he was called to order by the Chair."

The CHAIR said it was a well-settled rule, that, while the call of the yeas and nays was progressing, it was out of order to discuss any proposition, or address any remarks to the House. The gentleman had been called to order for a violation of this rule.

Mr. GRANGER did not censure the Chair. If there was any responsibility in the case, he was willing that it should fall upon himself.

Mr. ADAMS asked for the yeas and nays on Mr. GRANGER's motion to amend the journal; which were not ordered.

After some conversation between the CHAIR and Messrs. MCKENNAN and ROBERTSON, Messrs. PARKS inquired whether it was customary to enter every interruption or attempt to violate the rules of the House on the journal?

Mr. GRANGER contended that the 28th rule of the House, which required every member to vote unless excused for special reasons, justified the course which he had pursued, and that he was not out of order.

Mr. ADAMS, in reply to Mr. PARKS, inquired if it was customary to move the previous question upon three resolutions of vital importance, without a single word of debate, and that too when the motion was made by a member of the committee who reported them, and was sustained by a majority of that committee? He repeated, was it customary to crowd down the previous question, upon subjects so deeply important, without permitting one single word of debate?

The CHAIR reminded the gentleman that he was wandering from the question before the House.

Mr. SPEIGHT had a single word to say in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts. He would ask him whether it was customary, when a bill was reported for rechartering the Bank of the United States, to press the previous question several times the same day upon it, without permitting any debate?

The CHAIR said the gentleman was not in order.

Mr. BRIGGS said the House had decided by a large majority that the question of excusing members from voting must be postponed until after the question before the House was decided. Directly following that decision, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRANGER] rose while the call of the yeas and nays was progressing, and attempted to assign his reasons for not voting. The gentleman could as properly have arisen when his name was called, and moved to adjourn, or to recommit the resolutions, as to do what he desired at the time. He thought that the amendment proposed to the journals ought not to be made.

Mr. MANN, of New York, said he was opposed to the motion entirely. His colleague [Mr. GRANGER] yesterday undertook knowingly to commit a violation of the rules and orders of that House and his duties, for the purpose of escaping the responsibility of voting upon a delicate resolution, in the peculiar attitude he now occu-pled before the country; and he (Mr. M.) would therefore not agree to extend to him any favor or courtesy whatever.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, supported the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York, and, in the course of his remarks, was called to order several times by the Chair, on account of the irrelevancy of the topics which he discussed.

Mr. ADAMS requested permission to state the essential difference between the case cited yesterday by the Chair, as a precedent, and the case upon which the decision was made. He was proceeding, when

The CHAIR said that what the gentleman proposed to state would have been a proper argument pending the appeal yesterday from the decision of the Chair, but that it was not now in order.

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved the previous question; which was seconded—ayes 86, noes 49—and the main question was ordered to be put.

The amendment of Mr. GRANGER was then negatived: Ayes 60, noes 96.

The journal was further read, when Mr. ADAMS inquired whether there was any entry made in reference to his not voting on the third resolution?

The CHAIR said that it was stated the gentleman declined voting.

Mr. ADAMS did not decline voting. He had answered to his name, and had sent that answer to the Chair.

The CHAIR stated that one of the messengers had handed to him, for what purpose he knew not, a paper which he believed to be in the handwriting of the gentleman from Massachusetts, to this effect: "I hold the resolution to be in direct violation of the constitution of the United States, of the rules of this House, and of the rights of my constituents."

Mr. ADAMS then moved to amend the journal by stating, "when the name of Mr. ADAMS was called, he answered"—(as above stated)—"and sent his answer to the Chair."

Mr. A. proceeded to read the case cited by the Chair, of 1832, when the decision of the main question was announced where a member asked to be excused from voting, without first determining the question of excusing; when he was interrupted by

The CHAIR, who said that this case had no relevancy to the motion which had been made to amend the journal. It was a mere question of fact, to be decided by the House, and the debate upon it must be confined to very narrow limits.

Mr. ADAMS desired to cite the case of 1832, as a reason why his amendment should be adopted.

Mr. A. continued his remarks, and proceeded to read from the case of 1832, when

The CHAIR again interrupted him, and remarked that it was not in order to discuss, upon the present motion, what the House had done on a former occasion. He could not see what bearing the case which the gentleman was reading could possibly have on the question before the House.

Mr. ADAMS. I appeal from the decision of the Chair. I am not discussing the question. I am reading this precedent in order to show that my reasons should be entered on the journal for not voting on the third resolution. He was proceeding to characterize the document which he had before commenced reading, when

The CHAIR said it was not competent for the gentleman to do that indirectly upon the appeal, which it had been decided he could not do directly upon his motion to amend the journal.

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved the previous question; which was seconded—ayes 95, noes not counted—and the main question was ordered to be put.

After some conversation between Messrs. PHILLIPS,

H. of R.]

Post Office Department.

[MAY 27, 1836.]

WISE, ADAMS, E. WHITTLESEY, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, and the CHAIR, the question was taken upon the appeal of Mr. ADAMS, and the decision of the Chair was sustained: Ayes 97, noes 40.

The motion of Mr. ADAMS to amend the journal was then negatived, without a count.

Mr. ADAMS asked, as a favor, that the House would so amend the journal as to state, that when his name was called on the vote upon the third resolution, he "answered, but did not vote."

This motion was discussed by Messrs. ADAMS, TALIAFERRO, ANTHONY, HAMER, WISE, and BROMGOOLE, when

Mr. VANDERPOEL remarked that, had the gentleman from Massachusetts have asked to be excused at the time the vote was taken, he would not have opposed his present request. He had, however, declined voting, and had thereby violated the rules of the House. Mr. V. was of opinion that sufficient time had been consumed by gentlemen in the attempt to remedy their own disorder. He therefore moved the previous question; which was sustained by the House.

The amendment proposed by Mr. ADAMS was then negatived: Yeas 55, nays 117.

The remainder of the journal was then read, when (it being half past one o'clock) the House proceeded to the consideration of the orders of the day.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

In execution of the special order of yesterday, the House resumed the consideration of the "bill to change the organization of the Post Office Department, and to provide more effectually for the settlement of the accounts thereof."

The question pending was on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in their proposition to amend the bill, by inserting the following clause:

"SEC. 38. And be it further enacted, That from the thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, the following rates of postage shall be charged upon all letters and packets carried in the mail of the United States, excepting such as are by law exempt from postage, to wit:

"For every single letter, or letter composed of one piece, carried not exceeding fifty miles, five cents.

"Over fifty, and not exceeding one hundred miles, ten cents.

"Over one hundred, and not exceeding two hundred miles, fifteen cents.

"Over two hundred, and not exceeding four hundred miles, twenty cents.

"Over four hundred, and not exceeding eight hundred miles, twenty-five cents.

"Over eight hundred miles, thirty cents.

"And for every letter or packet composed of two pieces, double these rates; and for every letter or packet composed of three pieces, triple these rates; and for every letter or packet composed of four or more pieces, quadruple these rates: Provided, That all letters and packets of one ounce, avoirdupois, in weight, or more, shall be charged single for every quarter of an ounce."

The question immediately under consideration was the motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, to amend the fifteenth line by striking out "thirty," and inserting "twenty-five" cents.

Mr. CONNOR remarked that the tariff had been made out with great care by the committee, after much consultation with the Department, and he was well assured that no further reduction could be made, without throwing the expenses of the Post Office Department to a certain extent upon the Treasury.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said his objection to this item was only one of a series of objections he had to the whole section. He entered into a detailed examination of the old and present rates, and contended that loss would accrue by the proposed new tariff.

Mr. REED was well convinced, that the lower the rates of postage were, the greater would be the revenue. He was in favor of the motion to reduce the sum to twenty-five cents as the maximum, and was disposed to go still further than that, in some of the other rates.

Mr. MANN, of New York, then sent to the Clerk's table a letter from the Postmaster General to the Committee on the Post Office, on the subject of reducing the rate of postage, which was read. The section had been draughted in conformity with the views of that letter.

Mr. DENNY thought the committee had consulted more the convenience of the Department, its officers and clerks, than the convenience of the people. The effect of retaining the amount of thirty cents for all letters over eight hundred miles would be to cause a great reduction of the revenue; inasmuch as merchants would forward their letters by private conveyances. He was convinced this would be the case on the lines of the large navigable rivers, particularly between New Orleans and the cities of the West.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, was opposed to the whole section, and as soon as his amendment was disposed of he should move still further reductions, and if they were rejected, he should move to strike out the whole section; for he preferred the old tariff to the proposition of the committee. As for the reduction from $6\frac{1}{2}$ to 5 cents, and from $12\frac{1}{2}$ to 10 cents, it was no reduction at all to the people of the West, for they had neither cents nor ten cent pieces, or very few.

Mr. VINTON was totally opposed to all the section, except that of reducing the postage from $6\frac{1}{2}$ to 5 cents. He wished to carry the graduation of reduction still further, and at the proper time he should move an amendment accordingly, making 15 per cent. on the old rate of postage. This would increase instead of reducing the revenue.

Mr. CAMBRELENG concurred with the gentleman, that the mere circumstance of reducing the tariff would not reduce the revenue; but he did not agree with the gentleman in his proposed reduction. Mr. C. said he should himself propose a different scale of reduction at a proper time, which he read.

Mr. CHAMBERS, of Pennsylvania, disapproved of the proposition of the committee, and should prefer that of the gentleman from New York. He urged the gentleman from Louisiana not to press his amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, then withdrew it, and Mr. CAMBRELENG moved the following as the tariff of rates of postage: Retain the first clause of the section, and strike out all after the 7th to the 15th line of the section, inclusive, and insert "over 50 miles, and not exceeding 150, ten cents; over 150 miles, and not exceeding 400, fifteen cents; over 400 miles, and not exceeding 800, twenty cents; over 800 miles, twenty-five cents."

Mr. CHAMBERS, of Pennsylvania, entirely approved of these rates, and hoped they would be adopted by the House.

Mr. TOUCEY was more in favor of the proposition of the committee, with the single exception of the rate of 30 cents over 800 miles, than he was of that of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HUNTSMAN advocated the reduction of the tariff to the lowest possible rates, and was opposed to the section as it stood in the bill.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, was in favor of the reduction from thirty to twenty-five cents; but he did not think, after all the proposed additional routes were put into operation, that there would remain so great a surplus as gentlemen seemed to flatter themselves there would be. He entered into a variety of details, showing the great advantages that would accrue to the community in consequence of the proposed reductions by the committee.

Post Office Department.

Mr. HALL, of Vermont, supported the original clause. He had no hesitation in averring that, if the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky should be adopted, the Post Office Department would be upon the Treasury, as a burden, in less than a year from this time. He had no particular objection to change the rates from thirty to twenty-five cents for single letters over eight hundred miles, but he earnestly hoped that every other portion of the clause would be retained.

Mr. HAWES should vote against the amendment, against the proposition of the committee, against every other proposition in relation to the subject of the rates of postage, because he preferred the old plan. With regard to the reduction from 6½ to 5 cents, it would be no reduction at all to the people of the West, but would benefit the postmasters only, inasmuch as five and ten cent pieces were rarely or never seen in circulation.

The proposed amendment was further discussed by Messrs. ANTHONY and CAMBRELENG, when the latter gentleman withdrew his amendment, and Mr. LAWRENCE renewed it.

And the amendment was further discussed by that gentleman, Messrs. ADAMS, MCKEON, MANN of New York, REED, UNDERWOOD, BRIGGS, VANDER-POEL, P. C. FULLER, CONNOR, and HAWES.

Mr. MONTGOMERY rose and said: Sir, I am in favor of a reduction of the postage upon letters generally; I am therefore greatly opposed to the 30 cents, the postage reported by the committee, upon all single letters carried over 800 miles, because it is a large increase. I am unwilling to increase the postage for any distance whatever; and I believe I will vote against the bill, if that item be not stricken out, and I should regret to be compelled to do that, for there are some valuable provisions in the bill, and if the committee will consent to strike out of the bill the 30—

[Mr. MANN, of New York, rose and said the committee would agree to strike that item out of the bill.]

Mr. M. resumed. Sir, I would suppose that it would be a reduction upon the postage, perhaps equal to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. LAWRENCE;] and if so, I would prefer it, and will vote against the amendment, and for the bill thus amended. I cannot do so under an impression that it is a reduction of postage, which I am satisfied can be made without injury to the Department, or the least endangering the withdrawal of any of the mail accommodations now enjoyed by the people; for to that I am not only opposed, but I would be willing and am desirous of seeing them greatly extended, even should it become necessary to aid the Department with additional means to do so. But I apprehend there is no danger of that; for when we take into consideration the situation of that Department some time past, and its present condition, all the facts in relation thereto go to prove that a large reduction may be made upon the tariff of postage, and the Department still will be sustained by its receipts. I am brought to these conclusions from my convictions of the practical effect of a reduction of the tariff of postage. Upon all communications by mail, I would fix as the maximum of charge upon letter postage 20 cents, and the minimum 5 cents, and regulate the distances appropriately to the different sums; beginning at 5 cents and rising to 10, 15, and 20. This would make our tariff of postage accord with our federal coin, which would greatly obviate the difficulty of making change now experienced in the post offices.

I have said, Mr. Speaker, that I believed that the Department could be sustained at these rates of postage; and in this I am, I think, well sustained by a printed document, now before me, which shows the balances for and against the Department at the end of each quarter, commencing with the quarter ending 30th September, 1833, and ending on the 30th June, 1835, as follows:

	Gross revenue.	Expenditure.	Excess of revenue.	Excess of expenditure.
Sept. 30	$655,242 88	$746,098 15	-	$90,855 27
Dec. 31	720,209 27	747,415 52	-	27,206 25
1834.
Mar. 31	729,600 51	699,205 86	$30,394 65
June 30	718,696 00	717,885 00	811 00
Sept. 30	735,273 03	703,494 75	21,778 28
Dec. 31	724,542 34	701,497 08	23,045 26
1835.
Mar. 31	763,494 47	680,652 66	82,841 81
June 30	780,046 82	671,705 59	108,341 23

This statement shows an increase that will give a surplus of nearly or quite half a million in the present year, without taking into the calculation the progressive increase of each quarter over the preceding one, which would swell the amount to a much larger sum. The whole amount necessary to put into operation the new routes proposed by the bill reported by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads is estimated at the sum of three hundred thousand dollars; then, it will be seen that a large surplus, amounting to $200,000, will be found in the Department, to meet any reduction of postage that may occur from the reduction upon the tariff of postage proposed in the bill, after striking out the 30 cent item in the bill reported by the committee, or by the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts. So there can be no danger of any reduction of the mail accommodation in the country, which I would be as unwilling to see take place as any member of this House. I do not subscribe to the doctrine advanced by some gentlemen upon this floor, that this proposed reduction upon the tariff of postage will reduce the income into the Department; for I am strongly inclined to believe that the reduction of price will beget an increased correspondence, that will swell the receipts into the Department to the usual amount, if not beyond it.

The question was then taken on the amendment originally moved by Mr. CAMBRELENG, subsequently renewed by Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana; and it was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 90, nays 85.

The question then recurred on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

Mr. MANN, of New York, expressed the hope that the House would now non-concur with the Committee of the Whole in the whole amendment; for he was convinced the Department could not get along with the amendment just adopted. He remarked that, at the next session, it was proposed to take up the subject of postage on newspapers, periodicals, and pamphlets, when the subject of rates of postage on letters might also be acted on.

The amendment was further discussed by Messrs. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, MILLER, BRIGGS, FRENCH, LANE, WHITTLESEY of Ohio, and CONNOR.

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved a suspension of the rules, to enable him to move that this bill and the post route bill be the special order of the day for Monday next, at eleven o'clock, and each succeeding day, until they be disposed of. Agreed to.

Mr. MANN then submitted his motion.

Mr. VINTON moved twelve o'clock. Lost.

Commerce and Navigation—Indian Appropriation Bill, &c.

The motion of Mr. MANN was then agreed to. Mr. MARTIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, was agreed to. The House then adjourned.

SATURDAY, MAY 28.

COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to take up the motion heretofore submitted by him for printing an extra number of copies of the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on commerce and navigation.

Objection being made, Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to suspend the rules; which was agreed to: Ayes 100, noes not counted.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then modified his motion, so as that 10,000 extra copies (which he stated to be the usual number) be printed.

Mr. HESTER moved to amend by striking out 10,000 and inserting 5,000.

After a few remarks by Messrs. CAMBRELENG, HESTER, ROBERTSON, ADAMS, and ANTHONY,

Mr. GIDEON LEE said that he was unwilling to consume a moment of time unnecessarily; but his information on this subject differed so very widely from the views taken by some other gentlemen, that he felt constrained to beg the attention of the House for a few minutes. This document was by far the most important paper emanating from this Government, and was more earnestly sought for as well in Europe as in America, saving only the messages of the President. Not only was it required by every merchant and trader, as stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, but was no less required by every farmer, planter, and manufacturer. This paper recorded truly and faithfully the commercial transactions of this great nation, detailing, item by item, the quantity and value of our annual imports and exports—the pounds of cotton, tobacco, rice, corn, flour,—the manufactures, the total produce of the fields, the forest, the ocean, the mines, the shops, amounting to two hundred and eighty millions of dollars. Every man, of every trade and profession, should have it. Ten thousand copies were usually printed, and he was informed by the officers of this House, who have charge of the documents, that this number had fallen far short of the pressing demands. He hoped the greatest number of copies moved would be printed. The great item of cost was in setting up the types of this tabular printing—this was already incurred. The subsequent copies would cost less than one third of those now ordered. He hoped the House would order the highest number moved.

After some remarks from Mr. PHILLIPS,

Mr. MILLER moved the previous question; which was sustained by the House, and the motion to print 10,000 extra copies of the document referred to was agreed to without a count.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. OWENS made an ineffectual attempt to call up the resolution heretofore reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, fixing on a day for the consideration of the bill in relation to the public depositories.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY called for the orders of the day.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he had understood that the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs [Mr. BELL] had intended this morning to report the Indian bill, which was sent to the Senate near two months ago, and had been returned to the House with various amendments. He rose for the purpose of inquiring whether the report would be made; and if it should be, he hoped the House would act upon the bill promptly, as it was very important to the public service that these appropriations should be finally acted upon.

Mr. BELL had not reported, because certain documents from the War Department had not been communicated, but were expected in a few days. He would, however, ask leave to report at that time, and that the bill be made the special order for to-day.

Objection being made, the rule was suspended for the purpose of enabling the gentleman from Tennessee to report the bill: Yeas 144, nays 30.

Mr. BELL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, then reported the bill, which originated in the House, making appropriations for the current expenses of the Indian department, for Indian annuities and other similar objects, for the year 1836, with amendments to a portion of the amendments of the Senate, and recommending the House to non-concur in other amendments of that body; the bill was referred to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BELL moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of moving to go into committee on the foregoing bill; which was negatived without a count.

The bill and amendments were then ordered to be printed.

PEA PATCH ISLAND.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to authorize a compromise, and secure to the United States the title to the Pea Patch island, on the river Delaware.

The question being on the passage of the bill,

Mr. MILLIGAN rose and spoke as follows:

Mr. Speaker: It is not without regret that I rise to address the House at this time. They will do me the justice, however, to admit that it is a privilege I rarely exercise; and I should gladly have abstained from it on the present occasion, if I could have reconciled it with my sense of public duty. But the character of the bill before you leaves me no choice; for, notwithstanding it is denominated a private bill, and comes up for consideration on the days allotted to such subjects, it is nevertheless one which involves a conflicting claim of jurisdiction between two of the sovereign States of this confederacy. It is on this account, and because the State which I have the honor to represent on this floor is one of the parties to be affected by it, that I feel some solicitude as to the course which the House may ultimately see fit to adopt.

With regard to the individual who is to be relieved by this measure, I stand entirely disinterested. He is altogether unknown to me, and I am wholly unacquainted with any of his family or connexions. I have not even the advantage claimed by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. PERRY,] of having fallen in with his agent in the course of my travels; nor of the honorable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. REYNOLDS,] of ranking him among my constituents. I can, therefore, have no indirect object, either of friendship or of enmity, to subserve, by sustaining or by defeating his application. All that I require on this occasion, and which, as a member of this House, I have a right to demand, is, that before the Treasury, whose constitutional guardians we are, shall be taxed with the payment of this claim, the party seeking it shall exhibit satisfactory evidence of something like a valid title to the property about which he proposes a compromise.

And what, let me ask you, sir, is the evidence he adduces? Why, simply his own unsupported allegation that the title is in him, and that he derives it from some one who, in his turn, derives it from the State of New Jersey. I say that we have merely his own allegation: for I have looked carefully through the report of the committee, together with the accompanying documents, and I have met with nothing in the nature of proof—not a certificate; not a single copy of a record; not a solitary affidavit; not even an averment.

Now, sir, in relation to some of the most material facts, such as I am sure have exerted a considerable influence on the minds of many members here, give me leave to say that, if the whole evidence had been produced, it would have presented this case in a very different aspect. Take, for example, the fact with regard to the position of this island; and then, again, as connected with it, the other fact as to which side of it the main channel is to be found. Both of these have been roundly assumed to suit the purposes of this case. The Committee on Military Affairs, who reported this bill, and who, by the way, ought never to have had cognizance of it, called for no information, and have accordingly furnished none on this point. They seem to have relied for the facts, as well as for the argument, on the brief of the district attorney of the United States for the district of New Jersey; but to whose statement I by no means assent. During the late recess of a few days, while our hall was undergoing some little change preparatory to a summer session, it so happened that I made a visit to the neighborhood of this disputed territory. Indeed, at all times, I reside at no very remote distance from it; and from what information I gathered on the occasion alluded to, and at other periods, I have no hesitation in saying that the statement which found such ready credence here, that the island is nearer the New Jersey than the Delaware shore, is an entire mistake. On the contrary, it is affirmed by those whose judgment is entitled to respect, and who have the best opportunity of knowing, to be about equi-distant from the two shores. So, likewise, with regard to the channel. I have seen and conversed with several highly intelligent persons who have lived nearly all their lives in the vicinity of this place, and who, from their pursuits, are thoroughly acquainted with the navigation of the river Delaware, and they have assured me that the channel is nearly as good on one side of this island as the other; and that vessels are more influenced in selecting one or the other by the winds which happen to prevail at the time than by any other circumstance; that they have witnessed some of our largest frigates pass between the Pea Patch and the New Jersey shore; and that, in fact, they believe, although not now so generally used, the eastern was formerly the best channel. The course of the currents, however, influenced in some measure by the very formation of this island, together with the constant abrasion which is taking place at one extremity, and the consequent deposit of sand and mud at the other, lead many to apprehend that this channel may, in time, be affected by it; but at present it is navigable to ships of the heaviest class. In fact, one great advantage that this island possesses as a site for a fortification is, that it completely commands both passes of the river Delaware; for, in taking either, a vessel is brought directly under the whole range of the guns of the fort.

If, then, these statements, with regard to the position of the island and the channel, be true, (and surely they are entitled to as much weight as the unsustained allegations on the other side,) what becomes of that rule of the law of nations, so much relied on, that when two sovereign and independent States border upon a navigable stream, each claims to the centre of the river, and all islands then existing, or which may afterwards arise, go to the contiguous shore. In the first place, the facts of this case, when properly set forth, do not admit of its application; and, in the second place, if they did, I should meet this general principle by the assertion of another, to wit: that where States claim not by conquest or discovery, but by charter, as is the case with New Jersey and Delaware, they are strictly confined to those charters for their respective limits. And in support of this doctrine I cite the case of Handly's lessee vs. Anthony, in 5th Wheaton's Reports. This is a leading case, and must be familiar to all professional gentlemen on this floor, particularly those coming from the West, involving, as it did, a question of boundary between the States of Kentucky and Indiana. I shall not, therefore, take up the time of the House by reading it.

Again, sir, in the absence of all proof, and in direct opposition to notorious facts, many erroneous statements have been made as to the value of this island, and the nature of the improvements which were erected there by the present claimant, before the United States came into possession. So likewise as to the mode and manner of taking that possession. My honorable friend from Tennessee, who sits near me, and who I regret not to see in his seat at this moment, has perhaps gone the farthest in this sort of exaggeration, (no doubt altogether unintentionally,) in a burst of generous feeling which did honor to his heart. While he was commenting on the manner in which the claimant was driven off by the United States, he appeared to consider his abode at the Pea Patch as a perfect paradise—a second Blannerhasset's island—where he had erected temples, and planted groves, and surrounded himself with every thing that was pleasing to the eye or grateful to the sense. And thus considering it, he very naturally proceeded to place a high valuation on it. He told us that it was worth at least $1,000 per annum; that he could easily have realized that sum for it. Now, sir, what will be the astonishment of the House when I tell them that this enchanted island, this fairy land, from which this poor, persecuted man was forcibly driven, by the cruel and unrelenting power of the General Government, was a mere sand-bar, a mud-flat, incapable of human habitation; nothing, in short, but a rookery for crows, and that rookery at least four feet under water every high tide. Instead of being worth a thousand dollars a year, it would not, for the purposes of agriculture, have brought a thousand cents a year. It would never have repaid the expense of embankment; it would literally have swamped any one who had undertaken such a project. And, sir, with regard to the violence alleged to have been exerted by the United States to obtain possession of this mud-flat, where, let me ask, is the evidence of it? Why has it not been produced? From the statement made by the honorable gentleman from New Jersey, who addressed the House when this bill was last under discussion, it amounted almost to a Texian war. And with the aptitude he has shown for hunting up old documents at the War Office, I actually expected to see him pull out a list of the killed and wounded on the occasion. As, however, none has been produced, and the agents of the Government employed there at that time were engineers and non-combatants, I infer that the authorities of the United States took peaceable possession; and that the contrary is now asserted merely for the purpose of rounding off a claim for damages.

But I am willing, for the sake of argument, to waive this objection, arising out of the non-production of testimony, and join issue with the honorable gentleman upon the question of title. I am willing to admit that the true point in controversy is, whether the title to this island, before its cession, was in the State of New Jersey, or in the State of Delaware; for if in the first, there can be no doubt that it passed to the present claimant; if in the last, that it vested in the United States. Before entering on the consideration of this question, however, I must notice a preliminary remark that fell from the honorable gentleman, when narrating the causes which have prevented the General Government from settling this claim. I heard it with regret, and am sure it escaped him without due reflection. When commenting on a paper, purporting to be an agreement entered into between the agent of Dr. Gale and a former Secretary of War, (John H. Eaton,) by which it was stipulated that a certain amount should be paid the claimant whenever the Government were satisfied as to the validity of his title, he said that, but for the statement contained in the opinion of Messrs. Rodney and Read, the Attorney General (Mr. Butler) would have had no difficulty in making up his mind. All this may be true. But he then proceeded to charge those highly respectable gentlemen with wilfully misstating the facts. It is to this I except. And I take upon me to say, in my place here, from a thorough knowledge of their characters, that it is utterly impossible that either of them could be guilty of any such conduct.

[Mr. DICKERSON explained. He said he did not wish to be understood as charging those gentlemen with wilfully perverting the facts; he knew they were incapable of it; but what he did say was, that they were mistaken in some of the statements they had made.]

I am happy, sir, to receive the explanation. Whatever may have been the expressions which escaped the honorable gentleman in the warmth of debate, the qualification which he has made in his cooler moments is nothing more than I might have expected from his sense of justice, and his known urbanity of disposition. But I will proceed to show that the distinguished gentlemen referred to were not even mistaken in their statements. My honorable friend from New Jersey certainly complained (and, as well as I recollect, it so appears in his published remarks) that Messrs. Rodney and Read should have said that "large sums of public money have been judiciously expended, without the slightest notice of an adversary claim." Understanding this as an attack on the present claimant, he undertakes to refute it; and for this purpose he refers to letters which he has received from the War Department, showing when the first expenditure on this fortification took place. This, it appears, was in 1817. But does it follow, because this was the first expenditure on the fortification, that there was no money expended on the island prior to that time? If the gentleman thinks so, he is deceived, and he has been the innocent cause of deceiving others. Large sums had to be laid out in preliminary work, such as embanking the island, cutting drains, laying sluices, and driving piles, before it was possible to erect a fort; and I have the documents by me to prove it.

But even admitting, according to these letters from the War Office, that this expenditure in 1817 was the first either on the island or the fort, does it therefore follow that Messrs. Rodney and Read were in error when they affirmed that large expenditures had been made before the Government ever received notice of an adversary claim? By no means. So far from it, these very letters prove that the first notice or intimation of a claim on the part of Dr. Gale was in the month of February or May, 1818. But, besides this, sir, I have before me a report from the engineer-in-chief, sent here by Mr. Calhoun, when he was Secretary of War, in 1820, under a resolution of this House, and printed by the order of this House, showing that the works at the Pea Patch island were commenced as early as the year 1815, and that, between the 1st of January, 1816, and the 31st of December, 1819, nearly two hundred thousand dollars had been expended on this place. Well then might Messrs. Rodney and Read affirm that large disbursements of public money had been made before the Government were advised of this claim. And my only surprise is, that the gentleman from New Jersey, in his anxiety to defend Dr. Gale, should go out of his way to question the statements of these eminent counsel. I trust, however, he is now convinced that it was himself, and not they, who were in error; and that, as some further atonement, he will adopt the converse of his own rule, to wit: as he finds them, on investigation, to be correct in one of the statements he impugned, so he will give credence to all others they may have made.

I revert now to the title of New Jersey. I admit that the first question is, whether she ever had any to dispose of; for, if she had not, it is clear that those who claim by virtue of her authority can be in no better condition. Whether she had or had not, can be easily ascertained, by referring to the grant or charter for that portion of territory now known as the State of New Jersey. And if, upon such reference, it shall appear that the island called the Pea Patch falls within the limits therein described, there is at once an end of the matter. The title will then be proved to have been in her, and Dr. Gale, or whoever else she may have transferred her right to, will be the real owner of the property, and can justly demand either that the Government shall pay what he asks, or surrender back the possession. And, sir, if the party, as I suggested on a former occasion, will only consent to submit this question to a judicial investigation, and bring this claim here, backed by the judgment of a court or the verdict of a jury, I, for one, will pledge myself to vote for any sum that, in reason, he may demand. I will allow him all the back rents that may have accrued since the cession to the United States, and in my anxiety to do him justice, I do not know whether I would not also be willing to allow him the modest pittance of ten thousand dollars which he claims, in way of satisfaction for the outrage done to his feelings, when, according to his account, he was forcibly turned out of possession. But as his friends seem to shrink from such an investigation; as they appear to dread a court, and prefer rather to press his cause here than to go before a legal tribunal, we must be content to examine his pretensions according to the best lights that are before us. As I understand them, and as they have been avowed here in debate, he rests them altogether on the right of the State of New Jersey, which, as I have already remarked, depends upon, and can be determined by, a reference to her charter. That charter, sir, was first granted in 1663-4, by King Charles II to his brother James, Duke of York, who, in the same year, transferred, by deeds of lease and release, all his right and title to this section of country to Lord John Berkely and Sir George Carteret. I must ask the indulgence of the House while I glance, for a moment, at these instruments. They are to be found in the first volume of an old edition of the laws of New Jersey. [Here Mr. M. read extracts from these deeds, and then proceeded.]

It is manifest, I think, upon the face of these grants, that the limits of New Jersey can never, by any fair construction, be made to comprehend the island which is the subject of dispute. The words of description are: "and all the lands from the west side of the Connecticut river to the east side of Delaware bay." They do not, as has been pretended, call for the centre of the stream, or the bed of the stream, or the main channel; but they call for the eastern side. Had it been intended to include the river or bay in the grant, words to that effect would no doubt have been used, for when the King wished to convey to his brother a right to the Hudson river, he employed terms indicative of that purpose. In that case, he gave the river by name—"together, also, with the said river called Hudson's river;" but, when he comes to speak of Delaware river or bay, he speaks of it as a line that is intended to mark a boundary; and of course the words employed call only for its eastern side. And that this is the true construction is further proved by the words of the deed of lease and release from the Duke of York to Berkely and Carteret, wherein he uses these remarkable words; "All that tract of land adjacent to New England, and lying and being to the westward of Long Island and Manhattan's Island, and bounded on the east, part by the main sea, and part by Hudson's river, and hath upon the west Delaware bay or river." There can be no question, therefore, that, according to the plain meaning and the true interpretation of these instruments, the limits of the State of New Jersey on the western side stop at the water's edge, or, at all events, do not extend beyond "low-water mark." And so the late Judge Washington has decided. In the very case of Corfield vs. Corryel, cited by the honorable gentleman from New Jersey, the introduction of which by him struck me, I confess, with surprise, that eminent judge held the following language. I read, sir, from Washington's Circuit Court Reports, vol. 4, page 384:

"Secondly. The next general question to be considered is, whether the boundaries of the State of New Jersey include the place where the Hiram was seized whilst engaged in dredging for oysters. The grant from Charles II to his brother, the Duke of York, of the territory of which the present State of New Jersey was a part, dated the 12th of March, 1663-'4, was of all that territory lying between the rivers St. Croix, adjoining Nova Scotia, and extending along the seacoast, southerly, to the east side of the Delaware bay, together with all islands, soils, rivers, harbors, marshes, waters, lakes, fishings, huntings, and fowlings, and all other royalties, profits, commodities, hereditaments, and appurtenances to the same belonging and appertaining, with full power to govern the same."

The grant of the Duke of York, dated the 24th of June, 1664, to Lord Berkely and Sir George Carteret, after reciting the above grant, conveys to them all that tract of land lying to the eastward of Long Island, and Manhattan's Island, bounded on the east, part by the main sea and part by Hudson's river, "and hath upon the west Delaware bay or river, and extendeth southward," &c., with all rivers, fishings, and other royalties to the said premises belonging, &c.

There is no material difference between these grants as to the boundaries of New Jersey on the westward; and we are of opinion that, although the rule of the law of nations is that, where a nation takes possession of a country separated by a river from another nation, and it does not appear which had the prior possession of the river, they shall each extend to the middle of it; yet that, when the claim to the country is founded not on discovery and occupancy, but on grant, the boundary on the river must depend upon the just construction of the grant, and the intention of the parties to be discovered on its face. Taking this as the rule, we think the claim of New Jersey, under these grants, to any part of the bay or river Delaware, below low-water mark, cannot be maintained. The principle here suggested is, we conceive, fully recognised and adopted by the Supreme Court in the case of Handly's lessee vs. Anthony, 5 Wheaton, 374. Neither do we conceive that the limits of the State can, by construction, be enlarged by virtue of the grant of all rivers, fishings, and other royalties; which expressions ought, we think, to be confined to rivers, fishings, and royalties, within the boundaries of the granted premises."

And here let me remark, sir, that I strongly suspect it was this very opinion of Judge Washington's which has prevented the present claimant from prosecuting his suit to a conclusion. It was not, as some gentlemen would have us believe, the want of means; it was not broken fortunes or ruined health, but it was the decision I have read to you. He knew, or at least his legal advisers knew full well, that this decision, so far as he claimed through New Jersey, was a complete bar to his recovery, and so they will find it, unless I am greatly deceived, if ever they have the temerity to go to trial.

The truth is, as Judge Washington asserts, that, under her charter, New Jersey could not lawfully claim or exercise jurisdiction beyond low-water mark. And it follows as a necessary consequence from this fact, that she could have no possible right to the island in question, which is full one mile beyond that point. But, says the gentleman from New Jersey, the State of New Jersey now holds other islands in the Delaware river beyond low-water mark. I answer that, whatever islands she may now hold above the circle of twelve miles around Newcastle, are held in consequence of an agreement entered into between herself and Pennsylvania, which latter State very complaisantly consented to appoint commissioners, to meet those deputed on the part of New Jersey, to arrange this identical subject. The State of Delaware never accepted the invitation for this purpose, though repeatedly solicited by New Jersey. Her Legislature said, and said properly, that they had no idea of treating for what already belonged to them; that they might as well be asked to negotiate for the coats on their backs. Both States, therefore, stand towards each other, in relation to boundaries, precisely where they were left by their original grants.

With regard to the title of Delaware, as I had occasion to remark when this bill first came up, she rests it mainly on the two deeds of feoffment from the Duke of York to William Penn, executed on the 24th of August, 1682. The first is for that portion of territory comprehended within the compass or circle of twelve miles around the town of Newcastle; the last, for what lies between the southern extremity of this circle and Cape Henlopen. I pray the House to bear with me while I turn to those grants. They will then perceive why I am so tenacious in my opposition to any claim to this Pea Patch island that is not derived through the State of Delaware. The fact is not to be disguised, that if we had no title to it at the time of our cession to the United States, we have none now for one remaining inch of territory. They both spring from the same source, and must stand or fall by the same instrument. The language in the first deed is, "all that town of Newcastle, otherwise called Delaware, and all that tract of land lying within the compass or circle of twelve miles about the same, situate, lying, and being upon the river Delaware, in America; and all islands in the said river Delaware, and said river and soil thereof, lying north of the southernmost part of said circle of twelve miles about the said town; together with all rents, services, royalties, franchises, duties, jurisdictions, liberties, and privileges, thereunto belonging."

Now, it is obvious—indeed, I believe it is conceded by every one—that this grant from the Duke of York is comprehensive enough to cover not merely the island in question, but the whole Delaware river embraced within its limits; and, in order to escape from the effect of it, it is necessary to impeach its validity. Accordingly, it has been said that the Duke had no title himself, and therefore had no right to make this conveyance to William Penn; that the whole of these lands were obtained by conquest, and that, under the law of England, they would enure to the Crown, and not to the benefit of a private subject.

Here the honorable gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. DICKERSON,] and the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. PERRY,] branch off in their arguments. The one admits that the deed from the Duke of York covers the disputed island, but denies its validity, inasmuch as he alleges there was previously no charter from the Crown. The other is for trampling upon all charters, and tells us to point to our battle-fields—to the valor of our forefathers—to the blood spilt by them in obtaining their possessions. This is certainly all very fine, sir, as mere rhetorical flourish, but would figure rather awkwardly, I think, in an action of ejectment. Let me assure the honorable gentleman, however, that we can establish our right even according to his requirement. I say it, sir, without boast, but I should be unjust to the memory of the brave, and insensible to the honest pride of those who sent me here, if I failed to remark, that the services rendered by the Delaware line in the war of the Revolution were unsurpassed by those of any of the States who assisted in achieving our glorious independence. If the gentleman wishes to know what fields in that ever-memorable struggle for liberty were stained with Delaware blood, I point him to Long Island, to Brandywine, to Germantown, to the plains of Monmouth; but, above all, to the battle of Camden, where the Delaware regiment, side by side to that of Maryland, bore the brunt of the action, and was nearly cut to pieces. I refer him, sir, to the dying letter of the lamented Baron de Kalb, who fell in that engagement. I refer him to my honorable friend from Maryland, now sitting before me, [Mr. HOWARD,] whose gallant father, Colonel Howard, acted so prominent a part at the battle of the Cowpens and at Guilford court-house, and let him ask that gentleman the opinion that father entertained of the Delaware regiment. I refer him, sir, to Ramsay's History of the American Revolution, to Marshall's Life of Washington, and to every writer who pretends to narrate the events of that period; and he will find in each and all of them abundant recorded evidence of the valor of Delaware troops, and of the blood they have poured out in the cause of freedom. May I not, then, say to the gentleman, that we rest our title not merely on musty charters, but on those charters sealed with the blood of our fathers?

I return now, sir, to the gentleman from New Jersey. He calls for the royal charter to the Duke of York—he wants to see the letters patent under the great seal. Nothing else will satisfy him, and unless we can produce them, he shall doubt whether they ever issued. The honorable member must pardon me for saying that he is somewhat vacillating in his course, and, on the whole, rather difficult to please. He first doubts whether we ever had a charter from the Crown; and then, in the same breath, says it is altogether immaterial; that whether it be forthcoming or not, it is nevertheless good for nothing, because, forsooth, it covers too much—it covers a part of the county of Salem; but, above all, the town of Salem, which he appears to apprehend Delaware may possibly take it into her head to cede to the United States, for marine barracks or other purposes. In reference to this new suggestion of claiming too much, the answer is easy, and the honorable gentleman may therefore dismiss his fears—the cherished little town of Salem is perfectly safe. It must be obvious to any one who looks at the subject attentively, that the deed from the Duke of York never could, by any fair construction, be extended across the river. And why? Because, by a previous grant from the same grantor, all those lands lying east of the Delaware river had already been granted. The deed to Berkely and Carteret, in 1664, conveyed all that tract of land lying between the west side of the Connecticut and the east side of the Delaware bay and river; consequently, no subsequent grant of the same property could be valid. But will any lawyer undertake to say that a deed containing such a provision would therefore be invalid, for the purpose of passing property in which the grantor had a title? Is it not a well-settled principle of law, that, "utile per inutile non vitiatur," or in other words, that a deed may be good as to some parts and void as to the others? It happens every day. And in this particular case, the deed for the circle of twelve miles around Newcastle is a valid instrument, and conveys a good and sufficient title to all property within its limits not previously granted.

With regard to the other question, whether there was or was not a charter from the King to his brother, the Duke of York, I would remark that there is the strongest presumptive proof of its existence. Certain it is that, under the grants of the latter, the agents of William Penn took possession of this territory, and, with the assent of the Crown, held it, and exercised all manner of ownership over it. There never was any attempt made to controvert the title. It is not likely, either, that Penn would have accepted, or that the Duke of York would have executed, a deed without competent authority; and that he actually had a patent from the King is rendered abundantly probable by reference to the royal charter for Pennsylvania. In that instrument, which was made two years anterior to the deeds of seoffment from the Duke of York to William Penn, for what is now the State of Delaware, express allusion is had to the twelve miles circle around Newcastle; thereby clearly establishing the existence of some prior grant answering to this description.

I will turn for a moment to that charter, and beg gentlemen to mark the phraseology. The language is certainly peculiar, and goes far, in my judgment, to settle this question. That part of the charter to which I particularly allude is the following: "Know ye, therefore, that we, (favoring the petition and good purpose of the said William Penn, and having regard to the memory and merits of his late father, in divers services, and particularly to his conduct and discretion under our dearest brother James, Duke of York, in that signal battle and victory fought and obtained against the Dutch fleet, commanded by the Heer Van Opdam, in the year 1665: In consideration thereof, of our special grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion,) have given and granted, and by this our present charter, for us, our heirs, and successors, do give and grant unto the said William Penn, his heirs and assigns, all that tract or part of land in America, with all the islands therein contained, as the same is bounded on the east by Delaware river, from twelve miles distance northward of Newcastle town unto the three-and-fortieth degree of northern latitude, if the said river doth extend so far northward; but if the said river shall not extend so far northwards, then by the said river so far as it doth extend; and from the head of the said river the eastern bounds are to be determined by a meridian line, to be drawn from the head of said river unto the said three-and-fortieth degree. The said lands to extend westwards five degrees in longitude, to be computed from the said eastern bounds; and the said lands to be bounded on the north by the beginning of the three-and-fortieth degree of northern latitude, and on the south by a circle drawn at twelve miles distance from Newcastle northwards; and westwards unto the beginning of the fortieth degree of northern latitude; and then, by a straight line, westwards to the limits of longitude above mentioned."

Now, sir, it does seem to me that the extract I have read is perfectly conclusive as to the existence of such a prior grant as we contend for. How otherwise can you account for a reference, in the year 1680, to a circle drawn at twelve miles distance from Newcastle, which is said to have had no existence till 1682? Upon any other supposition the thing is impossible. There must have been a prior grant from King Charles II to the Duke of York. Indeed, the honorable gentleman from New Jersey seems himself to have some such impression; for, lest this dreaded parchment might perchance be produced, or its existence established, he shifts his ground a little, and quotes an act of the Legislature of Delaware, passed in 1793-'4, to show that we do not claim by virtue of any grant from the Duke of York, but by virtue of the treaty of peace in 1783. In my judgment, sir, the gentleman is altogether mistaken in the interpretation he has placed upon that statute. According to my reading of it, instead of establishing, it directly contradicts the assertion he has made. I will, however, read it to the House, and leave it for them to decide. It is in the 2d vol. of the Laws of Delaware, page 1174, and is a supplement to an act entitled an act for opening and establishing a land office within that State, &c. It might with more propriety have been called an act for settling and quieting the title to real estates, for such is its manifest object. But here it is. [MR. MILLIGAN then read the first section of it, and proceeded.] Now, sir, instead of denying, does it not expressly affirm, all titles derived through that instrument, whenever the possession existed prior to 1760? The object in limiting it to that period was, to get rid of the numerous claims set up by the heirs of Penn, the royal proprietary, and which threatened to be a source of vexation and iniquity to many of the good citizens of the State.

Pea Patch Island.

But let us recur again to the objection which has been raised against the deed of feoffment from the Duke of York. Even supposing it were true, as is alleged, that at the time of the conveyance to William Penn, the Duke, strictly speaking, had no legal title, how would that help the case of New Jersey? She, at all events, must be confined to her own limits, to the eastern side of Delaware bay and river. And, unquestionably, the undisturbed possession enjoyed for so many years by Penn, and those claiming under him, would, in conjunction with another circumstance I shall mention, cure any defect of title with regard to Delaware. That other circumstance is, that there was actually a new charter granted by the Crown to the Duke of York for this same property, in 1683, one year after his deeds of feoffment to William Penn. This, no doubt, was intended "ex abundanti cautela," and not as by any means necessary to give effect to the two deeds of feoffment. But suppose it were otherwise; then I contend that the legal consequence of this new grant was, to transfer all rights arising under it to the original grantee, William Penn; for there is no doctrine in the law more clearly established, than that a party who erroneously conveys property, under the impression that it belongs to him, is bound afterwards to make assurance, if he himself subsequently acquire a legal title. And, sir, it has been so decided in this very case, and decided, too, by one of the ablest judges that ever adorned the British bench. I allude to the opinion of Lord Hardwicke, expressed in the year 1750, in a suit between Penn and Lord Baltimore, concerning a matter of agreement and boundary. And I refer to this case with the more pleasure, because it touches other points directly connected with the subject we are discussing. It will be seen that he differs widely from my honorable friend from New Jersey as to the value he places on the two deeds of feoffment from the Duke of York, and likewise as to the importance he attaches to length of possession. The case is reported in 2 Vesey, p. 444, and I pray the attention of the House to the following extracts:

"Next, consider the dispute on Penn's charter, which grants him all that tract of land in America, from twelve miles distance from Newcastle, to the 43d degree of north latitude, &c, under which the plaintiffs do not pretend a title to the three lower counties, which relate to the two feoffments in 1682.

"The objection of uncertainty arises principally on the question concerning the circle of twelve miles to be drawn about Newcastle. It was insisted on in the answer, and greatly relied on in America; but it is the clearest part of the cause. As to the centre, it is said that Newcastle is a long town, and, therefore, it not being fixed by the articles, it is impossible the court can decree it. But there is no difficulty in it: the centre of a circle must be a mathematical point, (otherwise it is indefinite,) and no town can be so. I take all these sorts of expressions, and such agreements, to imply a negative: to be a circle at such a distance from Newcastle, and in no part to be further. Then it must be no further distant from any part of Newcastle. Thus, to fix a centre, the middle of Newcastle, as near as can be computed, must be found; and a circle described round that town, which is the fairest way; for otherwise it might be fourteen miles in some parts of it, if it is a long town. Then, what must be the extent of the circle? It is given up at the bar, though not in the answer. It cannot be twelve miles distant from Newcastle, unless it has a semi diameter of twelve miles. But there is one argument decisive, without entering into nice mathematical questions; the line to be the dividing line, and to be drawn north from Henlopen, was either to be a tangent, or intersecting from that circle; and if the radius was to be of two miles only, it would neither touch nor intersect it, but go wide.

"As to the plaintiff's estate and possession, this must concern only the three lower counties, which plainly passed by the feoffment. I will lay aside the question of estoppel, which is a nice consideration; for the Duke of York, being then in nature of a common person, was in a condition to be estopped by a proper instrument. In 1663, the Duke of York takes a new grant from the Crown; and, having granted before, was bound to make further assurance, for the improvements made by Penn were a foundation to support a bill in equity for further assurance. The Duke of York, therefore, while a subject, was to be considered as a trustee; why not afterwards as a royal trustee? I will not decree that in this court; nor is it necessary: but it is a notion established in the courts of revenue by modern decisions, that the King may be a royal trustee; and if the person from whom the King takes by descent was a trustee, there may be grounds in equity to support that; and if King James II, after coming to the Crown, was a royal trustee, his successors take the legal estate under the same equity; and it is sufficient for plaintiffs if they have an equitable estate. Then, consider this in point of possession of the Penns, the proof of which is very clear; they have been permitted to appoint Governors of these lower counties, which have been approved by the Crown according to the statute of King William. Indeed, all the acts of possession are with salvo jure to the Crown; but the evidence for defendants amounts to this: not of real possession or enjoyment, but of attempts to take possession, sometimes by force, sometimes by inciting people to come there; otherwise why should Lord Baltimore grant here for half what he granted in other places? which shows plainly it was an invitation to get settlers under their title. Now, I am of opinion that full and actual possession is sufficient title to maintain a suit for settling boundaries: a strict title is never entered into in cases of this kind, neither ought it. But what ends this point of want of title to convey is, that no part of the lower counties is left to be conveyed by plaintiffs to defendant; so that nothing being to pass by plaintiffs, it is not material whether they have title to convey or not. But now, in cases of this kind, of two great territories held of the Crown, I will say, once for all, that long possession and enjoyment, peopling and cultivating countries, is one of the best evidences of title to lands, or districts of lands, in America, that can be; and so have I thought in all cases since I have served the Crown; for the great beneficial advantage arising to the Crown for settling, &c., is, that the navigation and the commerce of this country is thereby improved. Those persons, therefore, who make these settlements, ought to be protected in the possession, so far as law and equity can; and both these proprietors appear to have great merit with regard to the Crown and the public; for these two provinces have been improved in private families to a great degree, to the advantage of the mother country: this regards the three lower counties, the strength of which is vastly on the side of the plaintiffs."

Thus, sir, it appears that the title of William Penn to "three lower counties upon Delaware," under the grants from the Duke of York, were recognised in the most solemn manner, and after a thorough investigation by the law officers of the Crown. Under this decision, he continued to hold them up to the period of our Revolution, when all portions not previously conveyed passed immediately to the State of Delaware. That State has ever since claimed and exercised exclusive jurisdiction over this territory. She has, therefore, not only a good, but the best possible of all titles, for she has both the right and the possession combined.

Having the right, she chose, for wise, and national, and patriotic purposes, to transfer it, so far as related to the island in question, to the United States. She did so on the condition before stated, that the United States should erect and maintain certain military works for the defence of that portion of our common country. She was fully aware of the importance and value of the island for that purpose, but she did not ask or accept a single farthing for it. The United States were well satisfied with her title at that time; and if, when they came to take possession, they found Dr. Gale there, (which I much doubt,) he was there as a trespasser and an intruder; for he did not pretend to claim under the State of Delaware, and I have shown, I think, that he could derive no possible title from New Jersey.

The effort, therefore, to awaken public sympathy in his behalf, as one who had been rudely treated by the strong arm of authority, is altogether out of place. There is nothing in the history of the proceedings to justify it. On the contrary, if there be any one who has a just right to complain, it is the General Government and its agents, who have been slandered for acts which they never performed, and pursued with vexatious demands which have no foundation in equity or law.

And the true question now is, will you, because an individual has the hardihood to lay claim to property which is in your possession, and which you are well satisfied lawfully belongs to you, pay him an exorbitant price to compromise, rather than send him to the courts and to a trial before his peers, where you are morally certain he cannot recover? Will any man believe that if the claimant himself had the slightest confidence in the strength of his title, he would hesitate about adopting this course? With a verdict in his favor, how differently could he appeal to this House, and how different a sum might he not demand. Sir, it is because he knows he cannot recover in a court of law, that he is now willing to come before Congress, and run the risk of getting what he asks or taking what you will give.

You already hold his agreement to part with any or whatever title he may possess, whenever you are satisfied as to its validity. But the gentleman from New Jersey complains that you will not pay him before this antecedent condition is complied with. What, I ask, is there to produce this conviction in your minds? What is the evidence relied upon? Why, simply that professional men have differed in their opinions as to the right of the claimant. But is not the weight of authority all one way? For while, on one side, you have nothing but the loose and ill-digested brief of the district attorney for the New Jersey district, together with the doubts of the present Attorney General of the United States on the other, you have the well-arranged and copious argument of the late celebrated Cæsar A. Rodney, and also the lucid and unequivocal opinion of the equally distinguished and much-lamented William Wirt, when he was the Attorney General of the United States.

Under these circumstances, then, can you say, under this man's own agreement, that the condition upon which the money was to be paid has been fulfilled? It is morally impossible. There is nothing, literally nothing, in the case calculated to bring your minds to such a result. Is it, therefore, either just or expedient to adopt the provisions of this bill, which propose to allow him not merely the sum he originally agreed to take, but nearly double that amount? And if expedient for the United States, is it either just or expedient for the State of Delaware, from whom the cession of this island was obtained, and whose rights, I repeat, may be seriously affected by your giving any countenance to this claim? As her representative on this floor, bound at all times, both from inclination and duty, to defend her interests, I protest against it—I protest against any action on the part of this body, which shall have a tendency, directly or indirectly, to compromise her rights, or in any manner call in question her title to one inch of her territory. And, sir, I trust in this I shall find myself sustained not only by all those gentlemen who are the advocates of State rights, but by the sober judgment of the whole House. With a view of testing the opinion of the House, I shall first move to lay the bill on the table; and if I fail in this, I shall then offer a resolution, by way of amendment, proposing that a retrocession of this island be made to the State of Delaware.

When Mr. MILLIGAN had concluded,

Mr. INGERSOLL addressed the House at length on the subject.

Mr. LANE remarked that much time had been spent in investigating this subject, and it was probable that the debate would, if not arrested, be continued for some time to come. As the facts were all before the House, and as every member was doubtless prepared to vote on the bill, he moved the previous question.

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved a call of the House, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 83, nays 14.

A motion was then made that the House adjourn; which was carried: Yeas 51, nays 48; and

The House adjourned.

MONDAY, MAY 30.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. HIESTER moved to take up the resolution from the Senate fixing a day for the adjournment of Congress.

Objections being made, Mr. H. moved to suspend the rules for that purpose.

Mr. CRAIG moved to amend the motion so as to suspend the rules for the further purpose of taking up and disposing of the resolution reported by the Committee of Ways and Means fixing a day for the consideration of the deposit bill. He was unwilling to fix a day for the adjournment until the bills to which he had referred were acted on.

Mr. McKIM moved a call of the House. Lost.

Mr. HOWELL moved to lay the motion to suspend the rules, together with the amendment, on the table.

Mr. HIESTER asked for the yeas and nays; which were not ordered, and the motion of Mr. HOWELL prevailed: Yeas 81, nays 56.

INDEPENDENCE OF TEXAS.

Mr. STORER asked the consent of the House to present a memorial, adopted at a meeting of the citizens of his district, praying Congress to recognise the independence of Texas.

Objection being made, Mr. S. moved a suspension of the rule, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were not ordered.

Mr. HARPER moved to amend the motion so as to suspend the rule for the additional purpose of allowing him to present similar memorials from citizens of the county and city of Philadelphia.

Mr. PARKS moved to lay the motion to suspend the rules on the table.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, of Mississippi, asked for the yeas and nays on this motion; which were ordered.

Mr. PARKS then withdrew his motion; when

Mr. MANN, of New York, renewed it, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The motion to suspend the rules for the purpose stated was then laid on the table: Yeas 116, nays 52.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, asked the consent of the House to permit him to present several petitions.

Mr. ADAMS objected, and gave notice that he would not consent to the presentation of any petition out of the usual order, as he had various petitions which he wished to offer.

DECISION OF THE CHAIR.

Mr. CRAIG moved to suspend the rules until one o'clock, for the purpose of considering a resolution reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, fixing a day for taking up and disposing of the bill regulating the deposits of the public moneys in certain local banks.

Mr. OWENS asked for the yeas and nays on the motion; which were ordered.

When the name of Mr. PATTON, of Virginia, was called, he rose and asked to be excused from voting, and demanded that the question should now be taken on his application.

Mr. HAMER, of Ohio, hoped the call would proceed, as the question raised by the gentleman from Virginia had been very recently decided.

The CHAIR suggested that the call had better proceed until the roll was called through, passing over the gentleman from Virginia; and, before the result was announced, the question which the gentleman wished to make could be raised.

Mr. PATTON acquiesced in this suggestion, as it enabled him to present the same question, substantially, which he had indicated his purpose to make.

The roll having been called through,

The CHAIR remarked that it was for the House to say whether the motion of the gentleman from Virginia should be decided before the decision of the House was announced.

Mr. PATTON said he wished to know whether the Speaker adhered to the decision he had made the other day, that the vote of the House on the main question must be reported before the motion of a member to be excused from voting was put to the House.

The CHAIR said the result of the vote just taken could not be changed by the vote of the gentleman on either side.

Mr. PATTON said he desired a decision of the Chair, one way or the other, on the question he had made. He could not consent that it should be dodged or evaded, while he and others should be denounced as factious spirits for voting against a decision which those who made and sustained it would not, and dared not, discuss.

The CHAIR stated that he had the other day decided this question, and his decision had been sustained by the House. He now decided that, where a member asked to be excused, or declined voting, the rule being silent as to the time when the question should be decided, the result of the vote should be announced before the question on the application was put. If a contrary practice prevailed, it would be in the power of a few members to arrest the decision of a question. In this case, the result could not be varied by the vote of the gentleman; and he decided that it was the duty of the Chair to announce that result, leaving the question on the gentleman's application to be excused for the subsequent decision of the House.

Mr. PATTON then appealed from the decision of the Chair, and was proceeding to address the House in support of his appeal, when

Mr. MANN, of New York, rose and proposed to call for the orders of the day.

Mr. PATTON said he was entitled to the floor, and should not yield it, unless the gentleman rose to a question of order. He said he was pretty well apprized of what his rights were, and, with the blessing of God, he meant to maintain them.

The Chair has declared (said Mr. P.) the question whether he should be excused could not be decided until the vote of the House had been declared. I mean to show that the decision is not correct. The same decision had been made a few days ago by the Speaker, and sustained by the House. He had, with forty-five other gentlemen, voted against the decision of the Chair on that occasion, and he had made this question at this time, again, for the purpose of having an opportunity of vindicating his opinion in argument, and of showing that his course and opinions on that occasion were in conformity to his duty, and not factious or anarchical, as had been alleged. As to the particular question of which he had availed himself in order to raise the point upon the decision of the Chair, he had no difficulty in voting upon it. But no other means were left to him of bringing to the deliberate review of the House the decision made the other day, and which he (Mr. P.) considered as a subversion of the rules of the House, by violating the plain letter and spirit of one of their most important provisions. He wished to vindicate the cause of truth and reason, by resisting a decision which bade defiance to both, disappointing the purposes for which the rules were made, and was a virtual repeal of those rules. He made it now, also, because it afforded him the only means in the only place in which, consistently with his character and self-respect, he could vindicate himself, his course, and motives, from the most recklessly false and slanderous imputations made upon them in the paper of the official printers of this body, who were supplied with the means of pouring out their daily torrent of calumny and abuse by means of the public treasure paid to them by this House as public printers.

When several honorable members of this House, some days ago, had asked to be excused from voting, and others declined voting, another member, [Mr. WHITLSEY, of Ohio,] in the exercise of his unquestionable rights as a member of this House, had moved an appeal from the decision of the Chair similar to that now appealed from. We were compelled to express our opinions on that question, whether we would or not; we had no option but to say, upon our honor as gentlemen, and our conscientious convictions as Representatives, whether the rule of the House was as the Speaker said it was. And those of us who were of opinion that the Speaker had mistaken the meaning of the rule, who knew that it was directly in the teeth of the only precedent that we know of, for thus deciding upon this mere question of order, are now denounced by the official organs of this body as "the factious spirits of the House," engaged in "a joint plot to unsettle the Government and disturb the Union," as those "who, for partisan objects, would revolutionize the principles of order in Congress and in the Government; who would throw every thing into anarchy," &c. These are the developments, stupendous and tremendous, which are derived from the fact that forty-five or six gentlemen happened to differ from the Speaker on a mere question about the construction of the rules. And, besides all this, I suppose we are now to understand, so far as the authority of three self-constituted high priests of republicanism and democracy (the editors of the Globe) can accomplish it, that it is henceforth to be considered as one of the established canons of political orthodoxy, that no man who claims to he, or wishes to be considered a republican, must dare to vote against any decision of a party Speaker, be it right or wrong, wise or unwise, consistent with reason and authority, or in the face of both; and this, too, when by another rule, made by the Speaker, and sustained by the House, every man's mouth is gagged, and he is not allowed to justify his vote by argument. I say all this is to be inferred, because, in the same article of this official organ of the House, it is said that there is but one "staunch republican vote" among the factious forty-six; and it is more than insinuated that he, too, must forfeit his place in the good opinion of the said high priests, unless he will accept the apology they have good-naturedly tendered to him, viz: "that he got there under some misconception of the question."

Whether that honorable gentleman will avail himself of this apology, and feel flattered by the left-handed compliment he has received, I know not. For myself, I have no hesitation in saying that I feel much more honored by the abuse and denunciation I have received, than I should be by such a compliment from any quarter, and especially from such a source as this proceeds from.

I have furthermore been induced, Mr. Speaker, to raise this question of order, because I know the fact that some honorable gentlemen, whose republicanism and democracy will stand the test of the latest and most approved standard, which will not even be questioned by the great Globe itself, for they have all the attributes of a democrat, and especially that one thing needful, (being in favor of a particular gentleman for the presidency,) which will, in the opinion of certain editors, in the twinkling of an eye, quick as the touch of the wand of a magician, convert the most discordant political elements into one homogeneous mass of democracy. I say I know that there are such honorable gentlemen on this floor, who voted to sustain the Speaker's decision, who, after a little reflection, became satisfied that they had fallen into an error, and that the Speaker's decision was wrong, and ought to be reversed. I trust and believe that, upon this question being deliberately considered and discussed, many others will be found who will be convinced of their error, and have firmness and independence enough to avow it.

Mr. PATTON said he was not in the habit of making a parade of professions of democracy or republicanism; ready at all proper times and places to give a frank disclosure of his opinions and principles as to men and measures to those who have a right to know them, he left it to them to call him "democrat," "republican," or whatever else they please. I disclaim and disavow (said Mr. P.) any inference from my opinions in regard to the comparative merits and claims of the different candidates for the presidency, whatever they may be, (and I certainly do not mean to make any avowal of them here and now,) upon any votes I give here upon any question whatever. I have decided, and shall continue to do so, every question which I may be called on to decide, upon its own merits, without regard to its effect upon the prospects and success of any aspirant or any party; and when the time comes that I can be induced to vote here upon questions of constitutional law or practical policy in the administration of the affairs of the Government, or upon the interpretation of the rules established for the government of the House, not in conformity with the convictions of my own judgment and reason, but according to the behests and dictation of party leaders and editors, and for the accomplishment of mere party objects, I should feel that I was sunk into the depths of political prostitution, and the high-minded and intelligent people I represent would feel that I was unworthy to represent them. Just as certainly as (I am proud to say) if they desired a representative such as I have described, they know me well enough to know that I am not their man; I do not believe they ever will wish themselves so represented.

When this question of order was pending a few days ago, by another construction of the rules of the House, made by the Speaker, and sustained by the House, that no debate could be permitted upon a question of order arising incidentally after the previous question had been sustained, the mouth of every man who dissented was closed, and no one allowed to argue against the decision. Sir, this is another invention of the present session; an entire novelty in the practice and order of the House. You know as well as I do, Mr. Speaker, that, on many occasions since you and I have been members of this House, questions of order have been debated, during the administration of both your predecessors, after the previous question had been called on the main question; and it never entered into the imagination of any man to conceive that we could not debate a question of order under the operation of a rule which merely forbids debate upon the main question. I know, sir, that a late Speaker of this House (Mr. Stevenson) considers this decision as an innovation upon the rules and constant practice of the House. At the very last session of Congress, upon an appeal taken by myself from the decision of Mr. Speaker BELL, it was decided upon yeas and nays that it was in order to move a call of the House after the previous question had been demanded. That appeal was debated for hours. You, Mr. Speaker, I believe, as well as myself, took part in that debate. Mr. BELL made that decision, contrary to his own opinion, in compliance with a decision made by Mr. Stevenson at a previous session, when Mr. Stevenson's decision was sustained by a majority of two upon a sort of vote which I always blush to see upon such a question as this—I mean a strictly party vote, with the exception of some seven or eight of those who were called administration men. I was one of that seven or eight, and, on my appeal, as I have before said, the decision was reversed. Mr. Stevenson confined his denial of the right to move a call of the House to the particular stage of a demand of the previous question before it was ascertained whether it was seconded. He expressly admitted it was in order after the motion was seconded, and after it was ordered that the main question should be now put; and, until this session, no man ever questioned that the pendency of the previous question did not preclude debate upon any incidental question of order.

The question decided by Mr. Stevenson was made during the panic session, as it has been called, when parties were divided and classified according to their opinions upon the questions connected with the removal of the deposits. I voted against his decision, because I thought it was wrong; and the fact that almost the entire body of the friends of the administration voted the other way was a matter of mere indifference to me. In so far as I sustained the administration in that struggle, I sustained it because in doing so I was sustaining, as I then thought and now think, the true principles of the constitution and the just authority of the laws; and whenever any measure or measures of this or any other administration shall be, according to my judgment, constitutional and expedient, they will have my support. So far I have sustained this, and will sustain any other administration; and beyond this I have not and will not support any.

Mr. P. further said that he did not flatter himself that he should succeed in persuading the House to reverse its decision. He knew well the effect of the pride of consistency on the minds of gentlemen who have already voted once on the question. In addition to this, he was aware that many gentlemen, especially new members, who were not familiar with the operations of our rules, strongly inclined, as a matter of course, to sustain the decision of the presiding officer, especially when there are any even plausible arguments in support of the decision. He did not complain of this. It was natural; it was right; he felt and acted upon it himself in many cases. He believed that the Speaker knew well that he (Mr. P.) had never desired to embarrass him in the discharge of his arduous and difficult duties; but, on the contrary, that he had on many occasions given him proof of his anxiety to support and sustain him, whenever he could do so. It always gave him much more pleasure to be able to agree with the Speaker than to differ. There were no considerations, personal or political, that prevented him from doing so.

Decision of the Chair.

In addition to other things which prevent me from expecting to reverse the decision of the House now, I apprehend much the effect of the terror of party denunciation. There may be, too, some who think that it is right and justifiable to act upon party grounds on such questions as this. Of course, they, from convictions of party obligation and allegiance, will be wholly inaccessible to the convictions of reason and argument. Besides, sir, I am bound to believe, and do believe, that gentlemen may, from as honest and deliberate a conviction that it is right, as I claim mine to be that it is wrong, adhere to their vote in support of the Speaker's decision.

I will now proceed to show that the decision is erroneous. The question arises under the 28th rule, in these words:

"Every member who shall be in the House when the question is put shall give his vote, unless the House, for special reasons, shall excuse him."

The House is to decide whether the member shall be excused from voting. When shall it so decide? When the question is put, and the member is called on to vote; or when the question is not put, and he is not called on to vote? When, if not excused, his vote may be counted so as to affect the result; or after the question is decided, and, according to established rule, the member cannot vote if he would? Shall it be decided when the question is depending; or when the matter is ended, and there is nothing to be voted on to which the decision upon his application to be excused can apply? Sir, these are only different modes of stating the questions arising upon this appeal; and to state the questions is to indicate the only answers that can be given, and they carry with them the plain refutation of the Speaker's decision, by showing the absurdities to which it leads.

If the question whether the member shall vote is not decided until the result is announced, it is then useless to decide it at all, because the judgment of the House has been entered, the decision of the question is made and recorded, the bill or resolution is passed; and what difference does it then make whether he is excused or not?

Some three or four gentlemen the other day declined voting, and some asked to be excused. Suppose the vote upon the passage of the resolution had been a close one, and that the votes of these gentlemen would decide the question either way, according to the decision of the Speaker, it must be decided that the resolution is passed or is rejected; and then we are to decide whether the House will agree that they shall be excused from voting. Why, sir, according to your decision, they have been permitted not to vote; they have been excused, or rather prevented, from voting, not by the judgment of the House that they shall be excused, but by preventing the House from passing upon the question.

The rule requires every man to vote. There can be no decision of the House until every man bound to vote does vote, or until he peremptorily refuses. A decision of any question, without the vote of every member who is required to vote, is not the decision of the House; and who is bound to vote can only be determined after the House has passed upon the question of excusing every one who asks to be excused.

Suppose that so many members ask to be excused as that those who do vote are less than a quorum—and this is by no means an extreme case, for many questions have been taken this session, when the refusal of very few members would have left less than a quorum. What would you do, then, Mr. Speaker, under your decision? You have a quorum present; you must go on with business; and yet, upon your decision, you could do no business.

In short, sir, the effect of the decision of the Chair is, that no man shall vote who asks to be excused; while the rule is express that every man shall vote unless excused by the House.

But we are met with a precedent. I am not one of those, Mr. Speaker, who allow themselves to be governed by precedent against their own clear convictions of right and reason. I was one of those who stood by this administration in the violent struggle through which we have just passed with the Bank of the United States, which I believe to be unconstitutional, although there were precedents in its favor at various stages of the Government, and by all parties. However, some gentlemen may respect a precedent more than I do, and I will therefore examine this famous precedent, and the manner in which it has been used. After having from one day to another to examine the question, the Speaker, who seems to have some absolution from the rules which are applied to the members on this floor, comes into the House and decides the question, and proceeds to make a speech, in the course of which he refers to this precedent, describes it as a direct authority in favor of the decision he was about to pronounce, and that the course he should take was in conformity to the proceedings of the House in the case of Mr. Adams, in 1832. We, sir, who knew that this precedent was against the Speaker's decision, were gagged. That rule against debating a question of order pending the previous question, which I have before referred to, was rigidly enforced; and the reading even of the journal containing the precedent was not allowed. I dare say some gentlemen voted in favor of the decision of the Chair in consequence of this alleged precedent; and I desire the attention of every man who is really disposed dispassionately to decide this question, and feels himself open to conviction, while I examine this precedent.

It is amazing how any one who had seen and read this journal could come into this House and refer to this case as an authority in favor of the decision of the Chair. He must have seen and known, if he read the journal, that the precedent, or example rather, of the House in 1832, in the case of Mr. Adams, was precisely and exactly a precedent or example against the decision of the Chair. No man shall hereafter pretend the contrary, without being convicted of deliberate misrepresentation.

I read from the journal:

"The previous question having been sustained,

"The main question was then stated from the Chair, viz: Will the House agree to the resolution moved by Mr. Bates, of Maine?

"Whereupon, the Clerk having commenced calling the roll in the order prescribed by the rules of the House, called the name of John Q. Adams; thereupon,

"Mr. Adams asked to be excused from voting on the said resolution, for the reasons assigned in a paper handed to the Clerk, which was read, in the following words: "I ask to be excused from voting on the resolution, believing it to be unconstitutional," &c. &c. [I omit the rest of the reasons.]

"And on the question, Shall Mr. Adams be excused from voting on the question?

"It was decided in the negative.

"The question was then pronounced from the Chair,

H. OF R.]

Decision of the Chair.

[MAY 30, 1836.]

and the Clerk was again ordered to call the roll; and having called the name of John Q. Adams, Mr. Adams said "I decline to answer."

"A motion was made by Mr. Davenport, that the House do reconsider the vote on the application of Mr. Adams to be excused from voting.

"And on the question, Will the House reconsider the said vote?

"It was decided in the negative: Yeas 59, nays 74. [Here follow the yeas and nays, but it is not necessary, of course, to read them.]

"The putting of the said main question was then resumed, and, by direction of the Speaker, the Clerk again called the name of John Q. Adams, and no response being made by Mr. Adams, who was in his seat in the House,

"Mr. Drayton moved the following resolutions, viz:

"Resolved, That John Quincy Adams, a member from Massachusetts, in refusing to vote when his name was called by the Clerk, after the House had rejected his application to be excused from voting for reasons assigned by him, has committed a breach of one of the rules of the House.

"Resolved, That a committee be appointed for the purpose of inquiring and reporting to this House the course which it ought to adopt in a case so novel and important.

"The said resolutions were read; and, after debate thereupon,

"A motion was made by Mr. Wayne, that the further consideration of the said resolutions be postponed until to-morrow; which motion was agreed to.

"And the Clerk proceeded in the call of the roll, on the question to agree to the resolution submitted by Mr. Bates, of Maine."

All this, it is seen, took place after "the Clerk had commenced calling the roll," and before any other name than that of Mr. ADAMS was called. And this is the precedent solemnly quoted by the Chair as in point for his decision that the main question must be decided before the question upon excusing a member shall be submitted to the House.

The resolutions offered by Colonel Drayton having been postponed, I have not examined what became of them, as it does not affect at all the question I am debating, or the question on which I voted the other day, or that now to be decided. Let us proceed with the journal.

"During the call, Mr. Daniel moved to be excused from voting on the question, but his motion was refused by the House; and, thereupon, his name was called, and he gave his vote.

"The name of Elisha Whittlesey being called, he asked to be excused from voting on the question, because the resolution assumes the existence of facts not proven, nor attempted to be proven. His request was also refused by the House; and his name being called, he gave his vote.

"The call having been finished, there appeared for the resolution 93, against it 44.

"And so the House resolved," &c.

Now, sir, it is clear that the decision of the Speaker, so far from being warranted by the proceedings of the House in the case of Mr. ADAMS, is directly in the teeth of that proceeding. That, instead of Mr. ADAMS's application to be excused from voting being postponed until the main question was decided, or even until the roll was called through, it was voted upon by the House immediately upon his asking to be excused. And the House twice solemnly decided that he should not be excused; and his name was solemnly called three times before the calling of the roll was proceeded in. It further appears that, in the case of two other gentlemen who asked to be excused, the question upon excusing them was taken upon each, respectively, as his name was called, and before proceeding in the call.

When Mr. Adams peremptorily refused to vote, there was obviously great difficulty in the House as to what ought to be done. His vote could not be obtained, and then the only thing that could be done was to decide what punishment the House would inflict. This question was postponed to a subsequent period, as it was not at all necessary or proper to postpone the decision of the main question until the recusant member was punished for contumacy. Every allegation or intimation that I have given any vote, or entertained any wish, to embarrass or delay the decision of the House on the slavery question, by interposing a trial of Mr. WISE, or any body else, for refusing to vote, is absolutely and wilfully false. There were three gentlemen who asked to be excused, and it is probable that they [Mr. GLASCOCK, Mr. PICKENS, and Mr. ROBERTSON] would have been excused; or, if not, would have voted. The House has been prevented, by the decision of the Speaker, from deciding what it was their express duty, under the rule, to decide. The gentleman from Georgia, and the other two named, have been deprived of their right to vote, and exempted from the duty of voting, if the House had deemed their reasons for not voting insufficient; and this decision was defended by the Speaker in his remarks, when it was made, exclusively, according to my recollection, on the authority of the precedent in 1832, to which no man was permitted to reply; and now, when the precedent is examined, it contains the plain proof that, in the case of Mr. ADAMS and those of two other gentlemen, the action of the House is in direct conflict with the Speaker's decision, and sustains precisely and exactly the construction of the rule which I voted for.

There is another curious fact in connexion with this decision of the Chair. Whether, upon further reflection, it was found that the precedent would not answer, and that, having served its turn of producing a vote of the House in favor of the Speaker's decision, it would be too much to enter such a reason upon the journal—whether this is so or not I do not know. But certain it is, that this only reason advanced by the Speaker, and for thinking which insufficient the bandogs and bloodhounds of party are let loose to bark at our heels, and fly at our throats, is abandoned by the Speaker himself, and a new reason entered upon the journal. This new reason, after thought of, is, that if the Speaker's decision is reversed, and a contrary practice prevailed, it would be in the power of a few members to arrest the decision of a question; that, in this case, the result could not be varied by the vote of the gentleman; and that it was the duty of the Chair to announce that result, and leave the application to be excused for the future decision of the House. Now, sir, the precedent of 1832 is equally in conflict with this new reason of the Chair. There, the vote upon excusing members who asked to be excused was taken before the Speaker could possibly know whether the result would be affected by the votes of those asking to be excused, and, in point of fact, the result in that case could not be affected, yet the vote was taken before the decision was made.

This reason of the Speaker seems to be the foundation, and to have given countenance to the denunciation of myself and those who voted with me, as the "factious spirits of the House," whose design was to prevent any decision upon the abolition subject, by raising question after question to be excused from voting, ad infinitum—an imputation, I have no doubt, wholly unfounded, and even ludicrously false, in regard to every man who voted against the Speaker's decision. But what sort of a reason is it to be given for construing a rule of the House, even if there were such "factious spirits" in the House? That might be a ground for changing the rule—for abolishing that which existed, and making a new one—but surely it cannot justify the Speaker or the House in violating the existing rule, or giving a construction to it in direct opposition to its letter and spirit, and to the practice of the House on a former occasion. This argument, if it must be called an argument, proceeds upon the assumption that there are, or may be, members in this House factious enough, or foolish enough, or vile enough, to raise question after question, and to hang one question upon another, for no other purpose than to prevent a decision. If such a temper existed with any number of members, or even any one member, you cannot prevent such a result by your decision. I will prove to you, and in a way which you cannot deny, that, if there be one single member who is wicked and factious enough to pursue such a course, he can prevent you from taking the question, even after the previous question has been ordered; and this, too, only by making motions, which are undoubtedly in order, from day to day until the end of the session. Suppose the previous question ordered: the member gets up and moves that the House adjourn; you must put the question; it is decided against him; he then moves a call of the House, which he has a right to do, as solemnly settled by the House last session; it is decided against him. He then moves to lay the subject on the table, which you have repeatedly admitted this session to be in order; it is decided against him. He then moves again to adjourn, and goes through the same circle of questions ad infinitum. You cannot prevent him as long as the rules remain unchanged, and he remains a member. All the motions I have stated are clearly in order; how long they will be allowed to remain so, God only knows. It is as easy to repeal them by a decision of the Chair as it has been to repeal the right to debate questions of order, or the rule which requires every member to vote unless excused. None of our rules are framed upon the presumption of there being members disposed so grossly to abuse their privileges. And the possibility of such abuse, or the actual fact of abuse, can never justify you in depriving a member of rights secured to him by the existing rules, though you may change the rule or punish the member for shamefully annoying the House under a perverted use of his privileges. Sir, this notion about a few members being able to prevent a decision being a reason in support of the Speaker's decision, is a mere pretext, having no force in sound reasoning, and no foundation in fact, in regard to the particular case to which it was applied. If such a disposition had existed, it could have been gratified in several ways, within the rules of order. That no such means were resorted to, of itself falsifies the gross and wanton imputation made upon those who voted against the Speaker's decision.

I regret that I have felt myself compelled, in vindication of myself from the denunciation to which I have been exposed, to renew this question. I could in no other way sustain my opinions in argument. The making of this motion may be made the ground of new imputations of a factious spirit. They may be made with full as much truth as those already indulged in. This motion, too, will afford an opportunity to those who were misled in the former vote, and are now satisfied of their error, to do homage to truth and reason, and manifest their firmness and independence, and their scorn of party denunciation and partisan dictation.

I have another word to say. Those of us who voted against the decision of the Chair have been charged with doing so for the purpose of keeping open and preventing the settlement of the abolition subject. The falsehood of this imputation is notorious to every man in this House, so far as I am concerned. I have differed with the majority of this House as to the best means of disposing of the questions that have arisen. I believe that the course which has been pursued is a substantial surrender of the rights and security from attack of the Southern country on that subject. The outworks of our defences have been given up to the abolitionists, and the door is left open through which, one day or other, the citadel itself will, I fear, be dangerously assailed. But the majority thought otherwise. I make no imputation upon their motives; time will show whose course was most wise. And as to the particular imputation, that I wished, by voting against the decision of the Chair, to reopen the question, to keep up excitement, it is shown to be wantonly and shamefully gratuitous by the fact that, on the very day when that question was taken, I made two distinct motions for the express purpose of disposing of the subject, and ending it finally on that day. First, I moved to suspend the rules to go on with it when the orders of the day were called; and afterwards, when a gentleman from New York had made a motion which would only have postponed the questions as to these gentlemen who had declined voting for a few days, I asked him to yield me the floor for the purpose of moving a postponement until the 1st day of August—in other words, an indefinite postponement.

Thus it is that the motives and conduct of members on this floor may be misrepresented and perverted by those who are under no restraint from either truth or decency.*

The SPEAKER stated the grounds of his decision to the House, substantially to the following effect:

In giving his decision on a former day, when the same question of construction of the rules, now raised, was first brought to the notice of the House, he had stated a case which might arise, as an illustration of what would be the practical operation of the rules, under a contrary decision from that which he had given. The case supposed, for the purpose of illustration merely, was not applied to any members of the House, as seemed to have been inferred; and it was due no less to the House than to himself that he should seize the opportunity to disclaim (and he took great pleasure in doing so) any intention of having imputed improper motives to any honorable members of that honorable body. He did not say on that occasion, nor did he mean to be understood as saying, that any members of that honorable House were factious, or would be influenced by any other than proper motives, and their own sense of public duty. He was endeavoring to show simply that, under a decision contrary to that which he had made, the effect might be (he did not say it would be) to suspend, if not to put a stop to, the transaction of the public business. He had also, in giving that decision, referred to the case which had occurred in 1832, as he now referred to it, for the single purpose of showing that, in that case, the vote of the House was declared, and the decision made upon the question pending before it, without the vote of the member who did not vote, and who asked to be excused.

Decision of the Chair.

[Mr. ADAMS here asked, if the Speaker was going on to argue that precedent, if he could be permitted to answer?]

The Speaker proceeded to examine the precedent, and to state the proceedings in the case, as they appeared on the journal, to show that the House, without the vote of the member who had asked to be excused, (and though his request to be excused from voting had been refused,) did, notwithstanding, proceed to call the roll through, and pronounce the decision. In that case, the decision of the House was declared upon a very important question—a question of no less importance than a resolution declaring that one of the members of the House “merited the decided censure of the House;” and yet, if the true construction of the rule be that every member who is present when a vote is taken, must either vote or be excused from voting, before a decision can be had, no decision could have been pronounced in that case. It appeared, further, from the journal, that, after the votes of the members who had given their votes had been declared, and the decision of the House been made on the question before it, on the next day the case of the member who had not voted was the subject of consideration, and resolutions which had been introduced upon the subject were, by a vote of the House, laid on the table, and there the matter ended. He had cited this case (the only one of the kind, he believed, which had ever occurred) for the single purpose of showing that, in the opinion of the House of Representatives of that Congress, it was not necessary for every member present to “give his vote, unless the House, for special reasons, shall excuse him,” in order to enable the House to decide the question before it, upon the votes of the majority of the House who did give their votes. It was to establish this point alone that he had referred to this case. The rule is silent as to the time at which the member shall be excused; if he “shall be in the House when the question is put,” he “shall give his vote, unless the House, for special reasons, shall excuse him.” But the time at which his case shall be considered is left in the discretion of the House. It is competent for the House, if he has committed a violation of the rules of the House, to pass his name, and consider his case subsequently.

The case he had stated on a former occasion, and now repeated, (for the purpose of illustration,) as one that might arise, was this: Suppose the House to be dividing, and the vote taking on the bill, or other propositions before it, and pending the call of the yeas and nays, and before the vote is announced, a member refuses to vote, or declines voting, and asks to be excused; must the House, in such case, suspend the calling of the yeas and nays, stop in the middle of the roll, when half the members have voted, and half have not, and arrest the decision on the question before it, until it can decide on the case of the member who has not voted? Or if the roll be permitted to be called through, must the decision, as ascertained by the votes given, be suspended, until the House can decide on the case of the member who has not voted? If this be the true construction of the rule, it may be that no decision could ever be had on the main question; for on the question to excuse a member from voting, or to take order in his case, if he refuse to vote, debate may arise, and, after discussion, and possibly great delay, the House may proceed to vote by yeas and nays on the question of excusing him from voting, or to coerce him to vote; and whilst the House are dividing, and pending the call of the yeas and nays on this question, and before the result of the vote is announced, a second member may refuse to vote on that question, or decline voting, or ask to be excused. And so, if this construction of the rule be correct, the proceedings of the House must be again suspended, and the decision arrested upon the case of the first member who refused or declined to vote, until the question can be settled in the case of the second member who did not vote on the question of excusing the first; and so upon the question of excusing the second member from voting, a third member may not vote, and ask to be excused, and the proceedings of the House must be again suspended, and the decision on the case of the second member who has not voted be arrested until a question be taken in relation to the third member who has not voted; and thus, upon each successive case of members who may not choose to vote when their names are called, the same thing may occur, and there may be no possibility of ever deciding any question, however important, so long as any one member may decline or refuse to vote, and the business of the House may be thus utterly obstructed and stopped, and this, too, though the votes of the members who may not have voted could not, if given, change the result; as, for example, in the first case in which this question arose on a former day, where the votes given by the members who did vote stood yeas 182, noes 9; and as in the present case, where the votes given on the question now before the House, as ascertained by the Clerk, and communicated to the Speaker, though not formally announced to the House, show that the vote of the member who has not voted, and asks to be excused, cannot, if given, change the result. (The state of the vote, as subsequently announced to the House, was yeas 123, noes 54.) The same difficulty would arise if, in the midst of a division of the House, (by yeas and nays, or otherwise,) the proceedings were arrested, to enable the House to pass a vote of censure, or otherwise punish a member, instead of stopping to take the vote on excusing him. If any one member present declined to vote, and asked to be excused, on the question to censure, or otherwise punish, no decision could be had until the case of him who had declined to vote on the question was settled, and his case, again, could never be settled so long as any one member declined to vote on the question of excusing him. And so, if this be the true construction of the rule, no decision could ever be made on any question, so long as any two members shall alternately decline to vote on each successive question of excusing or coercing each other to vote.

This was the case he had stated by way of illustration, when this question had first arisen. He had stated it for the purpose of showing what would be the practical effect of a decision contrary to that which he had given. He had given it simply as an illustration, and without any intention of imputing improper motives to any member of the House.

And he respectfully submitted whether a construction which may lead to such a result can be the proper construction of that rule of the House which declares that every member present shall vote, unless, for sufficient reasons, he shall be excused by the House? The rules of the House were intended to promote and to facilitate, and not to defeat, the transaction of public business; and, in his opinion, such a construction was to be given to them as would attain the end for which they were framed. It was a common occurrence, in taking the vote by yeas and nays, or by dividing the House, for members to remain silent in their seats, and not give their votes; and yet it had been the immemorial usage, and was now the daily practice, to proceed with the vote and pronounce the decision, as ascertained by the count of those who have voted, without making any question in relation to the members who have not voted. The names of those who do not answer are passed silently by. Is the case at all changed by the fact that a member, instead of remaining silent in his seat, and suffering his name to be passed, rises in his place, and informs the House that he is present and has not voted? The member who remains silent, and suffers his name to be passed, has violated the rule as much as he who rises and informs the House that he is present, and has not voted. In the former case, the daily practice is to proceed with the vote and declare the decision; the House takes no cognizance of the case. He may have doubts on the question, and not be prepared to vote, or he may have sufficient reasons, and may not choose to trouble the House with them; and yet he as much violates the rule as the member who informs the House he has not voted.

Decision of the Chair.

These rules, which are the laws of the House, are to be construed as a whole, and so as to give effect to each one of them. One of the rules of the House, for example, provides that "a motion to adjourn shall be always in order;" and yet none will maintain that, whilst the House is in the act of dividing, and a question is taken by yeas and nays, it would be in order for a member, when his name is called for his vote, ay or no, to rise in his place, and interrupt or arrest the further vote of the House, by moving that the House adjourn. None will maintain that the motion to adjourn at this stage, though declared by the rule, in absolute and unqualified terms, to "be always in order," could be entertained until after the vote of the House on the question on which they are in the act of voting is completed, and the decision pronounced. So another rule of the House declares that "it shall be in order for the Committee on Enrolled Bills to report at any time;" and yet none will maintain that it would be in order for a member of that committee to rise in the midst of a vote by yeas and nays, and arrest the vote of the House by making a report, which report, if made at that time, must stop the vote of the House until it was disposed of. And so the rule under consideration could not have contemplated that a vote of the House on a division, by yeas and nays, could be arrested until the House could take cognizance of the case of a member refusing to vote, or asking to be excused from voting. The rule provides that he shall give his vote, if he be not excused, but it is silent as to the time when his excuse shall be considered. He was clear that such a question could not be interposed pending a division of the House. From the reason as well as the necessity of the case, he had decided on a former occasion, and now decided, that the vote of the House, on a division by yeas and nays, could not be interrupted or arrested by interposing any other question; but that the vote, when commenced, must proceed, and the decision be had; leaving it at the discretion of the House to settle or take order upon any other question which may incidentally arise, at such time as may suit its pleasure or convenience. The decision he had made on a former occasion, and now made, was conformable to these views, and for the convenience of the House, and was, in his judgment, the only practical construction which could be given to the rules, to enable the House, without great embarrassment and delay, to despatch the public business.

He had felt an anxious solicitude to decide the question properly; and at the same time, if possible, to meet the views of the House, and aid himself in forming a correct judgment, he had, before he had given the decision on the question, when it first arose, taken the opinion of several members of the House, of different political parties, all of whom had concurred with him in opinion that the decision which he subsequently gave was the only practical construction which could be given to these rules that would enable the House to accomplish the objects for which they were framed. The House had, when the question was first raised, sustained the decision; but if, on reconsideration, or more full examination, it should now come to a different conclusion, he would take great pleasure in conforming to their will.

He felt sensibly the weight of responsibility which devolved on the presiding officer of the House. Difficulties, growing out of the complexity as well as the vague and uncertain terms in which many of the rules adopted for the government of the House are couched, were constantly arising. New and delicate as well as difficult and very important questions of order were often raised, upon which it was his duty to decide. His opinions were, however, subject to the revision and correction of the House; and if the House differed from him in opinion upon this or any other occasion, they will so declare, and he would most cheerfully yield to their decision, and promptly execute their will.

In the present case he was of opinion that the decision he had made on a former occasion, and now made, was correct, and for the convenience of the House, and he unhesitatingly adhered to it; but if the House thought otherwise, they would sustain the appeal, and he should as unhesitatingly execute their will.

Mr. CALHOUN, of Massachusetts, said he voted the other day to sustain the decision of the Speaker, because he saw no better way to expedite the business of the House; but he wished to state some difficulties in the manner of doing the business of the House which arose from the frequent use of the previous question. The previous question is called, and, upon a decision of the Chair involving a point of order, a gentleman rises to debate; the previous question is construed as applying to the point of order, and the House is compelled to settle the question in a moment, without the slightest consideration or debate. He would appeal to gentlemen if it was possible for them to decide understandingly. How could they bring their minds to a decision? How could they reason to a conclusion? He would ask if they were willing that the decisions they made should stand as precedents on the journal, to be appealed to at succeeding sessions, and forever, as the deliberate decisions of the House? He knew the decision had been made; but was it on good reasons, deliberately examined? He contended that the previous question did not cut off debate upon a question of order, but that the rule applied only to the main question; and he read the rule in the Manual, which says that incidental questions may arise for which no rules can be provided, such as questions of order, which must be decided as they arise. The only question is, how shall they be decided? Shall a conclusion be jumped at, without argument or consideration?

Mr. C. then read the rule which says that, on appeals upon questions of order, "no member shall speak more than once, unless by leave of the House." This (said Mr. C.) is equivalent to a direct declaration that a member may speak once, and that each member is so entitled to speak. This is another rule which must be transgressed, if the House maintains the decision of the Chair upon the point referred to; and he would say, if the House adhered to this rule, then, on an appeal upon a question of order, be it when it may, or what it may, debate must be permitted. The only questions of order not always debatable were such as arose upon questions of decorum, and Mr. C. read a part of the 21st rule: "If any member, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call to order; in which case, the member so called to order shall immediately sit down, unless permitted to explain; and the House shall, if appealed to, decide on the case, but without debate." Here the distinction was in regard to decorum and debate. The rule came under that head, and related only to the order and courtesies of decorum and debate, as regulated by the rules of the House. Upon all other questions of order, every one may debate; and he would ask if freedom of thought and of speech was to be cut off upon important decisions of the Speaker, merely because the previous question was depending? There was no more perfect tyranny than would exist under such a construction of the rules. It was tyranny of the worst kind, if he could be compelled to vote without an opportunity to think, and thus to form an opinion. He did vote to sustain the Speaker's decision in the instance last week, which was similar to the present, because he saw no more convenient mode of settling the matter before the House. It is not usual for members to ask to be excused from voting, especially without being excused at once. The only precedent to the contrary was the distinguished one of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.]

By the rule, every man is compelled to vote one way or the other, unless for special reasons he is excused; but he is not compelled to violate his conscience. No man can suppose that a member should be forced to vote when, according to his convictions, he ought not to vote either way; and if he says he cannot conscientiously vote, then is he to be excused. Such a course, thus open and manly, is entitled to peculiar favor, when contrasted with one which is not unfrequent—the retiring outside the bar of the House, or sitting in one's seat without answering at all. In the former case, the mere asking to be excused constitutes, in my apprehension, the special reason contemplated in the rule. No gentleman surely would rise in his place and decline voting, in the presence of the House and of the country, unless the reasons operating upon his mind were of the most imposing and controlling character. If, however, a member declares that he will not vote; if he throws defiance at the House, he is to be met with its rules, and dealt with as the House may deem proper.

Mr. C. then alluded to the obnoxious attacks upon members of the House, made in the Government paper by the official printer of the House, and which had been commented upon by the member from Virginia [Mr. PATTON] with so much spirit and intelligence. He said this was not the first instance in which members had been arraigned for acting according to their convictions of duty. A number of gentlemen the other day were arraigned, because they dissented from a decision of the Speaker, as factious, as opposed to the rules of the House, and opposed to order here and every where. His name was not among them, but he looked with shuddering upon that attack upon the character of the members, and upon the freedom of action in the House. He alluded to this attack, because it appeared in the organ of the executive Government; and this was what gave it importance. He would ask, if it was to be allowed that members of the House, for performing conscientiously and independently their duty here, were to be hung up by an officer of the House, paid by its treasurer, as factious disorganizers, and that the charge was to be conveyed all over the country, and to all other countries with which we have intercourse? The members were required by every sense of duty to act upon their own judgment, however much they might differ in opinion with the Speaker; and the publisher of this atrocious assault upon the members ought to be reprimanded. He is an officer of the House, and should come under its control in such respects as this. He spoke as a citizen of the country, not as a member of a party; upon such a subject he belonged to no party; he spoke for the dignity, and character, and purity of the House, and he would not allow such an outrage to pass over in silence. When the time shall have arrived when the members of the House are to be denounced by their official organ, for thinking freely, and acting according to their judgment, let them know it. If the time has not arrived, let them reprimand the offender who has perpetrated the outrage. He would say again that he spoke as an independent man, free from party prejudices; and he called upon the House to stop this annoyance, which would continue and increase unless the House applied the proper remedy.

Mr. LANE said as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. PATTON] had no difficulty in voting on the question to suspend the rules, and as he merely desired to bring up the same question which was decided the other day, it could not be productive of any good to continue the discussion upon the appeal; he therefore moved that it be laid on the table.

Mr. ADAMS appealed to the gentleman to withdraw his motion, as, from reasons personal to himself, he desired to make a few remarks upon the appeal.

Mr. LANE declined withdrawing his motion.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and the Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JENIFER, of Maryland, having declined to vote on the motion to lay Mr. PATTON's appeal from the decision of the Speaker on the table, he moved to be excused, and the Speaker decided that his motion to be excused should be postponed until after he announced the vote of the House on the appeal of Mr. PATTON; and that the vote of the House on a question could be declared before the members declining or refusing to vote were either excused from voting, or the penalty for refusing or declining to vote was enforced by the House. From this decision

Mr. WISE appealed, and proceeded to remark that he, with others, had been denounced by the official paper as a factious spirit, and had been denominated an "anarch," for refusing, on a former occasion, to vote on the resolutions reported by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] and for voting against the decision of the Speaker then made, to postpone the excuses of members refusing or declining to vote until after the vote of the House was declared by the Chair. He said he felt bound to vindicate himself and his friends from the charge of a factious spirit extending to anarchy. He had been denounced as an "anarch" in an opprobrious sense; but in the literal meaning of the word, applied properly to the occasion of his vote, he claimed the honor of having been an "anarch," and gloried in pleading guilty to the charge. What is the meaning of "anarch"? It must mean, literally, one who denied the power of the Government, in the case referred to: one who said and voted that the General Government was "without power to affirm or deny any proposition in relation to slavery in the States, and one who denied the power of Congress to govern slave property any where." In that sense, he was an "anarch," and in no factious spirit he refused to vote on the resolutions of the select committee on slavery. He respectfully sent his reasons to the Speaker, at the time he refused, in writing. He thought that if one Congress might deny its power over slavery in the States, a subsequent Congress, not bound by the acts of this House, might affirm the power which we now deny; and he refused, peremptorily and positively refused, to vote on questions which Congress itself had no power to vote upon, either to affirm or to deny. He could not, consistently, do otherwise than positively refuse to vote, and did not ask to be excused, because, in his comprehension, the petition to be excused admitted the right in the House to compel him to vote upon a proposition which the House itself had no power to entertain. He conscientiously entertained these opinions, and, as courteously as his sense of duty to the constitution and his constituents permitted, he expressed them by his refusal to vote, and by his written reasons for so doing.

[Here Mr. HAMER, of Ohio, called Mr. WISE to order. The Speaker deciding Mr. W. to be in order, he proceeded to say]—

That, in another sense, he was an “anarch.” He was against a Government of corruption! This was his high offence; he was opposed to the “powers that be” creating those which are to be, and the perpetuation of a spoils-party Government. He desired, in the revolutionary sense, to be without such a Government as the infamous Globe is now laboring to entail upon the country.

The decision of the Chair was obviously, to his mind, erroneous. The constitution and the 28th rule of the House settled the question. The first declares “that a majority of each [House] shall constitute a quorum to do business,” and “each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behaviour, and, with the concurrence of two thirds, expel a member.” The latter declares, “every member who shall be in the House when the question is put, shall give his vote, unless the House, for special reasons, shall excuse him.” He put the question, then, whether the House can be said to have voted until “every member in the House shall have given his vote, or shall have been, for special reasons,” excused. If the House has not voted, how can any vote of the House—House in its technical sense, as understood by the constitution—the House composed of “every member in it when the question is put”—be declared? He contended that no decision had yet been made on the resolutions of the slavery committee, because the House had not voted on them, for the reason that every member present had not voted, and many had refused to vote. If a member sat silent, he ordinarily, without a call of yeas and nays, or a count, gave a tacit vote. If a count was called, or the yeas and nays, and he sat silent, if not reported for failing to vote, he was usually considered absent, though in the eye of the Clerk.

But when he refused to vote, and actually announced his presence by refusal, the rule says he shall vote. Vote upon what? A question decided, or a question pending? The Chair says, by its decision, he shall vote upon a question decided. What is the consequence? Suppose a bill passes the House by a majority of one, three members refusing to vote. After a vote of the majority of one is declared and announced as the decision of the House, you compel the three refusing members to vote. They vote against the bill or resolution: the act has passed, then, with a majority of two against it in the House! Ay, but would gentlemen tell him that it is not the vote which was postponed, but the excuse? They could not thus reason, because the rule said it was the vote which shall be given; and if the refusing member cannot vote after the decision declared, you cannot punish him for not voting after decision. When a member refuses to vote, he has three alternatives presented; he may ask to be excused for a special reason; he may offer no excuse, and incur the penalty; or, rather than incur the penalty, if his excuse be not received, or he offers none, he may purge himself of the “disorderly behaviour” by voting. But, according to the Speaker’s decision, he must be excused or punished, and he cannot vote when the rule says he shall vote or be excused. He asked what the reason of the decision was? Solely, the reason of inconvenience. In the first place, he said, the inconvenience of the rule proved the existence of the rule; and no “argumentum ab inconvéniente” could destroy the rule itself. The remedy for inconvenience was to abolish or to modify the rule. But did the reason of inconvenience exist? True, to some extent, whenever a member refused, there would be delay; but the House, or a majority, could at once, by aid of the previous question, soon despatch the question of excuse, or pardon, or punishment; and that was the easiest and most convenient mode of despatching every difficulty or inconvenience in the case. Here was an illustration of the truth of this position. According to the Speaker’s decision, the majority is in the power of the minority; which, if it be given to that factious spirit of which it is accused, can delay the decision of the House ad infinitum by repeated refusals to vote and repeated appeals from the Speaker’s decisions! He said, in fact, that such decisions were well calculated to arouse a spirit of just and indignant resistance in the minds and conduct of those who were oppressed by their tyranny. He had, in the conscientious discharge of his duty, and with the sincerest regard to the highest supremacy of the rules of order, refused to vote, and no power on earth could have forced his tongue to vote away all protection of slaveholding interests. No! He defied the arm of civil power of the Sergeant-at-arms of the House, and all the terrors of the standing army of a military despotism, if it should be attempted, to make his tongue speak traitorously to his constituents; he would, without courting, have suffered and exulted in martyrdom! He had been denounced as a factious spirit, as every man was likely to be, by the minions of power, who had the independence and patriotism to resist their tyranny, expose their abuses, and denounce their prostitution. He was glad that he had at last the companionship of his worthy and truly honorable colleague, [Mr. PARROT.] The Globe had classed the forty-six factious spirits into two classes—Harrison men and abolitionists, and White men and nullifiers. It was obvious here were four, instead of two denominations of persons; but the Globe made out denominations to suit its slanders. He would remark there were Harrison men who were not abolitionists, and many abolitionists who were not Harrison or White men; and there were nullifiers who were White men—no nullifiers were abolitionists; and White men who were not nullifiers—and no White men or nullifiers were abolitionists. He should not condescend to notice the Globe, but the majority here seem to make it their mouth-piece; the freedom of debate lies prostrate under the “previous question,” and the Globe speaks “by authority” for that high power before which all the dignity and freedom of this House have been, long ago, made to bow low—low in the dust!

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, spoke in opposition to the decision of the Chair, and condemned the unwarrantable classification of his name in the article in the Globe. He noticed this because the fact of the editors of the Globe being the printers of the House gave that paper an authority it was not otherwise entitled to. On the subject of the presidency, no man living knew his preference; but he indignantly repelled the charge made against him in the Globe of being an anarchist and revolutionist. He should, when the time arrived, vote for whom he pleased, and should not suffer himself to be driven from what he considered right, by the abuse and slang of a newspaper. He had done nothing during the present session in the slightest degree to retard or obstruct the business of the House, nor had he raised a single point of order. On the abolition memorials he had, until the formation of the select committee, in every instance voted to lay them on the table. Nor had he once refused to vote, or dodged any question. On several occasions he had sustained the decisions of the Chair, and should continue to do so, whenever he thought them right. For that gentleman he had voted, and his reasons were conscientious and satisfactory to himself for preferring him as the presiding officer of the House. The editor of the Globe had no right to denounce him as a "factious spirit or anarchist," nor to classify him with "White men and nullifiers."

Decision of the Chair.

[MAY 30, 1836.]

Mr. HARD called for the orders of the day.

The CHAIR decided that the question of order took precedence, and must first be settled.

Mr. SPEIGHT remarked that it was the misfortune of members of Congress to be visited by the "slang twang" of newspapers, and he would refer them to the columns of the Intelligencer and United States Telegraph, when the editors of those papers were respectively printers to the House, and the party to which Mr. S. belonged were in the minority. Mr. S. then proceeded to show that the decision of the Chair was right, and referred to the circumstance of the precedent cited by the Speaker in support of that position.

Mr. BELL spoke in favor of an enforcement of the rules of the House. He cited the rule, that members shall vote unless, for special reasons, they are excused by a vote of the House, and said that this rule ought to be enforced, and that the decision of the Speaker would have to be reversed, because the time might, and probably would, come, when the order of the House would be broken up by a factious minority. He then referred to the power given in the constitution to enable the House to regulate its own proceedings, to punish members, and by a vote of two thirds to expel a member. He said, in the case supposed, where members might embarrass the proceedings, this power should be exercised; and after one or two factious or contumacious persons had been expelled, others would be cautious how they refused to vote, except for good and sufficient reasons.

Mr. SPANGLER said: I desire to say a few words in explanation of my opinion on the question before the House. A vote has been ordered to be taken by ayes and noes. The Clerk has proceeded with the call, and a number of gentlemen have answered to their names. The gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. JENIFER,] on his name being called, rose in his place, and moved that he be excused from voting. The Chair entertained the motion, but decided "that before the question can be taken on excusing, the vote of the House on the pending question must be finished, and the decision thereon announced." From this decision the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] has appealed; and the question is, "shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?" Sir, said Mr. S., I am for sustaining the Chair; I think the decision clearly right. Should we reverse it, and establish the contrary rule, much inconvenience might follow; and indeed it might be found impossible to transact the business of the House. The question is a new one, and is attended with difficulties. Our object should be to settle it in such a manner as to avoid, as far as possible, embarrassment and confusion. The vote of the House by ayes and noes is but one vote, though there are two hundred and forty members; and, upon parliamentary principles, is precisely the same as the vote by acclamation. They are identical. If the rule required that a member should assign his reasons for being excused from voting, when the vote is taken by acclamation, the only time, of course, when he could assign them, would be when the question was propounded by the Speaker; and, therefore, that is the time that he should ask to be excused when the vote is taken by ayes and noes, because, in strict parliamentary construction, the vote by acclamation and the vote by ayes and noes are one and the same; though it is physically impossible to take the latter in the same manner with the former.

It is maintained by those who oppose the decision of the Chair, that if motions of gentlemen to be excused from voting be postponed until after the House has decided the main question before it, and then, should the House refuse to excuse them from voting, they might prefer voting to incurring the penalty of refusing; and thus might vote on a question that had already been decided, and thereby reverse the former decision; and this, say gentlemen, would introduce much confusion. It is further said that the discussion of the excuses offered by gentlemen might occupy several days; and if they were not excused, and thereupon choose to vote, they might change by their votes the decision made on a previous day. Sir, said Mr. S., these are difficulties; and if we can avoid them without running into others equally embarrassing on the other side, we certainly should do so. But, sir, suppose we reverse the Speaker's decision—suppose we establish it as a part of the lex parlamentaria, that "after the call of the ayes and noes has commenced, and a part of the members have answered to their names and voted, a gentleman, on his name being called, may answer by moving to be excused from voting, and that that motion must be decided before the vote of the House on the main question is gone through with," what consequences may result from such a proceeding? Let us carry it out for a moment. If one gentleman may claim this as a right, so may others. A vote by ayes and noes is commenced. Part of the members, on their names being called, have answered and voted. The vote of the House is in part taken; and at this stage of the proceeding, a gentleman, on his name being called, moves to be excused from voting, and proceeds to assign his reasons. He goes into an argument on the merits—yes, sir, the merits of the main question before the House, by way of proving that he cannot conscientiously vote on it, either in the affirmative or negative, no jurisdiction; that it involves the exercise of power. He may urge that it is a subject over which Congress has not conferred by the constitution; that the subject, though within the constitutional power of Congress, is of a nature so delicate and dangerous, that its agitation will only tend to excite and inflame the public mind. These, and many other topics of discussion, may be introduced by gentlemen as considerations which ought to operate to excuse them from voting.

Well, sir, other gentlemen, differing in opinion from these, will of course answer them, or at least may answer them; and thus, after the vote of the House has been in part taken, a debate on the merits of the main question may arise, extending throughout several days. At last a decision is had on the motion to be excused. The name of the gentleman next on the list is called, and he moves to be excused from voting; and he also assigns his reasons; a debate again ensues, and after one or more days spent in discussing his excuses, a decision is had. The Clerk then calls the name of the next gentleman, and he wishes to be excused, and a debate again ensues. Sir, where is it to end? and if this mode of proceeding be established, how long may the House be occupied in taking a vote on the main question? Sir, so far as I can discover, weeks or months might be consumed in calling the ayes and noes on a single proposition.

Again: During this time, what sort of a journal would your proceedings present? On the first day the ayes and noes are called through the A's; on the second, through the B's; on the third day, through the C's; and so on to the end of the alphabet, requiring as many days as there are letters. If such were in fact the proceedings of the House, I ask gentlemen, in all candor, whether they would be willing to have them spread upon the journals?

MAY 30, 1836.]

Decision of the Chair.

Again: Suppose the previous question had been ordered, how will its operation be affected by such a proceeding? Every gentleman knows that the previous question is intended to cut off all further debate on the main question; but the principle contended for might render it a nullity, and in effect entirely abrogate it. Suppose the previous question to be ordered by the House. The Clerk is calling the ayes and noes on the main question. A gentleman, on his name being called, moves to be excused from voting. He proceeds to assign his reason; and it is, that the 36th rule of the House, which authorizes the previous question, is unconstitutional, as tending to abridge the liberty of speech. Sir, I am no advocate for the frequent use of the previous question; but I would ask to what length might not such a discussion extend? Again: A gentleman moves that he be excused from voting. After hearing his excuse, and debating it, it is ordered that the vote on excusing be taken by ayes and noes; and on that question, another gentleman, on his name being called, moves to be excused from voting; and after a debate on his motion to be excused, the vote is ordered to be taken by ayes and noes; and, while the Clerk is calling the names, another gentleman asks that he be excused. Sir, where is it to end? when is it to end?

The question arises, how are we to steer clear of these difficulties? How are we to transact the public business without entangling ourselves in the meshes of our own rules? To me the question is free from embarrassment—the path is direct and plain. The 28th rule of the House says: "Every member who shall be in the House when the question is put shall give his vote, unless the House, for special reasons, shall excuse him." When may he ask to be excused? I answer, at any time before the Clerk has commenced calling the ayes and noes, but not after. A gentleman may ask to be excused from voting when it is in order to do so, but at no other time. We ought so to construe and apply our rules that they may harmonize and conduce to the easy and convenient transaction of business. The 34th rule provides that "a motion to adjourn shall always be in order." Yes, sir, "always in order;" but who ever dreamed that it was in order, under this rule, to move an adjournment pending the call of the ayes and noes, or while a gentleman has the floor, unless he expressly yields it for that purpose?

Again: The call of the ayes and noes occupies about half an hour. After the expiration of the morning hour, it is in order, even pending the consideration or discussion of reports from committees and resolutions, to move "that the House do now proceed to dispose of the business on the Speaker's table, and to the orders of the day, (see rule 17.)" Yet if the morning happens to expire, as it frequently does, pending the call of the ayes and noes on questions pertaining to morning hour business, who ever thought of interrupting the vote by interposing a motion "that the House do now proceed to dispose of the business on the Speaker's table, and to the orders of the day?"

Again: After the previous question is ordered, a motion for a call of the House is in order; so is a motion to lay the main question on the table; so is a motion to adjourn. And each of these motions may be made again and again, one after the other, at any time between the call of the previous question and the commencement of the call of the ayes and noes. But every gentleman knows that, after the call of the ayes and noes is commenced, no motion is in order until after the decision of the main question. Is it, then, consistent with the general scope and spirit of the rules I have cited, that, after the previous question has been ordered, and after the ayes and noes are commenced, and when no one of the privileged motions can be interposed, yet another motion may be made—must be entertained and decided—which may involve in its consideration a protracted debate on the merits of the main question? Yes, sir, which may present as wide a field for discussion as was open to gentlemen the first moment the main subject was taken up in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Sir, I can sanction no construction of rules that leads to such results. I believe that it might lead in its consequences to endless confusion and interruption of the business of the House. To avoid this, I would so construe the 28th rule as to require that gentlemen ask to be excused from voting before the commencement of the call of the ayes and noes. "Every member who shall be in the House when the question is put shall give his vote, unless the House, for special reasons, shall excuse him." When, in the language of the rule, "is the question put?" It is put when the Chair propounds it to the House. Then is the time for gentlemen to ask to be excused, if they do not wish to vote. The calling of the ayes and noes by the Clerk is not putting the question. He puts no question to the House, and he cannot call the names of the members until after the Chair has put the question. My opinion is, that a motion to be excused from voting ought not to be entertained after the call of the ayes and noes has been commenced; and that, if entertained, its consideration and decision should be postponed until after the pending question is decided, and the decision announced to the House; and I shall so vote.

Mr. ADAMS made and enforced the point, that the rule says the member shall give his vote "when the question is put;" and as it is put to each member, when his name is called, then is the time for him to vote or ask to be excused, and give his reasons. Such, he contended, was the rule, and if inconvenience should arise, the rule could be changed; and he then referred to his own case in 1832, the principles of which he explained to be exactly the reverse of that assumed by the Speaker. The House did not then pass over the name, but did vote upon the request to excuse, and refused it; and then resolutions were offered and postponed, declaring that he had committed a breach of the rules, and ordering the appointment of a committee to ascertain what measures the House should take. The course now adopted, he said, was a practical nullification of the rule, and the House really had no rule upon the subject.

Mr. BOON said, if editors of newspapers were the contemptible creatures represented by members of the House, he thought it improper, if not evincing a want of dignity, to reply to their remarks upon that floor. If they were entirely worthless, why did gentlemen condescend to reply to them there? For one, he would not do so. If he were assailed in this way, he would, if he deemed it necessary, redress the grievance elsewhere. After the learned dissertation which they had just heard from the gentleman from Massachusetts, he humbly conceived that they had had glory enough for the public service for one day, in discussing editorial paragraphs and the subject of a member sitting in his seat and refusing or declining to vote; he therefore moved the previous question.

The previous question was seconded by the House: Yeas 75, nays 46; and the main question was ordered to be put without a count.

The main question, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?" was decided in affirmative: Yeas 108, nays 61.

The CHAIR then announced the vote on the motion of Mr. JANE to lay the appeal of Mr. PATTON on the table; which was: Yeas 98, nays 91.

The CHAIR also announced the vote on the motion of Mr. CRAIG to suspend the rules till one o'clock, in order to fix a day for the consideration of the deposit bill, (pending which motion Mr. PATTON declined voting, asked to be excused, and appealed from the decision of the Chair,) which was: Yeas 123, nays 54.

The House then adjourned.

TUESDAY, MAY 31.

THE DEPOSITE BILL.

The House proceeded to consider the resolution reported by Mr. OWENS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, fixing on a day for considering the deposit bill.

The resolution, having been amended, was to make the said bill, together with the bills then on the Speaker's table, the special orders of the day for the day succeeding the final disposition of the appropriation bills. The question pending was the motion of Mr. BELL to strike out all after the word Resolved, and insert, That the deposit bill be made the special order for the 25th May.

Mr. BELL modified his motion by substituting the 13th June for the 25th May.

Mr. MILLER moved to postpone the subject until Monday next. Lost: Yeas 49, nays 80.

Mr. KINNARD moved to amend the amendment by including the bills relative to the Cumberland road; but subsequently withdrew it.

Mr. OWENS suggested that the bill be made the special order for to-morrow week.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY moved to except Fridays and Saturdays; lost: Ayes 69, noes 74.

Mr. McCOMAS moved to amend the amendment by including in the special order the bills for extending the pension act of 1832, establishing the northern boundary of Ohio, and for the admission of Michigan and Arkansas into the Union.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to postpone the whole subject until Tuesday next, which was agreed to: Ayes 86, noes not counted.

Mr. MILLER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, made a report concluding with a resolution setting apart Saturday next, from half past ten o'clock, for the consideration of bills reported, and to be reported previous to that time, by said committee.

Mr. WARDWELL moved to amend the resolution by including the bills reported by the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

Mr. JARVIS moved to amend the amendment by including the bills reported by the Naval Committee, for naval pensions: lost.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY moved to include the bills reported by the Committee on Claims: lost.

Mr. PARKS moved to lay the original resolution and amendment on the table; which was agreed to: Yeas 70, nays 59.

POLISH EXILES.

Mr. BOON, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill to amend an act granting lands to certain exiles from Poland.

The bill having been read twice, and the question being on ordering it to be engrossed for a third reading,

Mr. GRANGER said he did not know that he should object to passing this bill to a third reading; but he could not, at this time, consent to vote upon it. He had known something of the manner in which those lands had been selected. He had listened as attentively as he could to the reading of the bill, and, for aught he could see, after these lands shall have been drawn, it would be in the power of these Polish exiles to sell their shares to whom they pleased; thus opening, if he understood the bill, (though perhaps he did not,) under the form of charity, a pretty extensive field for speculation. A case like this had recently come within his knowledge. An old schoolmate of his presented himself to him the other day, after an absence of twenty years; he told him that he had gone on to the public lands, without authority of law, but as an American citizen, and as much entitled to the consideration of Congress as any Polish exile, however unfortunate his position. Well, on a quarter section of land this individual located himself, without authority, but relying on what had been the law of this country, granting privileges to actual settlers upon the unsurveyed public lands, which law he (Mr. G.) hoped would be re-enacted, but which, as it now stood, was likely to do as much injustice to individuals, as some gentlemen assured us it had wrought injury to the public Treasury. His friend located himself on this quarter section, and expended in mills, and other establishments, some ten thousand dollars; being, as he believed, two thirds of the accumulation of twenty years of industry. A Polish exile came and located this very land, under the law of 1834, and claimed that the Secretary should give him the land, with all its improvements.

Mr. G. repeated that he had not been able, from this cursory reading of the bill, to understand it; and he did not rise to throw any embarrassment in the way of its passage, if it was proper that it should pass. But he would ask the gentleman who had charge of the bill to permit it to lie on the table until he had an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. BOULDIN said he was not like the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GRANGER,] who had just taken his seat. He (Mr. B.) would vote for this bill in no stage. If it took from the grantees any thing, he would not vote for it. He would not rob a robber, much less a beggar. If it added to their grant the breadth of a hair, he would not vote for it. Why should we grant land to the Poles? Were they meritorious? Our own citizens are equally so. Were they poor? Our own citizens, many of them, were as poor as any body. Do we wish to encourage rebellion in foreign countries? This would hazard our safety—our name as an honest nation—our character as a wise and prudent people. These he would not hazard on any consideration. But here there was nothing to hazard, unless we did it willingly and unnecessarily. We had jewed, screwed, he was sorry to say, almost shuffled with, our old revolutionary soldiers, in relation to their claims, and had given these foreigners their thirty-six sections of land, of six hundred and forty acres each, which he understood had been selected on both sides of a river for many miles up and down, including the improvements of many who had spent their lives, and risked the lives of their families, to obtain from the Indians the very land now given to the Poles. He said he would contrast the conduct of the Government in relation to their own citizens with that of the Government in relation to these foreigners.

Mr. CONNOR rose and said he was sorry to be obliged to interrupt the gentleman from Virginia, but he must call for the orders of the day.

Mr. BOULDIN was quite willing to conclude his remarks, either then, or whenever the bill should again come up in its order.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, asked the consent of the House to permit him to report from the Committee on Military Affairs a bill from the Senate providing for the appointment of three additional paymasters of the army. His object was to act on the bill forthwith, inasmuch as the public service was suffering, and he had received a communication from the executive department urging the speedy passage of the bill.

The motion was objected to.

MAY 31, 1836.]

Post Office Department.

[H. OF R.]

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

In execution of the special order of Friday last, the House resumed the consideration of the "bill to change the organization of the Post Office Department, and to provide more effectually for the settlement of the accounts thereof."

The question pending was on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in their proposition to amend the bill, by inserting the following clause:

"SEC. 38. And be it further enacted, That from the thirty-first day of December, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, the following rates of postage shall be charged upon all letters and packets carried in the mail of the United States, excepting such are by law exempt from postage, to wit:

"For every single letter, or letter composed of one piece, carried not exceeding fifty miles, five cents.

"Over fifty, and not exceeding one hundred miles, ten cents.

"Over one hundred, and not exceeding two hundred miles, fifteen cents.

"Over two hundred, and not exceeding four hundred miles, twenty cents.

"Over four hundred, and not exceeding eight hundred miles, twenty-five cents.

"Over eight hundred miles, thirty cents.

"And for every letter or packet composed of two pieces, double these rates; and for every letter or packet composed of three pieces, triple these rates; and for every letter or packet composed of four or more pieces, quadruple these rates: Provided, That all letters and packets of one ounce, avoirdupois, in weight, or more, shall be charged single for every quarter of an ounce."

The question pending was the motion of Mr. MARTIN, to reconsider the vote by which the following amendment was adopted:

Retain the first clause of the section, and strike out all after the 7th to the 15th line of the section, inclusive, and insert, "over 50 miles, and not exceeding 150, ten cents; over 150 miles, and not exceeding 400, fifteen cents; over 400 miles, and not exceeding 800, twenty cents; over 800 miles, twenty-five cents."

Mr. CONNOR produced a letter from the Postmaster General on the subject of the tariff of postages, and giving a detailed statement of the revenue derivable from the various rates of postage. By the old plan, the revenue therefrom amounted to about $3,000,000. By the plan of the committee, there would be a loss on the smaller rates of $281,152, and a gain on the larger of $188,408, being a total loss of $92,744. But by the amendment, if adopted, there would accrue a loss of $549,417, which would at once suspend and put an end to all chance of increasing the facilities of mail transportation and of opening new routes. The letter was of great length, and entered into a great variety of details in reference to the point, and earnestly recommended that either the proposition of the committee should be adopted, with the modification of reducing the rate of letters over 800 miles from 30 cents to 25, or otherwise retain the old rates.

Mr. MARTIN explained the reasons that had induced him to change his opinion. He was assured that the amendment would cripple the Department, and he was in favor of the old rates.

Mr. HAWES was in favor of the old tariff, and should vote both against the amendment and the proposition of the committee.

Mr. McKENNAN was in favor of the present rates; for he had heard no complaints from his constituents, and he did not believe any change was desired.

Mr. PARKS entered into an explanation, showing that the proposition of the committee would injuriously affect his constituents. He hoped that the vote would not be reconsidered, or that the House would retain the old tariff.

Mr. HUNT said: I trust, sir, the House will not agree with the Committee of the Whole in their amendment to this bill; and I shall vote in favor of a reconsideration, in the hope that the project of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads may be adopted; or, if not, at least that the House will adhere to the rates of postage as now established by law. When this question was before the Committee of the Whole, (on the 27th of May,) I endeavored to show that the old rates of postage were not only inconvenient, but established arbitrarily, without much regard to any governing principle, and in their operation worked great injustice; and I gave, as an illustration of this view, the case of Albany and Troy in my own State, the former paying only twelve and a half cents upon single letters from New York, and the latter paying eighteen and three quarters of a cent, merely because Albany fell two miles short of 150 miles from New York, and Troy ran four miles over 150. That this inequality operated as a tax upon the citizens of Troy, for the benefit, in all its business operations, of a rival city. I then adverted to the difficulty of assuming any scale of miles which should do exact justice to all; and contended that, in fixing a scale, we not only had a right, but it was our duty, to look to its operation upon the great business portions of our country. I believe, sir, that the project of the committee has been based substantially upon these views. That project possesses another advantage, in simplifying the mode of keeping the accounts of the Department, and in adapting the charges to the federal coin of the country. Again: it will in its operation produce a very considerable reduction in the tax upon the circulation of intelligence—a tax which should at all times be placed as low as the exigencies of the Government will allow. But the amendment adopted in the Committee of the Whole, and which is proposed to be reconsidered, not only in my judgment restores all the inequalities of the old tariff, but will reduce the revenue of the Post Office Department to an extent rendering all further increase of mail facilities impossible, without a resort directly to your Treasury. This is a state of things not to be desired by an American legislator or patriot.

After the clear and frank statement from the Department read this morning from your table, showing its capabilities and wants, in reference to the best interests of the country, no one, it seems to me, can doubt as to the course now to be pursued. By agreeing to the amendment adopted in Committee of the Whole, we obviate very few of the evils of the old system, while we cripple the most beneficent operations and improvements of the Department. By reconsidering the vote taken on a former day, we place it in our power to adopt the project of the Post Office Committee, matured with much deliberation, and sanctioned by the Department; or, at least, (if this course be not acceptable to a majority of this House,) of falling back upon the present rates, which will enable the Department to progress with its proposed improvements without embarrassment, and leave to a future Legislature the task of remedying the inequalities and defects in the existing tariff of postage. I shall therefore vote for a reconsideration.

Mr. TAYLOR said that it seemed to be agreed on all hands that the Post Office Department was never intended as a source of revenue to the Government, and that it never ought to be. In this, there appears no difference of opinion. But, sir, if the present rates of postage are continued, it is very evident that it will become a source of revenue to a pretty large amount beyond the expenses of the Department. It appears by the report of the Postmaster General that the balance in favor of the Department the last year was 467,000 dollars; and the annual increase of the amount of postage has been, for a few years past, not less than ten per cent. By the statement of the Postmaster General which has just been read, the amount of postage is set down at three millions of dollars for the last year, which, at the ordinary increase, will probably be not less this year than three million three hundred thousand dollars. The increase of 300,000 dollars added to the balance in favor of the Department which accrued last year, and you have, at the present rate of postage, the sum of 767,000 dollars revenue, over the expenditures; provided there should be no additional expense incurred. The new routes which are proposed to be established by the bill now before the House, it is estimated by the committee, will cost the Department about 300,000 dollars, still leaving a large balance in its favor. Now, sir, without any change in the tariff of postage, and making all reasonable allowance for extending the accommodation of mail facilities according to the increasing wants of the people, it cannot be doubted that there will be annually accumulating an excess of revenue over the expenditures, to a large amount. This seems to be admitted by the committee, and the amendment which they have proposed, according to their estimates, will reduce the aggregate amount of postage some two or three hundred thousand dollars. But this amendment I would not consent to, because I think it would operate unjustly and unequally. It proposes to reduce the amount of postage; but while it reduces the rate with some, it increases it with others; it does not uniformly reduce the rate of postage. My honorable colleague [Mr. MANN] has said, more than once, that in examining this subject, it was not statesmanlike to examine it with reference to the effect that it might have upon one's constituents; that this would be too limited a view of the subject; but that we should look to its effects upon the whole people at large.

Sir, I grant that in examining the effect that any measure proposed here is likely to have, we should not be exclusively confined to our immediate constituents; but I venture to say no gentleman upon this floor can examine a subject so general in its operation, affecting, more or less, all classes and conditions of people, as this amendment does, without a particular inquiry into the effect it will have upon his immediate constituents. And, indeed, sir, if he should neglect to do this, he would be wanting in his duty to them. Several gentlemen have expressed to the House the opinion that the amendment of the committee would operate injuriously upon their constituents; and such, sir, I have no doubt, would be the effect upon those I have the honor to represent in part upon this floor; and hence I infer it would produce general dissatisfaction. From my district to Albany, the capital of the State, with which there is at all times an extensive correspondence, and especially during the session of the Legislature, the postage would be increased from 12½ to 15 cents; and to and from New York, the commercial emporium of the State, it would be increased from 18½ to 20 cents; and so with other important points of communication. What the aggregate effect may be, it is impossible for me to determine; but I look, as I know those whom I represent would naturally look, to the effect that it would have upon the correspondence with those important points, where business necessarily leads to the greatest amount of letter communication, and here I find the effect of the amendment of the committee would be decidedly injurious. Sir, I voted for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts which prevailed, and which it is now proposed to reconsider. I was in favor of this, because it is free from the objections which have been considered. It will be more uniform in its effects, reducing all the rates of postage, so that all will feel its beneficial effects, and none will have to complain that it is increased at any distance; and it conforms in the rate of postage to the federal currency, which all admit is desirable. The only objection to this I believe arises from the apprehension that it will so far reduce the amount of postage as to embarrass the Department, and compel the Postmaster General to lessen the expense by diminishing the accommodations now enjoyed by the people. This certainly should be avoided. I would do nothing calculated in the least to curtail the present mail facilities, or to prevent that reasonable extension of the system which the rapidly increasing population and business of the country may require, now or hereafter. By the letter of the Postmaster General to the chairman of the Post Office Committee, it appears that his estimate of the amount of reduction which will result from this amendment is something over half a million of dollars; which, he thinks, is more than the Department can bear, and keep up the accommodations which are now furnished. But I do not understand, from hearing the letter read, that in this estimate the increasing revenue from postage was taken into the account, which probably will equal, for a series of years, at least an annual increase of ten per cent., and which was estimated by the gentleman from Massachusetts at fifteen per cent. And as that gentleman has stated that if the vote is not reconsidered, he shall move to amend, so as to defer the period when the new tariff of postage shall take effect to the 1st day of January, 1838, it appears to me that the apprehended difficulties may and will be avoided. There will, of course, before that period, be a large balance in favor of the Department, which, with the gradually increasing amount of postage, will, it is believed, be sufficient to warrant the reduction without experiencing any embarrassment. At all events, before that time, we shall have had two annual reports from the Postmaster General; the true condition of the Department will then be well understood, and something like a just estimate may be formed of the probable effect of the reduction proposed, and the ability of the Department to sustain itself under it; and, as Congress will then be in session, any alterations can be made which may be indicated by existing circumstances. I shall, therefore, vote against a reconsideration, fearing that, if the motion to reconsider prevails, the amendment of the committee will be adopted, which I am most decidedly opposed to, preferring altogether that the present rates of postage should be continued.

Mr. SMITH said he was opposed to the motion of reconsideration. The honorable gentleman from New York, who is a member of the Post Office Committee, [Mr. MANN,] had told the House that my colleague, who has addressed the House this morning upon this subject, [Mr. PARKS,] has taken a narrow or "unstatesmanlike" view of it, because he has argued against the original proposition of the Post Office Committee, and in support of the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, upon the ground of their dissimilar effects upon his [Mr. PARKS's] immediate constituents, and the State of Maine. My colleague has told the House, Mr. Speaker, what will be the operations of the two projects upon the citizens of Bangor and vicinity, and demonstrated that, while the one will not be prejudicial, but, perhaps, favorable to his constituents and to others interested in the commerce of Bangor, the other will be injurious and oppressive. And it is because the argument has thus been deduced from the effect to be produced upon a region with which the representative is familiar, and about which there can be no mistake, that the honorable gentleman from New York repudiates it as narrow and unstatesmanlike.

I know not, Mr. Speaker, what may be the exact extent of territory requisite to be embraced by one's thoughts, in reference to this or any other subject, in order to square with the gentleman's views of statesmanship. Perhaps it is necessary that one should extend his reasoning over a State equal in territory and population, if it is to be found, with the great State of New York, in order to reach statesmanlike views that would be satisfactory to that gentleman. Or perhaps one should swell somewhat larger, and embrace a portion or the whole of some other State or States, to answer the purpose. [Yes, the whole Union, replied Mr. MANN.] The whole Union must be included, says the honorable gentleman. It may be, sir, that such is the view which that gentleman has taken; but if it be so, his "statesmanlike" views stop not at sacrificing the interests of an entire State of this Union, without conferring upon it a single benefit in return. I claim to be governed by no such principles of statesmanship as obviously sacrifice one of these States for the benefit of the remainder, and much less for the benefit of a fractional part of the remainder. I believe it has not been pretended, it certainly has not yet been demonstrated by any gentleman, that the proposition of the Post Office Committee will operate equitably upon all the other States except Maine. I do not pretend to know what its operations will be upon either the Middle or the Western States of the Union. But I do know, sir, that from my knowledge of what its operations must and will be upon the interests of Maine—the State which I have the honor to represent, in part, upon this floor—it is highly unsatisfactory and oppressive. Nor do I, sir, claim to act upon higher or broader views of statesmanship than are suggested by such facts and such local knowledge, if it must be so called, than are actually within my reach. I reason, as Pope says, from what I know; and

"How can we reason but from what we know?"

If the gentleman from New York does pretend to know the effect of this bill upon each State of the Union, he must know, sir, that there are no two points of any considerable business importance within the State of Maine, which will not be most prejudicially affected by the proposition or rates of postage reported by his committee. My colleague has told you the effect of it upon his section of the State. Let us take the two most prominent points of business in the State, the cities of Portland and Bangor, and it imposes an additional tax of two and one half cents upon every letter that will be interchanged by them. The effect upon the intercourse through the mail between Bangor and Boston is the same. That upon the intercourse between Portland and Boston, Bath and Boston, and Augusta and Boston, is the same. It is an increase of postage also upon all business between Bangor and New York, and Portland and New York; and I believe every other point in the State and the city of New York. This is the result of a comparison between the law as it now stands and the proposed law of the Post Office Committee. The rates of postage as now established are far more preferable, so far as the whole State of Maine, and even so far as every part of the State, separately considered, is interested in the subject of postage. Sir, ought the interests of a whole State to be thus sacrificed to "statesmanlike" views or any other views? It can never be done by a deliberative body.

Mr. S. said he was in favor of a new tariff of postage, if it could be agreed upon. He was in favor of getting rid of the quarter cent, and half cent, and six cent rates, and substituting the half dime, the dime, and a similar denomination of increase. He was in favor of the proposition which the gentleman from Massachusetts had made, and hoped the vote by which it had been adopted might not be reconsidered. So far as my own knowledge of what its operations must be extends, said Mr. S., it is judicious and desirable. Instead of adding to the tax now imposed upon intercourse among the people through the mail, (as the proposition of the Post Office Committee would,) it would lessen it between all points, and lighten the burden of postage now borne by the people. Such a measure I am entirely in favor of.

But, sir, it has been attempted to dissuade the House against the tariff of postage now under consideration, on the ground that it will reduce the revenues of the Post Office Department to such an extent as to stop the usual yearly extension of mail facilities. And the letter of the Postmaster General, sent into the House this morning through the honorable chairman of the Post Office Committee, had been quoted to prove that the reduction of some $500,000 yearly will be effected in the revenues of the Department by this tariff, estimating it upon the revenues of the last year; while the tariff of the committee will reduce them something like $200,000. But this estimate of the Postmaster General claims to be only a hasty calculation, and pretends not to make any credit whatever to the natural and inevitable growth of the revenue of the Department. What, sir, has been this growth during the last eight years, and what has it accomplished? We have been told, that only about one year or eighteen months since, the Department was in debt over one million of dollars, from a too great extension of mail facilities, or from other causes combined therewith. We are now told, at the expiration of a year or eighteen months at farthest, that this enormous deficit has been extinguished, or is about being extinguished, but a surplus revenue is shortly to be found in the Treasury Department.

This is the strength of the Department's operations within a single year, or in eighteen months at most. And is there so much cause for apprehension about the reduction of the revenues of the Department in the sum of $500,000, even though there was no natural and inevitable growth in them to offset or provide against it? Look, sir, as I before suggested, through the history of the Department for the last eight years, and mark what it has accomplished with only its own naked revenues. It has paid off all its expenditures, or nearly squared them, as we are told by the present Postmaster General; and, in the mean time, it has extended mail facilities over the whole country to over one half—yes, sir, to nearly double the amount that existed at the commencement of that period. Eight years ago, the mail transportation in stages, steamboats, sulkies, and on horseback, amounted in the yearly aggregate to about fourteen millions and five hundred thousand miles. It now amounts to nearly, if not quite, double that sum. The aggregate yearly revenue of the Department, eight years ago, was about one million seven hundred thousand dollars. The Postmaster General now estimates the revenues of the Department, per annum, at three millions of dollars. And, after making allowances for all the requisite additions of mail facilities, to be effected during the coming year, to be paid for out of the proceeds of past investments, a surplus of about two hundred thousand dollars is anticipated, at the lowest estimate. Sir, these facts demonstrate that there is no cause for apprehension on account of reduction in the revenue of the Department by the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts. I repeat, that the estimated reduction by it of the Postmaster General's letter makes no account of the certain addition of revenue to the Department, arising from the constant increase of business throughout the country, and beyond the extension of mail facilities.

I should like very much to see the other side of this account worked out upon paper by the present shrewd, intelligent, and talented Postmaster General. I should like to see his figures, demonstrating what the growth of revenue in the Department would be over and above the usual expenditures and mail extension, and what it can bear, running the calculation through a series of years to come, as he would know well how to do, and not confining it to the operations of a single year. Where the annual increase of revenue is clearly out of proportion to the necessary increase of mail extension, it is evident that every year will admit of further diminution of that revenue, without curtailing the usual extension of mail facilities. Now, sir, it is this state of things in the Post Office Department that I would take advantage of, and by it reduce the rates of postage throughout the land. And even though such a reduction should operate to make the Post Office Department, to some extent, an annual charge upon the Treasury of the nation, I would still advocate it as a matter of both justice and expediency under the existing condition of the Treasury of this Government. As a matter of justice, the Federal Government can afford to contribute to the support of the Department. Its services for the Government, if taxed as individuals are taxed for its services, would exceed a million of dollars per annum. Why, then, fear to throw the Department upon the national Treasury to some extent, if the proposed measure will so operate? which I do not believe. Sir, I am in favor of a reduction of the postages now imposed upon the people. The time has come when the people are entitled to relief from the burdens imposed upon them by the Federal Government; and the time has not only come for this, but for the rising of a feeling of general complaint that the legislation of the Federal Government operates to gather into the Treasury large masses of funds that can serve no great or good purpose, and produces only excitement and distraction throughout the country.

Sir, I am prepared to lighten this taxation upon the people in any and in every way that presents an opportunity for it; and I have none of the apprehensions of other gentlemen of bad effects resulting from the reduction of postage now proposed; and first, because I have no faith in the predictions that the Post Office Department will be in any degree embarrassed by it; and next, because, if that should be the case, the federal Treasury is competent to contribute relief, without adding one cent to the taxes now gathered from the people.

Mr. Speaker, I will detain the House only to add a word of admonition to those gentlemen who prefer the law as it now stands, to the proposed law of the committee. If they wish to secure their object, and retain the law as it now stands, let them beware of voting in favor of reconsidering the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts. For if that motion be reconsidered, I believe there will be a combination of feeling and interest—of feeling in some quarter in favor of changing the rates of postage—from considerations connected with the currency, perhaps, and of interest elsewhere, arising from local advantages which may be foreseen, sufficient to sustain and carry the proposition of the committee, unequal as it is upon some of the States. If the motion to reconsider be negatived, the question will stand between the law as it now is, and the tariff proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. LAWRENCE.] I am, individually, in favor of this last proposition. But if this cannot be adopted, I hope to avoid the proposition of the committee, and retain the tariff of postage now provided by law.

After some further remarks from Messrs. HUNT, MILLER, VINTON, REED, LAWRENCE, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, BRIGGS, JOHNSON of Louisiana, DENNY, MANN of New York, GILLET, PEARCE of Rhode Island, and EVERETT,

Mr. PHILLIPS asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. GRENNELL moved a call of the House. Lost.

The question on reconsidering was then taken, and decided in the negative: Yeas 66, nays 81.

So the motion to reconsider was lost.

The question then recurred on agreeing to the section as amended.

Mr. LAWRENCE moved to amend the first clause of the same section by inserting 1837, instead of 1836. Agreed to.

After some remarks by Messrs. PHILLIPS, VANDERPOEL, and DUNLAP, the question was taken on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in the section as amended, and it was decided in the negative: Yeas 65, nays 91.

So the House refused to concur, and the clause was stricken out.

Mr. ADAMS moved to reconsider the vote by which the following amendment of the Committee of the Whole was concurred in:

"SEC. 5. That the Treasurer of the United States shall give receipts for all moneys received by him to the credit of the appropriation." Strike out the words in italics, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "duly deposited to his credit in bank."

Mr. ADAMS addressed the House for some time in support of his motion, and in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. CONNOR explained that the clause had been amended to render it consistent with the present mode of conducting the financial affairs of the Department.

Mr. PARKER did not entirely approve of the clause as it had been amended. The word "bank" was too indefinite, too ambiguous; and by whom was the selection to be made?

Mr. McKAY thought all objection might be obviated by inserting another section or proviso, that the banks in which the money might be deposited should be selected by the Treasurer, under the direction of the Postmaster General.

Mr. MANN, of New York, said he saw no objection to restoring the clause as it was originally reported, and he hoped the motion to reconsider would prevail.

Mr. ADAMS did not approve of the suggestion of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. McKAY.]

The motion to reconsider was then agreed to, and the amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. FAIRFIELD moved to non-concur in the following amendment:

"SEC. 40. And be it further enacted, That in case the Postmaster General shall deem it expedient to establish an express mail on horseback, in addition to the ordinary mail, on any of the post roads in the United States, for the purpose of conveying slips from newspapers in lieu of exchange newspapers, or letters other than such as contain money, not exceeding half an ounce in weight, marked 'express mail,' and public despatches, he shall be authorized to charge all letters and packets carried by such express mail with triple the rates of postage to which letters and packets, not free, may be by law subject, when carried by the ordinary mails."

Mr. FAIRFIELD said he hoped the House would not concur with the Committee of the Whole in adopting this amendment. He viewed it as a specimen of that course of legislation which had prevailed for so many years that it might now be regarded as a system—that of legislating for the benefit of the few, regardless of the rights and interests of the many. The proposition is, substantially, to establish an express mail for letters and newspaper slips, to be carried on horseback, at triple the present rate of postage. This is, substantially, the proposition; for though the Postmaster General has now the power to establish an express mail, yet he has no power to increase the present rate of postage; and without such increase it cannot be supposed that such a mail would be established. It is true that the proposed amendment will still leave the matter to the discretion of the Postmaster General; but he and every body else will consider the adoption or rejection of this amendment as an approval or disapproval of this project, and he will undoubtedly act accordingly. Mr. F. said he therefore felt himself justified in regarding this as a direct proposition to establish an express mail.

Now, sir, if we look at the places where this mail would probably be started, or the persons who are particularly interested in it, and who would avail themselves of it, no one can view it as a measure designed for the common benefit of the people, but rather one designed for a very few, and those who, to say the least of them, are no more deserving of favors from the Government than others. Where, sir, will this express mail be established? Undoubtedly between the great commercial cities.

It can support itself nowhere else, and indeed it is very doubtful whether it could support itself there. It would, therefore, be confined not only to the large maritime cities, but to a very few of them—say those between Boston and Baltimore. The class of persons who would be particularly benefited by it would be the speculators. It would be lending the aid of the Government to speculators, and those who are not content to pursue business in the regular ordinary mode. It is well known that there is a class of men in all our large cities, who devote themselves (or many of them) to no regular calling, but who are constantly on the watch, to avail themselves of the fluctuations of the market, to speculate out of those who are quietly pursuing their business with habits of industry and frugality, content with their gains, which, though slowly, are honestly acquired, and which will be likely to endure. If, for instance, on an arrival from abroad, bringing information of a great rise in the price of any particular article, or such information as renders it probable that there will be a scarcity of any particular article, these speculators, by means of agents, immediately buy up and monopolize all of that article there is in the country, after which they sell back again to the people, at prices affording to the speculators enormous profits. And these are the men who are to be particularly benefited by the proposed express mail. Take for illustration a case similar to the one alluded to a few days since, though for another purpose, by the chairman of the committee who reported this bill. Suppose that, by an arrival at New York from Liverpool, information is obtained of a great and sudden rise in the price of cotton. Thereupon the speculators immediately despatch instructions to their agents at the South, through the express mail, and cause the whole crops of the planters to be purchased up at prices far below what might have been obtained, if the owners of the cotton had been aware of the facts, and information of the state of the market had been communicated by the regular and ordinary mail. Here, the profits on the cotton would not go into the pockets of him who had raised it by the sweat of his brow, but into the pockets of the prowling speculator, who lives upon the industry of others. It is for the benefit of this class of men that the express mail will be established. I know it may be said that this express mail will be open and free for every one who chooses to avail himself of it, and that the planter, in the case supposed, can procure information by means of it, as early as the speculator or his agents. This is all plausible enough in theory; but how would it be practically? The speculator is constantly upon the alert, and immediately upon the receipt of information affecting materially the price of any article, say cotton, he despatches instructions to his partners or agents. But will the planter have in all the commercial cities those sufficiently interested in his affairs to be equally on the alert with the speculators to obtain information, and equally ready and early to communicate it? Such a supposition cannot be entertained. Such friends are not to be found every day; and to hire a host of agents for this purpose would be burdensome and oppressive in the extreme.

But, saying nothing of the speculators, I ask, said Mr. F., if it would not in practice be giving one class of merchants an advantage over others? It was not to be supposed that all would adopt this mail for their correspondence, unless, indeed, in the way of self-defence, they were all compelled to resort to it; in which case it would be imposing a heavy burden upon the young merchant who had just commenced business, and perhaps with a small capital. To the wealthy merchant, him who is worth his hundreds of thousands, this triple postage would be a matter of no consequence; but it would be far otherwise to men of smaller capital, but who are quite as much deserving of aid from the Government as the more wealthy. The probability is, therefore, that all would not avail themselves of this express mail; it would be confined to a few. Those who are rolling in wealth, and care nothing for the extra expense—and those “neck or nothing” men who, in all their transactions, are willing to incur extraordinary expenses in the expectation of reaping extraordinary profits; in which case it will be perceived that, in most of the sales and purchases in our commercial cities, particularly in regard to country retailers, one party would be acting upon information obtained by the express mail, not possessed by the other. The wholesale dealer might know precisely when it would be for his interest to yield a little in his demands, and when to persist in his demands for an exorbitant price. The operations, therefore, of this mail would be unequal. In practice, whatever it may purport to be on the face, it would be conferring advantages on one class to the injury of another. Entertaining these views, sir, I feel bound, said Mr. F., to oppose the concurrence of the House with the Committee of the Whole in adopting the proposed amendment.

Mr. HARPER opposed the motion, and went on to show that an express, established by law, would be the surest safeguard against the impositions of the speculators.

Mr. PARKER moved to strike out the words “on horseback;” agreed to.

The section, as amended, was then concurred in: Ayes 85, noes 38.

Mr. HOWARD moved to non-concur in the following amendment of the Committee of the Whole:

“SEC. 44. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General shall be authorized to contract for the transportation of the mail on railroads by the most expeditious means: Provided he shall be enabled to do so for a price not exceeding double that which is usually paid for equal freight, on the average, on such railroads, on ordinary merchandise.”

Mr. H. called the attention of the House to the fact that the section gave less than was offered by the Postmaster General.

Mr. HAWES hoped the House would concur, so that the Postmaster General might be so limited as to prevent the Government from being imposed upon. He hoped so, also, for the reason assigned by the gentleman from Maryland, because the Postmaster General offered too much.

Mr. BOULDIN said he would vote for this or any other check that could be put on the monopoly of these railroads. Should a connexion of these railroads and steam conveyances be made between New Orleans and New York, and the combinations be formed which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ANTHONY] had suggested, we should be perfectly at the command, and under the thumb, of these companies. They would have the command of the commerce of the whole Union. They would not carry the mail for millions a year, because they could speculate on the market, and no private conveyance could compete with them. To make a parallel rail and steamboat route would cost immense sums; and, from the opinions of the Southern politicians, could not be made. Mr. B. said he would therefore throw every obstacle in his power in their way, and give no encouragement to them, until it should be understood distinctly, in every case, upon what terms they would carry the mail. He knew he could not break up the present railroads; but he would now inform them, that by his vote they could get no encouragement, without it being first understood upon what terms the mail would be carried. It made no great odds whether intelligence be carried in one day or five, provided all get information at the same time. But if these monopolies obtain these privileges, and by steam carry information faster than any private conveyance can carry it, we shall be perfectly at their command. Mr. B. would therefore not encourage them by giving exorbitant prices for carrying the mail, and would assure them of it by voting for limiting the Postmaster General according to the provision proposed in the bill.

Mr. PARKER moved a further amendment; which was negatived.

Mr. J. Y. MASON moved to strike out the proviso in the section as reported from the committee; but subsequently withdrew the motion.

Mr. EVERETT moved a substitute for the section; which he withdrew.

The question was then taken on concurring with the committee in the adoption of the foregoing section, and determined in the negative: Ayes 60, noes 73.

Mr. ASH moved that the House adjourn: Ayes 71, noes 44.

The House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 1.

CONVENTION WITH SPAIN.

The act to carry into effect the convention between the United States and Spain, returned from the Senate with a resolution declaring that the Senate insisted on their amendment, and ask a conference, was taken up; and,

On motion of Mr. ADAMS, the House insisted on their disagreement to the Senate's amendment, and agreed to the conference asked by the Senate. The committee on the part of the House was ordered to consist of five.

ADDITIONAL PAYMASTERS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, by leave, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill from the Senate, providing for the appointment of three additional paymasters of the army; read twice and committed.

Mr. J. asked the consent of the House to make the bill the special order for to-morrow at half past 10 o'clock; objected to.

Mr. HIESTER moved a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of taking up the joint resolution from the Senate, fixing the day of adjournment of the present session of Congress.

Mr. HAWES moved to lay the motion to suspend on the table.

Mr. HAYNES asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

The House refused to lay the motion on the table: Yeas 81, nays 99.

Mr. HIESTER then asked for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules; which were not ordered, and the motion was decided in the negative: Ayes 84, noes 81; not two thirds.

ABOLITION REPORT.

Mr. HUNT asked leave of the House to make a statement on a subject in which he was personally concerned, and which was of deep and vital importance to this country.

Objections being made,

Mr. HUNT moved the suspension of the rules, for the purpose indicated. He held in his hand, he said, a document which he had found on his table, since he came into the House this morning, and to which he wished to call the attention of the House.

[Cries of "order."]

The SPEAKER put the question on the suspension of the rules; when, by the sound, it seemed to be lost. Before the result was announced, the yeas and nays were called for and refused.

Mr. HARDIN asked if it was in order to amend the motion, so as to allow him to make an explanation. He had been represented, in a document now on the tables of members, as having voted for the emancipation of slaves in the States, which was utterly false.

Mr. PATTON stated that no member of the House, after knowing the object of the request, would refuse it. The tables of the House had been covered with copies of a document, which members were unwarily circulating, containing foul misrepresentations of the course of members of this House on a most important question.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, of Mississippi, followed Mr. PATTON, and said he rose to corroborate the statement of that gentleman, and to urge the majority in the House to give to the member from New York [Mr. HUNT] an opportunity to explain. He felt that he himself had been placed in a position of peculiar delicacy, without any fault or connivance of his own. A few days since he had put his name to a paper which was circulating in this hall, for the printing of the report submitted by the select committee on the subject of slavery. Such papers, proposing the publication of certain documents, were seen here every day. Who put the one in circulation which Mr. C. had subscribed to he did not know. When he took his seat here this morning, he found two hundred copies of the report on his desk, folded and directed by his amanuensis, and he had put his frank on them, without being aware of the erroneous statement they contained. The moment he was apprized of this, he sent to the post office to recall them, and should commit them to the flames. He had most unconsciously put his frank upon a falsehood; and the only return in his power to offer, the only evidence he was able to give of his regret, he would now give, by voting to allow the gentleman from New York to explain, and he invoked the House to suspend the rules.

Mr. PATTON demanded the yeas and nays, and, being taken, the motion to suspend the rules was carried: Yeas 140, nays 36.

Mr. HUNT said: I return my grateful acknowledgments to the House for the privilege allowed me, by an overwhelming vote, to make an explanation, in a matter deeply affecting my character as a man and a legislator. I regret, sir, to consume any time in a matter more immediately personal to myself; but the House will bear me witness that I have not often thrown myself upon their indulgence, nor consumed much of their time in the debates of the session. Sir, after taking my seat this morning, and after the business of the House had commenced, my attention was accidentally called to a publication from the office of the Globe, in pamphlet form, purporting to be the "Report of the select committee upon the subject of slavery in the District of Columbia, made by Hon. H. L. PIERCKNEY, to the House of Representatives, May 18, 1836. To which is appended the votes in the House of Representatives upon the several resolutions with which the report concludes."

The first resolution is in the following words, viz:

"Resolved, That Congress possesses no constitutional authority to interfere in any way with the institution of slavery in any of the States of this confederacy;" and the pamphlet to which I allude goes on to say, "the following are the votes on the resolutions at the conclusion of the report, viz: On the first resolution—Nays—Messrs. Adams, H. Allen, Bailey, Bell, Bond, Bunch, G. Chambers, Clark, Everett, Granger, Graves, Grennell, H. Hall, Hard, Hardin, Harlan, Hazeltine, Hoar, Howell, Hunt, Jones, Lawler, Lawrence, L. Lea, Lewis, Lincoln, Lyon, S. Mason, McKennan, Patton, J. A. Pearce, Pickens, Rencher, Russell, A. H. Shepperd, Slade, Sprague, Standefer, Steele, Taliaferro, Underwood, Vinton, Whittlesey, L. Williams, S. Williams, and Wise—46.

Now, sir, your journals show that, upon this first resolution, there were nine* only in the negative, and that my name stands recorded in the affirmative. As regards the rank injustice done other gentlemen, it does not, perhaps, belittle me to speak; they are abundantly able to protect their own reputations; but as regards myself, I pronounce the publication in question to be either a gross misrepresentation, or a most palpable and inexcusable mistake.

Were this an error connected with any ordinary topics, or with the paltry and evanescent party politics of the day, I should have passed it by in silence; for I stand not here to utter philippics against any one, nor do I court the notoriety growing out of an issue made upon this floor with a newspaper editor. But, sir, this question of slavery is one of deep, absorbing, permanent, and alarming interest to this country. It will remain, with its momentous consequences to this Government, long after the individual who now addresses you, and all those within the sound of his voice, shall have passed to their graves. Upon such a question, I wish no mistake in my opinions, however humble their source may be. They are not the result of the moment, nor influenced by the fate of any aspirant for office; but the settled convictions of a judgment which has sought, with singleness of purpose, for the truth.

Sir, in charity for human frailty, perhaps I am bound to consider the present error as arising from mistake. I trust it has so arisen, although even that view cannot soften the harshness of its injustice; for why to a report append the yeas and nays growing out of accompanying resolutions? Is not this a most unusual course? At least, if editors suppose any purpose is to be answered by such a course, we have a right to hold them strictly responsible for the truth and accuracy of their report. One further remark. In a daily paper, issuing from the Globe office a few days since, I, with others, was denounced in no measured terms for having given a conscientious vote upon a question growing out of this same slavery resolution. Sir, I felt the editors did me great injustice, yet desired not to trouble this House with a private grievance of the kind. I passed it by, as one of the evils growing out of a licentious press, to be redressed, not upon this floor, but in some other place; but, sir, the events of this morning have, to my mind, connected that newspaper attack with the misrepresentations of the pamphlet to which I have called the attention of the House; and when gentlemen reflect that this pamphlet has gone, under our own frank, to every quarter of this extended country, they will feel the necessity imposed upon me of making in my place the explanation I have given. This explanation was due to myself, and, more especially, to a family to whom I can hope to leave little else than an unsullied reputation.

Sir, allow me again to thank the House for their indulgence, and, having done so, I have done with this unpleasant subject.

Mr. UNDERWOOD asked whether the document had been received by order of the House. If so, he should propose a resolution declaring it to be erroneous in its statements.

Some one replied in the negative.

Mr. A. H. SHEPPERD asked whether the Clerk had furnished the list of yeas and nays for publication.

The SPEAKER stated that the Clerk, in reply, had informed him that he was not in the habit of furnishing lists to editors, but that editors had access to the book of yeas and nays, and took the lists for themselves.

Mr. MERCER asked to what date the printed journal had been brought down.

The SPEAKER replied, to the 16th of May.

Mr. A. H. SHEPPERD and Mr. MERCER asked leave to make explanations on the subject; but it was objected to.

Mr. GILLET said, if the House would permit him, he would explain this matter; but objections were made.

Mr. CLAIBORNE said he felt his reputation involved in this subject, and he claimed it as a right to make a statement to the House.

[Cries of "leave, leave," and "no, no."]

Mr. CLAIBORNE moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose.

Mr. MERCER moved to amend the motion so as to permit others to make explanations; which motion was, after some confused proceedings, agreed to by a vote of 91 to 79.

Mr. PATTON rose, and called the attention of the House to the fact that the Globe newspaper recently contained an editorial article making statements equally as gross and false as those which had been just brought to the notice of the House.

Mr. P. was here interrupted by calls to order.

The question on the motion to suspend the rules was taken by yeas and nays, and negatived: Yeas 98, nays 82; not two thirds.

Mr. UNDERWOOD asked the consent of the House to offer a resolution directing the printer to the House to publish five thousand copies of the report on the slavery subject, with the yeas and nays on each of the resolutions annexed.

Mr. VANDERPOEL objected, on the ground that it would create a debate.

Mr. McKENNAN asked the gentleman from Kentucky to withdraw his motion. He had no idea, he said, of paying the printer for his blunders.

Mr. UNDERWOOD withdrew the proposition.

Mr. WISE rose simply to request the members who had received these pamphlets to prevent their circulation. "Yes," "certainly," was responded from every part of the House.

On motion of Mr. CONNOR, the House then proceeded to the orders of the day.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The House resumed the bill to change the organization of the Post Office Department, and more effectually to provide for the settlement of the accounts thereof.

The question first in order was on concurring with the Committee of the Whole in the following increase of the salaries of the officers and clerks of the Department:

"Sec. 45. And be it further enacted, That the following annual salaries shall be allowed to the Assistant Postmasters General, and to the clerks, messengers, and watchmen, provided for the service of the Post Office Department, to be paid at the end of each calendar month, viz:

"To the three Assistant Postmasters General, each $3,000.

"To the chief clerk, $2,100.

"To the three principal clerks, each $1,700.

"To ten clerks, each $1,400.

"To fifteen clerks, each $1,200.

"To eight clerks, each $900.

"To the messenger, $900.

"To the three assistant messengers, each $600.

"To the two watchmen, each $300."

A debate ensued on this proposed increase, in which Messrs. HARLAN, HARPER, MANN of New York, CAVE JOHNSON, ADAMS, GIDEON LEE, PEARCE of Maryland, PARKER, ANTHONY, and HIESTER, took part.

Mr. WISE said that heretofore there were thirty-eight clerks employed for the sum of $39,700. By the clause in this bill which is proposed to be stricken out, thirty-seven only are to be employed for the sum of $46,400, making an increase upon the old establishment of the Department of $6,700. In addition to this increase upon the salaries of clerks, this bill proposes for Assistant Postmasters General, messenger, and for Auditor's office, an increase in gross of $63,400; making the entire amount of proposed increase, for new and old establishment of the Department, the sum of seventy thousand one hundred dollars per annum.

What are the arguments for this enormous amount of annual increased expenditure in a single Department? Sir, I beg leave to call the attention of the House to an official document, (No. 362,) laid before us in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, showing the reasons of the Postmaster General. He says:

"It is true that even the lower salaries in this Department are much sought after, and there are generally from one to two hundred applicants on hand, who would be willing to accept even of $800; but they are almost exclusively young unmarried men—men in desperate circumstances, or men who are incompetent to make a living elsewhere, and seek for these appointments as a means of meager support to themselves and families. The consequence is, that a large proportion, probably a considerable majority, of the clerks of this Department are hopeless insolvents, and many of them are put to great straits even to subsist themselves and families on their present compensation. The payment of old debts is out of the question."

And, sir, so it is! We are here called on to take the money of the people to pay "old debts" of a set of "hopeless insolvents"—"men in desperate circumstances," who cannot find means "to bury the dead," or "furnish bread for the living!" How came such a set employed? Who put them in office? Can no better be found for that pitiful sum of $800 per annum? $800 per annum! Why, sir, I say it is a libel upon the country to say that $800 will not command for the public service the labor of virtuous and competent officers. If you will take the embargo or incubus of downright slavery—not the slavery of hard work, that is not known here—but the slavery of party oppression, the slavery of the gag, of the knout and bow-string; of tenure by will; the slavery which hushes the tongue that would tell of abuses, and shuts the eyes that would see them; the slavery of proscription for freedom of opinion and speech—off these $800 offices, you will then find many and more than enough able and efficient freemen, of virtuous habits, willing and glad to fill a post of respectability yielding an income of the pitiful sum even of $800! I know, sir, of many deputy clerks in Virginia who work longer every day in their offices, the year round, than from 10 to 3 o'clock, who do not get $500 per annum, including their board and washing, who are not "hopeless insolvents" or "desperate men," and who would be glad to serve their country at $800 per annum, if they could do so as independent freemen, and not as palace slaves. That, sir, is the cause of these beggarly accounts of your public servants; they cannot be otherwise than as described by the chief of all of them, so long as the modern system of "the party" prevails. Beelzebub cannot be surrounded by angels! You are driving every honest and independent man from office, whilst you are putting at the head of your affairs the very last of all pimps and panders of power. All the wealth of the nation, if expended in salaries, could not gild foul fair. No, sir; the true remedy is honest and patriotic reform in the higher offices of your Departments. Give us the right sort of chiefs, themselves virtuous, independent, honestly republican and economical, and we will have no underlings, but respectable subordinates in office, who will live decently, and not die insolvent, and who will pay their way as they go, without calling upon Government in effect to pay their "old debts." Sir, to illustrate, I am told that these wretches, as described by the Postmaster General, themselves do not wish their salaries to be increased as proposed. I am told that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HARPER] has authority for saying so. Why do they not wish for more "pap?" Mark the reason! If their salaries are increased, they will be removed to make vacancies wherewith to reward certain favorites now hovering like vultures over the success of this proposed increase—favorites who, like Amos himself, would not think of taking an office unless it yielded at least $1,500! Yes, sir; no one knows the value of high bounties better than the present Postmaster General himself. He took the bounty once—I have seen and talked with the man who paid it to him; and no man now would make better use of the dispensation of bounties to others.

But, sir, this is small matter. I should not have risen but to notice what follows in this report of arguments for increase of salaries. The Postmaster General proceeds:

"Appointments to the more honorable and lucrative stations in this Government have been heretofore, and will be hereafter, made chiefly from political considerations."

Let the fact, then, be no longer denied, for here the principle upon which appointments are made is admitted and claimed in an official document from the head of a Department. I ask any honest and patriotic original friend of General Jackson, if such would have been believed of this administration less than eight years ago? Now, sir, this odious doctrine of proscription is not only defended by the party press, by the Globe, and by New York politicians, but by your official State papers. What are we to come to! Doctrines, principles, and practices, which but yesterday were charged almost as criminal, and certainly as offensive and odious to the public, and which were denied and repulsed as damning to any party which would profess and would not repudiate them, are to-day presumed by the powers that be to have become popular and palatable, are openly avowed and daringly administered in the operations of the Government. Yes, sir; it so happens that I have just been furnished with evidence of the strongest kind, of the most tyrannical and harsh application of the abominable principle here avowed by the Postmaster General.

Mr. WISE then read the following correspondence, which was sent to him by the chairman and secretary of a public meeting in the State of Maryland, together with the report of their proceedings:

CLEARSPRING, APRIL 20, 1836.

HON. SIR: On the 1st day of July, 1834, I received the appointment of postmaster at Clearspring, Maryland, and on the 19th of this month I was removed from office; during the whole of which time I discharged the duties of postmaster to the best of my ability, and gave general satisfaction; and from what cause my removal has taken place I cannot imagine for a moment. Will you not, honorable sir, make yourself acquainted with the facts, (if in your power,) and inform me thereof?

Sir, with respect,

D. RIDENOUR, Late P. M.

To F. THOMAS, Esq.

WASHINGTON, April 25, 1836.

SIR: If your removal from the office of postmaster at Clearspring was unexpected, your surprise cannot possibly exceed that of mine, on reading your letter of the 20th of April. In it you declare your belief that you gave, while in office, general satisfaction, and that you cannot imagine for a moment for what cause you have been removed. These assertions, thus solemnly made, coming as they do from one whose veracity I have never heard impeached, ought to be confided in; and yet it is strange that you have been kept in entire ignorance as to matters which I know are well understood by many of your friends with whom you have constant intercourse. This concealment on their part may have been practised for good cause, but I shall not imitate it. I shall reply to your letter with that frankness which becomes me.

You were originally appointed postmaster at my instance. Major Barry, in 1834, notified me that it was his purpose to remove the then incumbent from the office which you subsequently filled, and requested me to name a person to fill the proposed vacancy. My acquaintance in Clearspring was not such that I could readily comply with this request of the Postmaster General. I wished to recommend some person who would accept the appointment, who would be well qualified to perform its duties, who would be acceptable at the same time to those who had placed me in the position which had invited Major Barry's application, and not obnoxious on any account to a majority of those with whom he would necessarily hold intercourse officially. To enable me thus to act, I addressed a letter to a gentleman in your neighborhood, in whose judgment and discretion I had entire confidence, and requested him to furnish me with the required information. In consequence of his reply, the office was given to you, at my instance, by Major Barry.

Immediately after the appointment became known to the citizens of Clearspring, I received letters from several of them, amongst others one from your brother-in-law, remonstrating very strongly against your appointment, and urging your removal. This I refused to recommend, and expressed the hope and expectation to them, that your conduct in office would be such that all opposition would subside, and those immediately interested become satisfied. Subsequently, repeated complaints were made to me, which I thought proper to disregard, still hoping that you would become acceptable to the people of the district generally. But in this I was disappointed. During the last summer I received a letter from several highly respectable citizens of Clearspring, accompanied by the proceedings of a meeting of a large portion of the people of that place, recommending your removal, and soliciting my aid to accomplish it. Although I was then a candidate for Congress, and needed the suffrages of those from whom this application came, and expected, too, that you and your immediate friends would all oppose my election, I returned the memorial, which was addressed to the Postmaster General, and had been forwarded to me to be transmitted, declining to send it, on account of the manner in which your appointment was referred to, and in the hope that this opposition to you would subside. In this expectation I was disappointed. Another memorial, praying for the appointment of the individual who has been made your successor, was sent to me, in a letter from three highly respectable citizens of your neighborhood, who had been appointed a committee for that purpose, at a meeting of a portion of the citizens of Clearspring. (In this letter it was alleged that your language and deportment towards those with whom you differed in politics was such that it was unpleasant to hold intercourse with you as a public officer.) This memorial was forwarded by me to the Postmaster General, in a short note, asking for it a favorable consideration. Mr. Kendall declined acting, in the absence of proof of particular instances in which your deportment had been offensive. His letter to me to that effect was sent to a gentleman at Clearspring, and the Postmaster General was requested not to act finally on the subject until he heard again from the memorialists. Several certificates, the precise import of which I do not at this moment remember, were forwarded to me, to be handed to the Postmaster General; which was done; and I made no further inquiry on the subject until after I had received several letters, earnestly insisting on the appointment of Mr. Kneffer, and soliciting my interference. I then called on the Assistant Postmaster General for the papers in your case, and they were submitted to my examination. I found that very few persons in your neighborhood had remonstrated against your removal. They alleged that you were acceptable to the people; but, in the absence of other evidence of that fact than their letters afforded, I was compelled to confide in the statements made in the proceedings of the meeting referred to, and concluded that it was the settled, calm, and fixed desire of a decided majority of the people interested in the discharge of the duties of the post office at Clearspring, that they should be imposed on your successor. This opinion was formed under the supposition that you had not been kept in entire ignorance by your friends of that which I had supposed was known to every intelligent individual in your district. And I must be permitted to repeat, that I am surprised at the allegations in your letters, particularly as I was told that you had here, in the Post Office Department, a friend, who was fully apprized of all the proceedings I have referred to.

Under an impression, therefore, that you knew that your appointment had not given, as stated in your letter, "general satisfaction;" that you were well aware that your removal had been recommended by a large number of persons interested, assembled at a public meeting; and seeing on file in the Post Office Department no remonstrance against that measure, except the letters I have alluded to, I concluded that the opinion I had formed upon the subject was well founded, and determined to impress it on the Postmaster General. With that purpose I called on him about a month since, after having failed repeatedly to find him at his office, in consequence of his indisposition, and recommended verbally your removal; telling the Postmaster General that you had been originally appointed at my instance, and that it would not have been done if I had been aware that your appointment was justly calculated to displease decidedly those who have remonstrated against it, and to whom, as a public man, I am under many obligations.

My correspondent at Clearspring had led me to commit an error which I desired to correct.

These are all the facts and circumstances which occur to me as being necessary to communicate in reply to your letter. From them you may learn by what I have been influenced, in the matter to which your letter relates. By what considerations the Postmaster General has been influenced I know not, as I have not conversed or corresponded with him since the time of the last interview above referred to. If you have any desire to know any thing as to his motives and reasons, he alone can gratify you. I presume, however, he could say nothing which would be more satisfactory than that which this letter contains.

In conclusion, I regret that the appointment was originally given to you, as it has been to me a source of much annoyance, and as your removal appears to have wounded your feelings, and will probably mortify some of your friends, for whom I entertain a high respect.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

FRANCIS THOMAS.

Mr. DAVID RIDENOUR.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
April 26, 1836.

SIR: Your letter of the 20th instant is at hand. When this Department shall give just grounds for attacks on your character, it will feel bound to furnish you with all the means of defence in its possession. But as it has not done the one by superseding you as postmaster, it will not do the other by giving you its reasons.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

AMOS KENDALL.

DAVID RIDENOUR, Esq.,

Late Postmaster at Clearspring, Md.

In using this correspondence, sir, let me not be understood as intending, in any manner, to intermeddle with the district or home affairs of the honorable gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS.] We all have enough to do to take care of ourselves, and to attend to our relations with our own constituents. I leave him to his people. But I have to do with Mr. Kendall, and I am glad to have a witness so highly respectable and honorable as the gentleman from Maryland, of his own party, with whose testimony to confront and convict him of the most dangerous exercise of anti-republican, inquisitorial, and unconstitutional power, and of the basest and most jesuitical prevarication, amounting to falsehood.

The correspondence, sir, gives you the history and the evidence of all this guilt. This man, Mr. Ridenour, was appointed "at the instance" of the honorable gentleman from Maryland himself, to fill a vacancy in the post office at Clearspring, Maryland, caused by a removal in 1834. He has since been removed, without notice of charge or imputation against him by the Department in whose service he was. Blindfolded during the inquisition held upon his official conduct, he was removed without the opportunity of defence. On the 20th of April, he wrote to the honorable gentleman, at whose instance he was appointed, to inform him of the causes of his removal. He was answered, as you see, by the gentleman from Maryland, who I am glad has attested the veracity of the individual removed, in his letter dated the 25th of April. And what, sir, do you suppose was the heinous offence for which this man, without notice and without the opportunity of defence, was removed and attainted? The only specific charge which can be gleaned from the letter of the gentleman from Maryland—a letter purporting to assign the causes, drawn by a legal hand, acquainted with the requisites and gist of accusation and defence—the only specification is, "it was alleged that your language and deportment towards those with whom you differed in politics was such that it was unpleasant to hold intercourse with you as a public officer!" Angels of grace defend us! I suppose Amos is to learn his postmasters to bow with all the ease and elegance of a Parisian fop to the dainty customers who come to take out a letter between their fingers and thumbs after paying the postage. Mercy on the nice digits of that clean gentleman who could not afford "to hold" so much "intercourse with a public officer" as to take out his letter or his newspaper, and pay the piper! Ah! and it was not so very bad deportment or language either, but only so "unpleasant" to the squeamish complainants! Now, sir, I put it to the country if such cause of removal from office is to be tolerated? Well might the Postmaster General have been utterly ashamed to make known such a cause for proscription.

But it seems he did decline to act, at one period of complaint, in absence of proof. Then, be it remembered, his own appointment was not confirmed by the Senate. How he immediately acted after he was fully a Postmaster General, the letter of the gentleman from Maryland tells us. The honorable gentleman himself called on the Assistant Postmaster General, and the papers in the case were submitted to his examination, when the person implicated himself could not even obtain a peep at them. Now, sir, pray let me inquire by what authority it is that any member of Congress assumes, or is allowed to enter into an examination of causes for the removal of any executive officer? It is bad enough for the Executive itself to possess and exercise the power of arbitrarily removing the public officers, with or without cause, at will; but here, it seems, judgment was to be pronounced by the representative of the congressional district; or why did he, or was he, permitted to examine, unless it was to form an opinion upon the propriety and justice of removal in the case? Against all this, sir, I protest with earnestness. Here a member of Congress informs us, in effect, that he appointed and he removed. There are too many potentates, sir, for me, multiplying in the land. It is bad enough to be subject to the capricious wills of a President and a Postmaster General, but it is intolerable to have the independence of official station prostrated by this practical transfer of executive functions and authority to a deputy of the legislative department. Thus, sir, in receiving accusations against the man, and in trying him in his absence, without notice or hearing, and in giving both his appointment and removal to a member of this House, an odious inquisition was established, and a flagrant violation of the constitution and of official duty was committed by the Postmaster General. And by removing this man without other cause than that for "opinion's sake," violence was done to private and public justice, and to every principle of true republicanism.

But, sir, I adduce this letter more especially to show that there were complaints and accusations brought against this Mr. Ridenour, setting forth pretended causes of removal; and yet, when these causes were called for, or demanded, I should say, he received for answer, I presume, from the tenor of the reply, the letter of the Postmaster General of the 26th April, obviously implying, if not expressly asserting, that there had been no "attacks upon the character" of the removed; and, consequently, implying, if not asserting, a palpable falsehood! Yes, sir, taken alone, one would suppose that the letter of this kitchen king meant clearly to say: "There were no charges against you, sir; if there had been, you should have been furnished with all the means of defence; but I will let you know, sir, that I claim of my own good will and pleasure to 'supersede' a postmaster ad libitum, though his character be unsuspected and his official conduct unimpeached; and"—ending with an aphorism of patent democratic republican New York democracy, "no man has vested rights in office," wholly regardless of a man's stake in a good reputation, he might have concluded, in imitation of the "God and liberty" of Santa Anna's self, with "Van Buren and the spoils!" And if this is, as I believe it is, his Majesty's meaning, it is as false and fatal, in my mind, as the direct falsehood that there were no imputations upon the man's character. What, sir, no imputation upon character to remove a man from a station of responsibility and of trust without making known the cause of removal! This might be expected from one who never did know how to estimate the worth or value of moral standing; but is it not considered by every man in this country who himself has respect for character, that there is something rotten in one's character who has been thought unworthy to serve by those put in office for the very duty of judging of the competency of men to fill your public offices? The estimation of character has sunk low, or the estimation of your higher officers has sunk still lower, if such is not the impression of the public mind; and if the judgment would not be, that charity, laudable charity, perhaps, in the Department, conceals the charge or cause from the public eye. And there is the evil of this outrage: if a jealous and strict regard to good character and official uprightness will not save a faithful officer in his place, what will? If the faithless and the faithful in public trusts are to be treated indiscriminately alike, how is public opinion to be formed? Where are the guards of public virtue, where the preventives of official vice? Certainly they will soon not be found in public opinion, because it will be perfectly at fault; no, sir, not at fault, for every man must become convinced that it is more honorable to be removed from office by such men as Amos Kendall than to serve under him. But that is a grievous evil in a republican Government of itself, that subordinate officers who have character must go out of office because the higher officers who come in have none.

But, besides the falsehood in fact and the falsehood in principle contained in this letter, I look with indignation at its audacious impudence and haughty insolence! Its tone and temper become this meek man Amos exceedingly! Is he who thus dares to add insult to injury not Amos Kendall still, though he be Postmaster General? Can the leopard change his spots, or the Ethiopian his blackness? (Here some one said "skin.") No, not skin, blackness! I am speaking of the "intus," not the "cute." Verily, sir, the man must be mad, or he must imagine that we have all forgotten who he is, who thus dares to taunt public sentiment by his proud oppression. But it is natural, sir. I beg pardon; I never knew in my life a maid or man servant promoted from the kitchen to the parlor, but what he or she put on more airs than those who had been in the parlor all their lives.

His report proceeds to say:

"When a citizen leaves his home in the States, and accepts a clerkship in the District of Columbia as a permanent employment, he, in effect, surrenders all prospect of rising to the higher honors of his country, and even all hope of acquiring extensive wealth."

Now, sir, this I deny. The wary watchman of the current of honor or of wealth, as Amos in his own case has proved, can here better catch the tide which leads on to fortune than any where else; and if I mistake not, there be many of the officers of the executive departments of this Government, who are now laying the broadest foundations for the most "extensive wealth," and have already "the substance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen!" Your public lands and your public money, if I am not as blind as a bat, are not devouring each other up; but, by certain "agents," are performing the most kindly and convenient offices of accommodation for each other!

Again, sir, he says:

"Faithful clerks have sometimes, though not often, been advanced to chief clerks; but probably no case has occurred since the organization of the Government, in which they have been promoted to the higher stations."

Now, sir, that word "faithful" has, in these degenerate times, two meanings. It is used, but rarely, however, in a virtuous acceptation; but in the common parlance of Washington city it is reputably used in the sense of party corruption. I heard a gentleman of "the party" say, the other day, that he knew of no two harder things in the world than "to get a good, i. e. a virtuously faithful officer into office, and to get a bad, i. e. a corrupt party faithful officer out." My life upon it, sir, "the faithful" clerks, par excellence, never fail to be promoted, or to get rich; if they do, it is their own fault, for I am sure they want not the opportunities. And Amos—modest man—again forgets that his own is a case which "has occurred since the organization of the Government, in which" one at least has "been promoted to the higher station" from the lowest degradation. But men thus promoted always remember to forget the low degree from whence they came, and despise the rounds of the ladder by which they climbed to eminence, power, and honor.

There was once a time when appointments were not made from "political considerations," but the question was asked—"Is he honest, is he capable, is he faithful to the constitution?" [Here Mr. BRAUMONT, of Pennsylvania, was heard to say, "that is what constitutes a democrat."] Yes, less than that constitutes a true democrat. I would leave out the word "capable," but give me an "honest" man, "faithful to the constitution," and that sufficeth with me for his democracy. I will not require a man to be learned, in order to be right in politics, or in private life. The two qualifications alone are sufficient to make a good democrat, but a man must have all three qualifications to make a good officer. But now-a-days, each and every of the once valued attributes, honesty, capacity, and faithfulness to the constitution, totally disqualify a man for holding any office in the compass of "the party" patronage. Instead of asking now whether he is honest, they must know if he is a good spoils-monger—whether he is capable, if he is capable of being made a tool—whether he is faithful to the constitution, if he is faithful to the constituted authorities? Times have monstrously changed, and the monsters of the change are in nothing greater than in the meaning of the commonest words of the political vocabulary, since the days of Mr. Jefferson, who proscribed forty, I am told, during his administration, whilst no less than upwards of eight hundred were proscribed in the first year of the first reign of General Jackson. So much for the improvements of the age and the march of mind—the people will not say there is no matter.

As I am now done with Mr. Kendall's principles and practices for the increase of salaries, I will reply to an argument of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MANN.] Sir, I think, with my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. HARRIS,] and the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] that this argument that these salaries ought to be increased, because they are not equivalent or proportionate to other salaries of other Departments, is no argument at all, except, perhaps, to show that these other salaries ought to be reduced. I concur in the opinion that the subject of increase of salaries ought not to be touched until we take up all the salaries of all the Departments, and equalise them according to a uniform scale of labor and responsibility, and corresponding compensation. Every now and then some additional burden is imposed upon a particular clerk, or bureau of clerks, which is made the pretext for increase of pay, and that increase in turn becomes the argument for an increase of the compensation of others who judge themselves equally entitled; and thus, by legislating partially, or for particular persons, cases, or Departments, we keep up a constant race for equality of compensation, which ends in exorbitantly high salaries. The odd ends are constantly overtaking and passing each other, and the fable of the monkey who sat in judgment upon the cheese of the two cats becomes verified. He bites from the part of one, and then from that of the other, until all is consumed. The only difference here is, that "we, the people," are not biting, but bitten; for, according to this mode of legislating, we may consume the whole Treasury in the vain effort to equalise salaries, by raising the lower up to the even standard of those above. But this is one of the new inventions to spend your surplus revenue, and I suppose it is all "according to the views of the Executive."

I cannot forbear alluding to a most potent mode lately adopted, I believe, to force an increase of salaries. If any Department has recommended, as some of them have this session, or any of the clerks desire, as most of them always do, an increase of salary, you may have observed, sir, that there has been considerable and inconvenient delay in obtaining answers or reports upon calls either from the House or the committees for information. And when the information comes, you are sure to be jogged in memory with the old reason which is pleaded, and it is said ought to be removed—insufficient force upon inadequate pay. More mortal! more mortal! is the constant cry, and the workmen will not put what they have in the wall, because you do not give them more. Delay and inconvenience are used, whereby to force Congress to increase salaries; and clerks who can find time, perhaps, to write arguments in the form of colloquies, as long as that of master and student, for increase of pay, can scarcely eke out their copies of state papers which it is their duty to write.

Already, sir, the salaries of this General Government are so extravagantly high that you have the whole country looking up, like hungry hounds, most wistfully to its patronage. You hold up the baits to thousands of expectants, who gladly take the least crumb you graciously let fall, and who no sooner taste much or little of Treasury pap than they begin immediately to cry for more, like leeches for blood, or like frogs for rain! The disparity of State and federal salaries has already stripped the States of their consequence in distributing offices, and they are all overshadowed completely by your overweening bounty. Here is the great centre of attraction, and State service is of inferior grade, and has no "honorables." I lament the effect of all this. It is baneful. I mourn more especially its influence upon poor old Virginia. God help my mother State! I cannot admit that she has degenerated. No, sir, she is what she was; but the high bounties have caused a "scramble," as it is called; and in all scrambles, sir, the men of mere brute force, of scanty purses, and scampering principles, will prevail. Her nobler sons, permit me to say, will not forget the glory of their fathers whilst they sigh over their graves. There was once a time—that time is gone—when Virginia's jewels did not sigh for the fleshpots of the very kitchen. They were high patriots, and ambitious too, and their ambition sighed only for the highest prizes of emulation, far above the paltry pay of a party. I mourn, mourn in sackcloth and ashes, that now an "asterisk of the blue-book," one of the very "extras" of party bounty, can be elected to a seat in her Senate. Her Senate was never very distinguished, even in her palmy days, but it never saw the time when its reputation could not be sunk lower by such indignity as is now cast upon it by the Orange district. You will convert, I fear, all our legislative halls into "shambles," where human life stock will be bought and sold, like hogs, and bulls, and calves, upon the hoof.

Mr. THOMAS said he would not recognise the right of the House, and certainly must not be understood to admit, in what he should say, that any member of the House had either the right, or the power, to call on him to justify his conduct towards Mr. Ridenour. For that conduct he was responsible to his own sense of propriety and justice, and to his constituents alone. Nevertheless, as his letter had been read, he would take the occasion to say that there was no part of it which he desired to qualify in the least degree. He had acted deliberately upon the principles contained in that letter; he would, under like circumstances, do what he had done again; and, moreover, he had no respect for any man who would, circumstanced as he had been in this case, have acted otherwise than he had done. Those who had taken the trouble to send this letter to the gentleman from Virginia, being probably the same persons who had impertinently forwarded to him certain proceedings concerning it, would be undeceived, if they had supposed that he was not prepared to vindicate the principles upon which he had acted, whenever and by whomsoever assailed. He never had cherished, and never would privately cherish, any motive of political conduct which he was ashamed, nay, was not willing, to proclaim publicly to be his, in any assembly in Christendom. The facts in this case are these:

About two years since, while Major Barry was Postmaster General, I received from him a letter, requesting me to name an individual to be appointed postmaster at Clearspring, in place of the then incumbent. This request being unexpected, I was not prepared to comply with it. My acquaintance in the town where the post office is situated was not such as to enable me to decide who would be best qualified, and most acceptable to the people of the district. To procure the necessary information, I wrote to a gentleman in that neighborhood (Dr. Wharton,) whose name appears in the proceedings referred to by the gentleman from Virginia, and asked him to recommend a suitable person. I desired to have selected a political friend, and expected that one of that class would be recommended by the gentleman whom I had consulted. He and myself had been then but recently elected by nearly a party vote in the Clearspring district, where our friends constituted a majority, one of us to take a seat here, and the other in the House of Delegates of the State. And I supposed that he would coincide with me in the opinion that, to an office about to be made vacant by the removal of a political friend, an individual of the same class ought to be appointed, if well qualified to perform its duties. Whatever may be thought of the liberality or justice of this sentiment in the abstract, I feel certain that no honorable man will contend that the national administration ought not to give a preference to its friends in Maryland, in all new appointments to be made there, provided the public interests are well protected and preserved. In no part of this Union has political power, party dominion, been felt more sensibly than in Maryland.

Knowing, as I do, the inexorable character of the proscription which has been practised by the whigs of that State, I have been filled with disgust, when the presses there, and their representatives in this and in the other branch of Congress, have countenanced and encouraged that coarse and bitter denunciation to which the national administration has been subjected, because it has removed public officers on account of their political opinions, or has given a preference, in original appointments, to its friends. The Postmaster General has declared—

"Appointments to the more honorable and lucrative stations in this Government have been heretofore, and will be hereafter made, chiefly from political considerations."

And this doctrine is said to be "abominable," and "odious." If this be true, the whigs of Maryland have covered themselves with obloquy, and ought not to hold up their heads, proudly, as equals, when associated with the national politicians, so called.

In 1826, a gentleman, now a Senator from Maryland, was called from this House to become the Governor of that State. In that capacity he acted for three years, and had the power, by and with the consent of the Executive Council, (wherein there was a majority of his political friends,) to appoint a host of civil and military officers annually. During the first year of his service, a few public officers were proscribed. In the two succeeding years the number was largely increased.

At the elections of 1829 there was a political revolution, and the party with which I am identified became predominant. All, or nearly all, the friends of General Jackson, who had been proscribed, were restored to office, and many of those who had most clamorously justified, and had profited by the proscription that had been practised, were made to feel the effects of the doctrines which they had inculcated. In 1830 the anti-Jackson party again triumphed, and a scene of indiscriminate, unsparing, inexorable, wide-spread proscription ensued. In the county in which I reside, more than two hundred public officers were turned out; or, to adopt the mild language of the whigs of Maryland, by whom the act was justified, were "left out" of office on account of their opinions, or to make way for those who were willing to fill the stations assigned them. No means have ever been adopted to ascertain, with entire accuracy, the number of persons proscribed on that occasion, but I have seen an estimate, in the accuracy of which I had entire confidence, from which it appeared that not less than two thousand friends of Jackson in Maryland, in 1830-'31, were proscribed by the State Executive. It may be, indeed it is probable, that the highly respectable gentlemen, who discharged these executive duties at the period referred to, took no delight in the work; but the effects were the same as they would have been if the actors in these scenes had scalped their political enemies with peculiar pleasure. The friends of the present Chief Magistrate were, every where, driven from office, and proscribed, (generally, not universally.) They have endured for years a hail storm of persecution for opinion's sake. They have been hunted by the terriers of party, like wild beasts of the mountains, from brake to bramble. But, sir, it is with pride and pleasure I proclaim that they have not filled the land with weeping and wailing. They have uttered no complaints to excite public sympathy. They have not begged for quarter. No, sir; year after year, election after election, they have repaired to the polls; have contended boldly, cheerfully, with their adversaries for mastery, with a full knowledge that the odious, hateful, aristocratic constitution of Maryland gave to the party in power every advantage. Yes, sir, and the republicans of Maryland will "stand up to the work," will carry on the contest from generation to generation, until my own native State is "redeemed, regenerated, and disenthralled."

Amidst the exacerbation and excitement which the state of things thus rapidly reviewed was well calculated to produce, I came into Congress. From this high position I could have commenced a courtship with my political opponents, and possibly by so doing might have so far conciliated them as to have secured for myself a seat in this House without contest. Of this I am proudly incapable. I desire to share the fate of my political friends. Their foes shall be my political foes. Their wrongs will excite in my bosom a resentment as warm as could be engendered by an injury to myself in person; and whiliver and wherever I have political power, it shall be fearlessly exerted to insure for them equal and exact justice, a fair participation in the privileges and advantages due to the whole people. I repeat, I envy neither the heart nor the head of any man who will not concede that my course in the case under review, and my avowed purpose to prefer a political friend to a political opponent, in like instances, is correct. But to return to the statement I was making.

In reply to my letter, Dr. Wharton recommended the appointment of the individual who has been removed; and, in the full expectation that his appointment would be acceptable to those whose wishes I desired especially to consult, he was recommended to Major Barry, and was appointed. Soon after the appointment was made, several highly respectable citizens, immediately interested, applied to me to have Mr. Ridenour removed, alleging that he was particularly obnoxious to all the friends of the administration of his neighborhood, and to many of its opponents. This I refused to do, not because, if strict justice had been done, Mr. Ridenour had a right to be exempted from that proscription for opinion's sake which he assists his friends to practise in Maryland; but I forbore to act, in a spirit of magnanimity, in the hope that he would, by his courteous deportment, conciliate the good will of all concerned. This expectation was not gratified. Repeated complaints were made to me on account of his rude and insulting deportment towards those with whom he differed in politics, when they, on business, called at the post office. It is not pretended that deputy postmasters, or a subordinate in any other Department, should servilely copy and adopt the opinions of those who administer the Government; neither is it maintained that official incumbents shall basely cringe or fawn upon those from whom they receive appointments, or become supercilious to the people with whom they are to hold intercourse.

But it is insisted, decidedly, that no subordinate officer has a right, when holding official intercourse with any portion of the people, to insult, wantonly, their feelings, by coarse personal denunciations of the public men for whose patriotism and public services the whole country owes a heavy debt of gratitude. If deputy postmasters entertain such personal contempt for their superiors in office, that they cannot avoid giving vent to it long enough to hand a letter or a newspaper to a customer, let them show that they have more self-respect than love for office, and resign. No spirited overseer, no negro-driver of the South, will hold employment for mere love of power or emolument, if he entertains no respect whatever for his employer. Liberal and enlightened men love to tolerate freedom of speech and freedom of opinion; but no one ought to sympathize with or countenance that intolerance and bigotry which make men denounce as knaves or fools all who differ with them as to the means best calculated to promote the public welfare.

Contrary to my hopes and expectations, the removed postmaster became more and more obnoxious, until a public meeting was held at Clearspring, in the summer of 1835, at which resolutions were adopted recommending his removal. The proceedings of the meeting, signed by a large number of persons, whom I know to be highly respectable and influential citizens, were forwarded to me, to be transmitted to the Postmaster General. This I declined doing. The proceedings were returned through the post office to the committee from whom I had received them, and the hope was still cherished that the proposed removal would become unnecessary; but the conduct of Mr. Ridenour, or his friends, frustrated these expectations. Soon after the proceedings were returned, I have been informed that several persons who had attended the meeting were subjected to taunts and gibes of a provoking character. Persons who called at the store of Mr. Ridenour for their letters and newspapers were directed to go to the store of the gentleman who had been recommended by the meeting to be placed in the office which Mr. R. held; and others who sent to the post office for papers, received therefrom, instead of the papers they had a right to expect, newspapers of an old date, that had been laid by as useless lumber. At that time, the infatuation which led to these foolish jests was unaccountable. Since the proceedings have been published, to which the gentleman from Virginia has referred, I think a clue to them may be found. It is there stated that I had refused to recommend the removal of Mr. Ridenour, unless Dr. Wharton would approve the measure. This is not so. I gave no such pledge. It is probable that an inference of that kind was drawn from what I did do, and that inference may have induced that infatuated and ridiculous conduct which was increased greatly by Mr. R.'s continuance in office. In a letter which accompanied the proceedings of the meeting returned by me, I had requested a gentleman to call on Dr. Wharton, and ask him to do me the justice to explain how and why Ridenour had been appointed; for until then, I had not made known to the public the agency of that gentleman in the matter. He had been named by his friends as my competitor for a seat in Congress, and I was not willing to throw upon him any part of the responsibility of making an unpopular appointment, before the congressional convention at Hagerstown had nominated me for re-election, lest it should be said that I dreaded his competition, and desired to lessen his influence to secure my own nomination. After my nomination had been made, and he had declined being a candidate, I felt no such restraint, and referred a gentleman to him for information. The same gentleman requested the Doctor to sign a memorial recommending Ridenour's removal, which he refused to do; and from this circumstance, I presume, originated the belief that without Dr. Wharton's signature, no memorial to the Postmaster General would be effectual. Whether this erroneous impression was thus derived or not, it is very probable that it was one of the sources, if not the chief source, of that unbecoming conduct of Mr. Ridenour, or his friends, that has been mentioned.

The opinion seems to have prevailed that he would not and could not be removed, unless Dr. Wharton gave his assent to the measure, and he and his friends, instead of a magnanimous forbearance towards those whose attempts had been defeated, practised those insulting jests and taunts which alone would have fully justified the proceedings of the Postmaster General. Another memorial to Mr. Kendall, accompanied by letters furnishing the facts that have been here given, was forwarded to me, to be sent to the Post Office Department. It was forwarded, and has been treated as mentioned in my letter that was read to the House by the gentleman from Virginia.

This is the second time that I have been compelled to trouble the House with explanations concerning matters of which it has no cognizance. Reluctant as I am to engage in these unprofitable and idle discussions, they could not be avoided, unless I was willing to be misunderstood by honorable men here, and have my motives misrepresented before my constituents.

Mr. HARLAN then moved to reduce the salaries proposed in the amendment, according to a schedule prepared by him, according to the now established rate of salaries, with the exception of allowing watchmen four instead of three hundred dollars per annum.

The question was divided, so as to vote first upon all the salaries except that of watchmen.

The yeas and nays having been ordered, the question was taken upon the first part of Mr. HARLAN's proposition, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 84, nays 60.

Mr. HALL, of Maine, moved the previous question. The SPEAKER, being inquired of, said the previous question would apply to the passage of the bill, and would cut off all amendments not adopted by the House, and the section under consideration also, as it had not been finally concurred in.

Mr. HALL then withdrew his motion.

Mr. LANE renewed it.

Mr. ANTHONY moved a call of the House; which was lost.

The motion for the previous question was then rejected.

Mr. ADAMS suggested a further modification, which was accepted by Mr. HARLAN, to give to the messenger, $700; to two assistant messengers, $400 each; to one, $350; and to the two watchmen, $350; and, with these modifications, the section was finally agreed to.

The 46th section, having been adopted in the Committee of the Whole, was next taken up, as follows:

"Sec. 46. Be it further enacted, That the following annual salaries shall be allowed to the Auditor of the Post Office Department, and to the clerks and messengers herein provided for the service of his office, to be paid as aforesaid, viz:

"To the Auditor, $3,000.

"To the chief clerk, $2,000.

"To the four principal clerks, each $1,700.

"To ten clerks, each $1,400.

"To twenty clerks, each $1,200.

"To eight clerks, each $900.

"To the messenger, $900; and to the assistant messenger, $600."

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, the section was amended so as to give the following salaries, viz: To the Auditor, $3,000; to the chief clerk, $1,700; to the four principal clerks, each $1,400; to ten clerks, each $1,000; to twenty clerks, each $800; to eight clerks, each $600; to the messenger, $700; and to the assistant messengers, $450; and, as thus amended, the section was concurred in.

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved an additional section, providing that the act shall take effect from and after the 1st of July next; which was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD renewed his motion, previously made in Committee of the Whole, in relation to boxes and pigeon-holes in post offices, and providing that boxes shall be put, and individuals using them shall pay one dollar annually to the use of the Government.

After some remarks by Messrs. McKIM, HAWES, WHITTLESEY, HOWARD, UNDERWOOD, G. LEE, and PHILLIPS, the question was taken, and decided in the affirmative, 67 to 60.

Mr. PARKER moved an amendment, providing that "all letters or packages sent by such express mail shall be post paid."

Mr. ANTHONY called for the previous question; and the question being taken, the vote stood, yeas 69, nays 40; not a quorum.

A motion to adjourn was made and negatived.

Mr. WARD requested that the motion for the previous question might be withdrawn, in order that the House might consider and act upon the subject of the salaries of postmasters. By the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] the income of their offices in all the principal cities would be materially reduced; and it was necessary, in order to do justice to them, to adjust their compensation anew.

Mr. ANTHONY declined to withdraw.

The question was then taken on seconding the previous question, and the call was sustained.

After which, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

JUNE 2, 1836.]

Additional Paymasters—Hospital at Ocracoke Bar, N. C., &c.

[H. OF R.]

On motion of Mr. CONNOR, the House then took up the bill to establish certain post routes, and concurred in the amendments made in Committee of the Whole; and also adopted several other amendments proposed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and by several members of the House; after which, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House then adjourned.

THURSDAY, JUNE 2.

ADDITIONAL PAYMASTERS.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON asked the consent of the House to move to go into Committee of the Whole, for half an hour only, on the bill to provide for the appointment of three additional paymasters of the army.

Objection being made, Mr. J. moved a suspension of the rule; which was lost.

Mr. McKAY moved to set apart to-morrow, from 11 till 12 o'clock, for the same purpose. Lost.

HOSPITAL AT OCRACOCKE BAR, N. CAROLINA.

Mr. SPEIGHT rose to ask the House to take up the bill to establish a marine hospital at Ocracoke bar, in the State of North Carolina. He would, with the indulgence of the House, state that this was not only of importance to the State from whence he came, but to the whole country, and particularly to the Northern States. Owing to the northeasterly winds which prevailed in that section, and the obstructions to our navigation, vessels were not unfrequently detained for weeks. This was in the sickly season; and, for want of comfortable quarters, a great many seamen died. He stated that there was not a point in the United States where an hospital was more needed than at this place.

The motion was objected to; and a motion by Mr. S. to suspend the rules for the purpose was lost.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The engrossed bill to change the organization of the Post Office Department, and to provide more effectually for the settlement of the accounts of the same, was read a third time.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole, with a view to a particular consideration of the section relating to boxes and pigeon-holes at the larger post offices. He referred to the effect of the section in reducing the compensation of postmasters, and said it would have a disastrous effect, among others, upon the postmaster at New Orleans. When the proposition was made to cut off this source of income, it was said that, after it was cut off, the salaries of the postmasters would be properly and probably raised, but that had not been done; and he felt it to be his duty to make the motion.

Mr. CONNOR hoped the gentleman would withdraw the motion, and allow the bill to go to the Senate, where, no doubt, proper provisions would be made. It was a long bill, of forty-five sections, and could not be properly arranged in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CAMBRELENG supported the same proposition.

Mr. LAWRENCE said he voted for the amendment, upon the expectation that the committee would immediately report a bill to raise the salaries of postmasters in the large cities. He knew well that $2,000 was not an adequate sum for postmasters; and if the salaries were not raised, he should be forced, perhaps against his judgment, to go back to the old system.

Mr. REED hoped the House would not consent to go back to the old system.

Mr. MANN, of New York, alluded to the time that had been spent already upon the bill, and hoped it would be allowed to go to the Senate, when it could be properly amended by the Senate's committee.

Mr. BELL observed that the House were about to pass a bill with which they themselves were dissatisfied, knowing it to be imperfect, but on the presumption that the Senate would amend it. He thought that a very improper mode of legislation. The House had no guarantee that any such amendments would be made by the Senate; and he thought gentlemen had made the suggestion without much reflection. The House ought never to pass a bill which all would agree was imperfect, but should spend the necessary time to amend it.

Mr. JOHNSON then modified his motion, so as to commit, with instructions to strike out the forty-fifth and forty-sixth sections, or to increase the salaries of postmasters in the several large cities and towns in the United States.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, inquired if the committee would be confined to the instructions, or whether they could take up and amend other parts of the bill; and upon being answered that the committee would be bound by and confined to the instructions, he said he should vote for the recommitment. He was opposed to the section, because he thought it would operate much unjustly.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, went into statements to show that the salaries in several cities would be wholly inadequate to support a competent postmaster, and that some of the postmasters in minor offices, if deprived of their perquisites, would suffer severely in the public service.

Mr. BRIGGS hoped the House would not now take up the subject of increasing salaries. It would be almost impossible to do it with justice, with the information now in possession of the House. He hoped the sections would be stricken out, as a monstrous encumbrance to the bill, and that the subject would be more deliberately acted upon hereafter.

Mr. EVERETT was opposed to the instructions, and was not willing to increase the salaries of postmasters. He thought, as all of their clerks and office expenses were provided for by the Government, and as very small talents were required, and the postmaster was a mere supervisor, there would be an abundance of applications from competent persons to obtain the offices, even at $2,000 salary. That salary he thought enough; at any rate, he wished the experiment to be tried at the present salaries, as the bill then stood. There was no office in the country which required so small a modicum of knowledge, and he thought $2,000 per annum an ample compensation for the services.

Mr. GRENELL said he did not feel the alarm expressed by some gentlemen at the operation of this bill. He complained of the imperfect information frequently given to the House; and when upon that the House have matured a measure, at the last moment, some head of a Department or of a bureau would send in information to show that all had been wrong in the understanding of the House. He hoped, though he made no motion, that the operation of the bill, at least in regard to these sections, would be postponed, so as to enable the House to receive further information, and to examine the subject understandingly. He was opposed to going back to the old system.

Mr. REED moved an amendment to the instructions, providing that the bill shall be so amended that these sections shall take effect on the 4th of March next. He said that would give time for proper reports to be made, and at the next session the subject of the salaries might be properly regulated, while this evil practice would be suppressed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD defended the sections. He thought the salaries were sufficiently large; but if they were not, they could be raised. He was opposed to having five and ten thousand dollars a year extorted from the people, more than is allowed by law; and he hoped the operation of the sections would not be postponed a moment, in order to continue the practice.

H. OF R.]

Indian Annuities, &c.—Time of Meeting of Congress.

[JUNE 3, 1836.]

Mr. WISE read the law of extortion, and said this practice came under the definition, and was clearly an indictable offence, punishable with fine and imprisonment, and removal from office. It was extorting money from the people under color and by virtue of office; and when it was known to have existed to so monstrous an extent, he wanted to know why the Government had not instituted prosecutions to punish and suppress it? He said these were bad times, when extortions were not merely tolerated, but when it came up with a bold front and demanded to be sanctioned by law. He referred to the example as well as the effect, and said, that while the salaries of collectors of the customs were less than these exorbitant receipts of postmasters, it would not be long before they would devise some mode of extortion equally efficacious and equally liable to be sanctioned by the Government. Receivers of moneys for public lands, clerks of departments, and even legislators, would follow in the train of corruption to get their fees and rewards. After alluding to many corrupt practices, which, he said, were carried out, or begun to be carried out, by the present administration, he said he wanted the whole understood and ripped up from the foundation. He contended that the salary of $2,000, was sufficient in New York; but if it were not, the salary should be raised, rather than this crime should be allowed and sanctioned by law, and that the effect of the crime, and the example of the crime, should be legalized. He examined the salaries of judges and officers in Maine, none of whom received so much as $2,000, and said that the average of income of respectable lawyers in New York would not amount to that sum. He hoped the sections would not be stricken out, because, if some evils might arise, he knew of none that could be so great as those of the practice which they would correct.

Mr. LANE argued at length to show that this case was not analogous to cases of fraud and extortion; and defended the practice as one of equal convenience to the postmaster and the community. It was a matter of fair bargain, and there was no compulsion, or extortion, or corruption, involved in it.

Mr. JENFER did not think the bill, as it is, would operate injustice to the postmasters, which some members anticipated. He thought the practice an abuse, and wished it discontinued, though he was willing to pay postmasters fair, adequate salaries, and let the people see that they did their duty.

Mr. SPEIGHT, after a few remarks, called for the previous question.

The SPEAKER said the main question will be, "Shall the bill pass?" cutting off the motion to commit.

The previous question having been seconded—yeas 67, nays 57—the question, Shall the bill pass? was put, and carried in the affirmative, without a division.

INDIAN ANNUITIES, &c.

Mr. CAMBRELENG remarked that the "fortification bill" was properly the first in order, but there was another bill, for "Indian annuities," returned from the Senate with some important amendments, which was much more urgent than any other, and which he hoped would be taken up.

Mr. EVERETT hoped the bill would be postponed till to-morrow, inasmuch as it would bring up a debate, and the necessary documents had not all come in, in relation to the origin of the Seminole war.

Mr. CAMBRELENG would merely state that this bill was sent to the Senate two months ago, and remained there unacted upon until the War Department wrote and urged the Senate to act upon it. If, however, a discussion was to arise respecting the origin of the Seminole war, the sooner it was brought on the better. The people of Georgia, Alabama, and Florida, were suffering for want of the passage of this bill. He moved, therefore, that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; which was agreed to, and

The House accordingly went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. SMITH in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the bill "making appropriations for the current expenses of the Indian department, for Indian annuities, and for other similar objects, for the year 1836."

The following amendments of the Senate were agreed to without a division:

1st. "For the payment of a clerk in the office of the superintendent of Indian affairs for the Territory of Wisconsin, $800."

2d. "For the payment of interest on an annuity on $1,000 to the Cherokees, by the treaty of the 24th of October, 1804, and which was not paid till the year 1825, $12,600; which sum shall be paid in the same manner and in the same proportions, to the Cherokees east and west of the Mississippi, that the annuity itself is payable."

3d. "Provided, however, That no part of the appropriation for the Florida Indians shall be paid to any Indians who have been engaged in hostilities against the United States, unless in such change of circumstances as may induce the President of the United States to direct the same to be paid."

The fourth amendment of the Senate was to increase the item for "locating reservations, and certifying contracts, under the treaty with the Creeks of the 24th of March, 1832," from $7,000 to $14,000.

Mr. BELL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, moved to disagree to this amendment, and entered into a minute explanation in relation thereto.

After some remarks from Messrs. LAWLER, GLASCOCK, HAYNES, TOWNS, CAMBRELENG, OWENS, BELL, and LEWIS,

Mr. LEWIS moved an amendment to the Senate's amendment, authorizing the President of the United States to appoint additional agents for certifying and for investigating frauds, if he shall deem it necessary.

The amendment was discussed by Messrs. BELL, McKAY, ASHLEY, GLASCOCK, LEWIS, LYON, HAWES, TOWNS, and OWENS.

At the suggestion of Mr. BELL, both amendments were passed over for the present, and the committee proceeded to the consideration of the other amendments, some of which were concurred in.

On motion of Mr. BELL, the committee rose and reported progress.

The Speaker having resumed the chair,
On motion of Mr. BELL, the bill was made the special order of the day from the hour of 12 o'clock to-morrow. The House then adjourned.

FRIDAY, JUNE 3.

TIME OF MEETING OF CONGRESS.

A bill from the Senate, proposing to change the time of the meeting of Congress, and to fix a day for the adjournment of the long session, was read the first and second time.

[This bill proposed that Congress should assemble on the first Monday of the month of November in each year, and that the adjournment of the first session should take place on the second Monday in May, unless the two Houses should otherwise provide.]

JUNE 3, 1836.]

Time of Meeting of Congress.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WARDWELL said, unless some very good reasons were offered why the bill should be committed, he hoped it would be considered at once. For himself, he could see no necessity for committing it at all.

Mr. SPEIGHT hoped it would be committed, or at least, if it did pass, he hoped it would undergo some alteration. He moved that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

After some remarks from Messrs. MERCER, WHITTLESEY of Ohio, GLASCOCK, and McKENNAN, Mr. WHITTLESEY and Mr. SPEIGHT, respectively, withdrew their motions.

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved that the House then take up the bill.

Mr. PATTON moved to lay it on the table. Lost.

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved to postpone it till Thursday next. Lost.

Mr. GILLET said he was in favor of the principle of the bill, which anticipated an earlier meeting of Congress and a much earlier adjournment of the long session. Our sessions were clearly extended too late in the season for the health of the members, or the proper despatch of public business. Our meeting is at a time extremely injurious to the health of those who come from a great distance. The constitution gives us the power of fixing the time of meeting, but leaves the question of adjournment untouched. Now, though he was favorably impressed with the proposition to meet earlier, he had strong doubts whether we have, by the constitution, the power to prescribe to our successors the time at which they shall terminate their labors. It was his impression that the constitution contemplated that each House should judge for itself. It prescribes, in case of disagreement, that the President may adjourn Congress to such time as he shall see fit. His mind had been brought to the conclusion that each Congress must judge for itself as to its time of adjournment. But he might be wrong, and he wished the opinion of the Judiciary Committee on that point. If he was wrong, and should be convinced of that fact, he should cheerfully vote accordingly. That committee might give us an argument which should set him right. Until then, he must follow the convictions of his judgment, and vote against the bill. He could not consent to attempt to control future Congresses. They will be accountable to the people, and they ought not to be so shocked as not to be fully responsible for all their acts. If they should be adjourned by this law without transacting the public business, they would charge the fault upon this Congress. In order to have this subject fully examined and properly understood, he therefore renewed the motion to commit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

After some further remarks from Mr. R. M. JOHNSON,

Mr. BRIGGS inquired of the Speaker if it would be in order to move to amend the bill by striking out that clause which prescribes the day of adjournment of the long sessions?

The SPEAKER said that the motion would not be in order pending the present motion to commit to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BRIGGS said the bill contained two propositions: one fixing the first Monday of November for the annual meeting of Congress, and the second Monday of May for the adjournment of the first session of each future Congress. As he believed the House was now prepared to act upon the subject, he hoped the motion to commit would not prevail. He was in favor of the first part of the bill, but opposed to that part of it which undertakes to fix the day of adjournment of a future Congress, because, in his opinion, it came in direct conflict with the third section of the second article of the constitution of the United States. By that section of the constitution, if the two Houses of Congress "shall disagree with respect to the day of adjournment, the President may adjourn them to such time as he shall think proper." The bill declares that such adjournment shall take place on the second Monday of May, unless the two Houses, by joint resolution, shall fix upon a different day. Should both Houses be opposed to that day, by force of this law that must be the time; though, by the constitution, the President, in case of such disagreement, has the power to fix the day. This law, in such a case, takes away this clear and explicit constitutional right of the Executive. For this reason, he was opposed to that part of the bill. He hoped, however, the House would proceed at once to act upon the subject; strike out the last clause, and pass that part of the bill which fixes an earlier day for the future meeting of Congress.

After some remarks from Mr. VANDERPOEL,

Mr. THOMSON, of Ohio, called for the orders of the day.

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved to suspend the rules till twelve o'clock, for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of this bill; which was agreed to without a count.

The bill was then taken up, and, on motion of Mr. OWENS, read through by the Clerk.

Mr. PATTON briefly opposed it, and Mr. HARDIN made a few remarks in support of it; when

Mr. VANDERPOEL said that his colleague [Mr. GILLET] had moved to refer the bill to the Judiciary Committee, and he hoped that that motion would not, in any event, prevail; as every gentleman was, no doubt, now ready to vote finally on the bill; and he would ask the Chair what the main question would now be, if the previous question were ordered?

The CHAIR replied that the main question would be, whether the bill should be ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. VANDERPOEL demanded the previous question, which was seconded by the House—taken by tellers: Yeas 90, nays 39; and the main question was ordered to be put without a count.

Mr. SPEIGHT asked for the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered.

The main question, on ordering the bill to a third reading, was then taken, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 119, nays 66. So the bill was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. ADAMS moved to recommit the bill to a select committee, with instructions to strike out that part of it referring to the time of the adjournment of Congress, as he deemed that provision to be unconstitutional.

Mr. BELL moved to amend the instructions, by providing that the bill be further amended, so as to limit the commencement of Congress on the first Monday of November to the second session only, or every other year.

Mr. TOUCEY contended that the provision prescribing the time of adjournment was at variance with the constitution, and totally conflicted with the fifth clause of that instrument. It was a clear, palpable, manifest violation of the constitution. Moreover, he was unwilling that the House of Representatives should put themselves within the control of the Senate, a smaller body, which would be the effect of the passage of this bill.

Mr. SPEIGHT also opposed the bill. He said the very time of meeting (in November) was, of all other seasons in the year, the most important for the Southern farmer. He also took the ground of the unconstitutionality of the second provision of the bill, in reference to the day of adjournment.

The hour of twelve having arrived, the special order was announced by the Chair.

Potomac Bridge—Indian Annuities, &c.

[JUNE 3, 1836.]

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON moved a postponement of the same for one hour, for the purpose of continuing the consideration of the subject then pending; which was agreed to: Yeas 123, nays not counted.

Mr. SPEIGHT concluded his remarks in support of the motion to recommitt.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, was opposed to the bill, and had so shown by his vote. It was evident, however, that a very large majority of the House were in favor of it; and as there would therefore be no use in a lengthy discussion, he demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded by the House. Yeas 80, nays 59; and the main question was ordered to be put without a count.

Mr. SPEIGHT asked for the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered.

The main question being on the passage of the bill, it was then taken, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 101, nays 81. So the bill was passed.

POTOMAC BRIDGE.

A message was received from the President of the United States, on the subject of the damage sustained by the Potomac bridge; and was read, as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith transmit a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to the injuries sustained by the bridge across the Potomac river during the recent extraordinary rise of water, and would respectfully recommend to the early attention of Congress the legislation therein suggested.

ANDREW JACKSON.

WASHINGTON, June 3, 1836.

To the President of the United States:

The undersigned would respectfully report that, early yesterday morning information was received that, from the extraordinary height of the water in the Potomac river, caused by the recent protracted storm, great quantities of flood wood, and the large mud machine and scows employed near Georgetown, had been drifted against the Potomac bridge, and were much endangering its safety.

Though his power over the bridge, since reporting its completion, in most respects, to Congress, last December, was considered doubtful for this purpose, yet, as no law had since passed authorizing any other person to assume the charge of it, the undersigned did not hesitate, under the urgent circumstances before named, to take immediate steps for its preservation. Men were employed, with suitable means, and all the exertion used which the violence of the freshet would permit, to remove the boats and other substances which threatened most damage.

But notwithstanding every effort, considerable injury in the course of the day was caused near the southwestern draw, not far from which the machine and scows had lodged, and some slight damage was done elsewhere, so that the bridge cannot be again passable without repairs.

The engineer now attending to the bridge estimates that the balance of the old appropriation to build it, which is still unexpended, would, if made applicable to this purpose, be sufficient to put the bridge again in good condition.

Considering the importance to this city, and the adjoining country, of the passing over the bridge being speedily restored, and the doubts whether this balance can be so applied, and by whom, without some new and special authority from Congress, it is respectfully suggested that the attention of that body be immediately invited to this subject; and, as heretofore recommended, that the charge of the bridge, including these repairs, be placed under the superintendence of the Commissioner of the Public Buildings, rather than of the Treasury Department.

LEVI WOODBURY,

Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, June 3, 1836.

Mr. W. B. SHEPARD asked and obtained leave to introduce the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to have all repairs made to the bridge across the Potomac river, which have become necessary from the late flood, and that the expenses of said repairs be paid out of the money heretofore appropriated for the erection of said bridge, and which is now in the Treasury unexpended.

The resolution was twice read, and, after some remarks from Messrs. MERCER and SHEPARD, it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time this day.

INDIAN ANNUITIES, &c.

In execution of the special order of yesterday, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SMITH in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill "making appropriations for the current expenses of the Indian department, for Indian annuities, and for other similar objects, for the year 1836."

The bill had passed the House some time since, and was returned from the Senate with sundry amendments.

The question pending was the motion of Mr. BELL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to disagree to the Senate's amendment increasing the item for "locating reservations, and certifying contracts, under the treaty with the Creeks of the 24th of March, 1832," from $7,000 to $14,000.

Mr. LEWIS had yesterday moved an amendment to the Senate's amendment, authorizing the President of the United States to appoint additional agents for certifying and for investigating frauds, if he should deem it necessary.

Mr. LEWIS withdrew his amendment.

Mr. BELL produced a document from the War Department, stating that $7,000 would be sufficient for the purposes of the object to be accomplished.

The amendment of the Senate was then disagreed to. The ninth amendment of the Senate was then read, as follows:

"For the removal of Creek Indians, and their subsistence for one year, including subsistence of those recently removed, in addition to the balance of one hundred and fifty-five thousand dollars of former appropriations, three hundred and forty-eight thousand two hundred and thirty dollars."

"For the removal of Seminole Indians, and their subsistence for one year, in addition to a balance of thirty-three thousand dollars of former appropriations, one hundred and fifty-eight thousand four hundred and thirty-seven dollars and fifty cents."

Mr. BELL, under instructions from the Committee on Indian Affairs, moved that the Committee of the Whole House agree to this amendment, with the following amendments:

Before the word "Creek," in the first line, insert "twenty-one thousand."

Strike out "three hundred and forty-eight thousand two hundred and thirty," and insert, in lieu thereof, "one million and twenty-three thousand five hundred and fifty."

Strike out "one hundred and fifty-eight thousand four hundred and thirty-seven dollars and fifty cents," and insert, in lieu thereof, "one hundred thousand dollars."

JUNE 3, 1836.]

Indian Annuities, &c.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. EVERETT proposed a substitute for the above, to come in after the Senate's amendment, as follows: "Under the 12th article of the Creek treaty of 1832, and for holding treaties with the hostile Indians east of the river Mississippi, and to their removal west of that river, $675,330." Mr. EVERETT said he had not expected to address the House on any subject connected with our Indian relations until a few days ago. The inquiry into the causes of the Indian hostilities had been brought before the Committee on Indian Affairs, and the papers relating to it had been referred to him for examination. He had intended before the close of the session to present his views in the shape of a report. When, however, this amendment was adopted in that committee—an amendment placing at the disposal of the Executive more than a million of dollars, for the removal of the whole Creek nation by force, in violation of an existing treaty—he had felt himself compelled to change his purpose, and to present his views to the House whenever that amendment should be considered. Should that pass, a report would be to but little purpose.

He regretted that this extraordinary appropriation should have been attached to an ordinary appropriation bill. It placed him in the dilemma of being charged with obstructing the passage of the bill, of the urgency of which no one was more sensible than himself; or with the responsibility of permitting a measure to pass in silence, which, in his conscience, he believed to be repugnant to our most sacred obligations, and of the most hazardous tendency. He had desired that this appropriation should have been reported in a separate bill. Had it been so, this bill would have passed as soon as it was reported, and all delay would have been avoided. He did not, therefore, consider himself responsible for the delay. This was not the first time that important measures had been attempted to be carried through on the back of a general appropriation bill. The House was sufficiently forewarned of the consequences. The blame would rest on those who first interposed the obstacle. Mr. E. said, the country being in fact in a state of war, without stopping to inquire by whose fault we had become involved in it, he had voted for every appropriation asked for defence, and as soon as it was asked. But the present question relates to the future, and to consequences which demand that it should not pass without investigation.

Mr. EVERETT requested the Clerk to read the 12th article of the Creek treaty of the 24th of March, 1832.

"Art. 12. The United States are desirous that the Creeks should remove to the country west of the Mississippi, and join their countrymen there; and, for this purpose, it is agreed that, as fast as the Creeks are prepared to emigrate, they shall be removed at the expense of the United States, and shall receive subsistence while upon the journey, and for one year after their arrival at their new homes: Provided, however, That this article shall not be construed so as to compel any Creek Indian to emigrate, but they shall be free to go or stay, as they please."

This, Mr. Chairman, is the obligation we have assumed; this is the right we have guaranteed to every Creek Indian—to go or stay, as he pleases. To render this right of value, to enable the Creeks to subsist themselves where they were, if they choose to remain, the treaty secured to ninety principal chiefs, each, 640 acres of land, and to every other head of a Creek family 320 acres. These reservations are their homes, on which they are entitled to remain. But from these it is now proposed to remove them by force.

The amendment proposes to remove 21,000 Creeks; that is the estimated number of the whole nation. It does not, in terms, propose to remove them by force; that purpose is, however, avowed explicitly in the letter of the Secretary of War to the committee, asking for the appropriation; and if the appropriation be granted, the Executive will consider himself authorized to use it, and will use it for the purpose for which it was asked. This letter is dated on the 19th of May, and states: "The state of affairs among the Creek Indians in Alabama has induced the President to direct the necessary measures to be taken for their removal. Heretofore, the instructions have been in conformity with the treaty—to remove them as they were voluntarily prepared to go. But actual hostilities have commenced, and it is essential to their existence, as well as to the safety of the settlements in contact with them, that they should be established in their country west of the Mississippi, without delay. The right to remove them by force, if necessary, results from the attitude in which they have placed themselves, by the commencement of hostilities," &c.

Here, then, Mr. Chairman, is our treaty obligation on the one hand, and the power claimed on the other. On what ground is it claimed? It can be claimed only on the ground that the treaty is dissolved by a war on the part of the Creek nation. An act of hostility by an individual, or one of the bands of the tribe, would not have that effect. No, sir; it must be a war between the Creek nation and the United States; that only would dissolve the obligation of the treaty; and before this House sanctions the exercise of this high power—this war power, of removing the whole Creek nation by force—it should be satisfied that the Creek nation has made war upon us, as a national act. On what evidence is this House called upon to act? On a letter from the Secretary of War to a committee, stating that actual hostilities have commenced, unaccompanied by any evidence of the character or extent of those hostilities. It gives us no facts on which his declaration is founded, to enable the House to judge if the right to remove the Creeks by force is justifiable. Are we to act on this declaration? Are we to collect our facts from newspapers, private letters, or rumors? And if we should, what do they all amount to? From no source that can be relied on have I sufficient evidence to believe that, at the date of this letter, any white man had seen twenty-five Creeks imbedded in arms. True, this is no evidence that more have not been in arms. But I should not be surprised if it should turn out that the whole number was then less than two hundred and fifty.

There is, however, some negative testimony. I will refer the committee to a semi-official publication in the Globe of the 30th of May. It states that "Colonel Hogan wrote, on the 24th of April, that there was no more disposition among the Creeks of the upper towns for hostilities than there was among the citizens of Washington, and that he did not believe there was any such disposition among the Creeks of the lower towns." This letter was received here on the 5th, and "on that day Governor Clay was again informed that, should the Indians meditate hostilities, any force he might find necessary to call out for the protection of the inhabitants would be received into the service of the United States. The same information and the same authority was given to Governor Schley, on the 13th of May." This is the account of the Indian hostilities, as published on the 30th of May. The orders of the Governors of Alabama and Georgia do not refer to actual hostilities, but to meditated hostilities.

But, sir, if a state of war exists, why has no communication of the fact been made by the President? I do not go the length of saying there should be no communication between the heads of the Departments and the committees of this House. In matters of minor consequence, convenience requires it. But, sir, on questions involving a change of our relations with nations with whom we have treaties—on questions of peace and war—I hold that a head of Department and committees of the House are not the proper organs of communication between the Executive and Congress. Such communication should be made by the President, and to both Houses, to whom it appertains to take order thereon. Measures new and important are not to be sprung upon the House through a report of a committee. The President is the only constitutional organ of communication between the executive and legislative departments. It is his constitutional duty, "from time to time, to give to Congress information of the state of the Union, and to recommend such measures as he shall judge expedient." Sir, I would hold him to his duty—to this responsibility. If the House acts on its own motion, on its own information, it acts on its own responsibility. That responsibility, for one, I am not willing, in this instance, to assume.

Indian Annuities, &c.

Mr. Chairman, I now offer an amendment, as a substitute for the amendment of the committee. I do not propose to lessen the appropriation, but to restrict its application. I do not make it a question of amount, but of principle. I am willing to give the Executive ample means to remove all the Indians, but propose to divide the amount, so that a part shall be applicable to the removal of those who please to go, and the residue to those who may be in arms; but that no part shall be applicable to those who are neither hostile nor willing to remove. This amendment will be applicable to the Seminoles as well as to the Creeks, and will also enable the Executive to resort to pacific as well as warlike measures for their removal.

The amendment, as it came from the Senate, was for a removal of the Creeks who should voluntarily assent to go, and was based on the removal of 12,000.

For this purpose, in addition to an unexpended balance of	-	-	$155,000
It appropriated the sum of	-	-	348,230
			<hr/> 503,230

To this the committee of the House have added, under the call of the Secretary of War, on an estimate for removing the residue of the nation,	-	-	675,320
			<hr/> 1,178,550

And to this may be added, for the removal of the Seminoles, an unexpended balance of	-	$33,000
And an additional appropriation of	-	100,000
		<hr/> 133,000

Making, for the removal of the Creeks and Seminoles,	-	-	$1,311,550
--	---	---	-------------

Should the substitute be adopted, the amendment will stand: "For the removal of the Creek Indians, and their subsistence for one year, including subsistence for those recently removed, in addition to one hundred and fifty-five thousand dollars of former appropriations, three hundred and forty-eight thousand two hundred and thirty dollars, under the 12th article of the Creek treaty of 1832.

"For holding treaties with the hostile Indians east of the Mississippi river, and for their removal west of that river, six hundred and seventy-five thousand three hundred and twenty dollars."

Mr. Chairman, this presents the important question in relation to all the hostile Indians, Creeks and Seminoles, shall force be the only means of effecting their removal? I propose a pacific measure; and by the term in the appropriation, "for holding treaties," to indicate to the Executive the opinion of this House, in the hope that it will not be disregarded.

It seems to be taken for granted by some gentlemen that we cannot, consistently with our national honor, hold treaties, or even attempt a pacification of hostile Indians. It is said by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. LAWLER] that they must be whipped before they can be removed. What, sir! send whipped Indians west of the Mississippi! Of that I have a word to say hereafter. Our honor! What of honor have we gained already in our attempt to whip the Seminoles? And what of honor must be gained, if, by extermination, we make a grand finale of the hostile tribes? But, sir, this is also a question of interest. I will thank the Clerk to state the amount already appropriated on account of these Indian hostilities—[$2,620,000, besides rations to the starving inhabitants]—more will be immediately required. Add to this the expense of another campaign, of an army of 5,000. And to this the amount of the losses of the inhabitants of Florida and Alabama—some millions more. This, though an individual loss, is not the less a loss to the country. Possibly it may become a direct national loss. On that question I do not intend to commit myself; but, sir, if the sufferers claim indemnity, they will, as their only ground, base their claims on the fact that their loss was occasioned (to use the mildest phrase) by an improvident act of the Government. In addition to all this, look to the loss of human life.

It is evident, sir, that the Seminole war was the immediate cause of the Creek hostilities. Other causes have no doubt concurred—causes of irritation, producing a predisposition to hostility, called into action by the success of the Seminoles. What shall be done? Shall we fight it out to the last, or attempt a pacification? Sir, in selecting our course, much will depend on the answer to the question, "is our quarrel just?" And it is time this question was answered.

In answering this question, I shall take occasion to inquire into the causes of the Seminole war. I shall stop where the war commenced, leaving it for others to examine into the manner in which it has been conducted. I pass this over to the military gentlemen of the House—to the Committee on Military Affairs—to institute the proper inquiry. I have no doubt they will do their duty.

Preliminary to the investigation, I will suggest two considerations, which should be borne in mind during the investigation. The first is, the unequal terms on which we always treat with the Indian tribes—our superior intelligence—their necessities—the fact that our treaties are, as they say, white men's treaties, made in our language, translated by our interpreters, and by them imperfectly understood, and imperfectly remembered. The other is, that we are our own historians; we tell the whole story; they, particularly the Seminoles, were refused permission to send a delegation here to tell their part of the story. In reply to their application, they were told, "This made the President angry." From considerations such as these, in all questions of doubt, proper allowances should be made in their favor.

I will also notice some things of minor importance, which may have had an unfavorable influence—the eager desire of the whites to obtain their land. General Eaton, in his letter of the 8th of March, 1835, says:

"The people here want the lands on which they (the Seminoles) reside; and they will urge a removal, fas aut nefas; and the Big Swamp, which, in the treaty, is declared to be the first of their country to be vacated, is of high repute; and it is that on which the eyes of speculators are fixed."

The unprincipled desire to obtain their negroes. General Thompson, in his letter of the 28th of October, 1834, says:

"There are many very likely negroes in this nation; some of the whites in the adjacent settlements manifest a restless desire to obtain them; and I have no doubt that Indian-raised negroes now in possession of the whites, some of the negroes in the nation, with some of the Indians, have been induced, by bribery or otherwise, to stir up hostility among the Indians to the intended emigration, for the purpose of detaining the negroes here until the territorial jurisdiction shall be extended over the Indian country, so as to enable fraudulent claimants to prosecute their claims in the territorial courts," &c. The opposing influence of the negroes, excited by the fear of their being sold to slave-dealers.

General Thompson, in his letter of the 27th of April, 1835, a letter of great interest, says:

"Application was made to me this morning for permission to purchase negroes of the Seminole Indians, under a letter from the office of Indian affairs, addressed to General Call, in which the Commissioner says, as there is no law prohibiting the sale of slaves by the Indians, there is no necessity for the interference of the department to allow the Indians a privilege which they already have." "The negroes in the nation dread the idea of being transferred from their present state of ease and comparative liberty, to bondage and hard labor under overseers on sugar and cotton plantations. They have always had a great influence on the Indians. They live in villages, separate, and, in many cases, remote from their owners, enjoying equal liberty with their owners, and with the single exception that the slave supplies his owner annually, from the product of his little field, with corn in proportion to the amount of the crop; in no instance that has come to my knowledge, exceeding ten bushels; the residue is considered the property of the slave. Many of these slaves have stocks of horses, cows, and hogs, with which the Indian owner never assumes the right to intermeddle. I am thus particular on this point, that you may understand the true cause of the abhorrence of the negroes of even the idea of any change; and the indulgence so extended by the owner to the slave will enable you to credit the assertion that an Indian would almost as soon sell his child as his slave, except when in a state of intoxication."

On this occasion, sir, General Thompson did his duty—he refused permission to the applicants to purchase slaves or to say any thing on the subject. The answer to this letter is not among the papers in my possession.

In this investigation, I shall endeavor to confine myself to our own record. I regret, sir, that the documents just laid on your table are not printed, and in the hands of all the members, that they might go along with me, page by page. I desired that the discussion should be delayed a day or two for that purpose. But it is the pleasure of the House that the discussion shall now proceed.

On the 8th of January, 1821, the Creek treaty of Indian Springs was concluded. At that time the Seminole band was a component part of the Creek nation. To this treaty I shall have occasion to refer hereafter.

On the 18th of September 1823, the treaty of Camp Moultrie was concluded with the Seminoles, they having then separated from the Creeks. By this treaty we engaged to pay them annuities for twenty years, and guaranteed to them their narrow limits. They were restricted from the seacoast, and confined to the hammocks and swamps, which they are now defending to the last drop of blood. Miserable as their country is, they cling to it with the grasp of death. This treaty, unless abrogated by a subsequent treaty, was an existing treaty at the commencement of the present war.

On the 9th of May, 1832, the Seminole treaty of Payne's Landing was concluded. The Seminoles have alleged that it was forced upon them. But, sir, in our own story I find no evidence of the fact; all that I find is, that at that time they were in a state of starvation; we deemed it a fit occasion for holding a treaty. We were not, however, the cause of their famine; nor were we accountable for its consequences. We did no more than to take all due advantage of the fact.

I ask the Clerk to read the preamble and the 7th article:

"The Seminole Indians, regarding with just respect the solicitude manifested by the President of the United States for the improvement of their condition, by recommending their removal to a country more suitable to their habits and wants than the one they at present occupy in the Territory of Florida, are willing that their confidential chiefs, Jumper, Fuch-a-lus-ti-co-had-jo, Charley Emartla, Coi-had-jo, Holati-Emartla, Yaha-hadjo, Sam Jones, accompanied by their faithful interpreter, Abraham, should be sent, at the expense of the United States, as early as convenient, to examine the country assigned to the Creeks west of the Mississippi river; and should they be satisfied with the character of that country, and of the favorable disposition of the Creeks to reunite with the Seminoles as one people, the articles of the compact and agreement herein stipulated at Payne's Landing, on the Ocklawaha river, this ninth day of May, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, between James Gadsden for and in behalf of the United States, and the undersigned chiefs and headmen for and in behalf of the Seminole Indians, shall be binding on the respective parties."

"ARTICLE VII. The Seminole Indians will remove within three (3) years after the ratification of this agreement, and the expenses of their removal shall be defrayed by the United States; and such subsistence shall also be furnished them, for a term not exceeding twelve (12) months, after their arrival at their new residence, as in the opinion of the President their numbers and circumstances may require; the emigration to commence as early as practicable in the year eighteen hundred and thirty-three (1833;) and with those Indians occupying the Big Swamp, and other parts of the country, beyond the limits as defined in the second article of the treaty concluded at Camp Moultrie creek, so that the whole of that proportion of the Seminoles may be removed within the year aforesaid; and the remainder of the tribe, in about equal proportions, during the subsequent years of eighteen hundred and thirty-four and five (1834 and 1835.)"

In relation to this treaty, I shall now, Mr. Chairman, endeavor to sustain the three following positions:

I. That the treaty never became obligatory on the Seminoles.

II. That the Government have attempted to execute it contrary to their own interpretation.

III. That they have attempted to execute it by an act of war, before the commission of any hostile act on the part of the Seminoles.

If I sustain these positions, I shall have shown, satisfactorily, the causes of the Seminole war; and answered the question, "is our quarrel just?"

The treaty of Payne's Landing never became obligatory on the Seminoles.

1. Because the condition precedent, on which alone it could become obligatory, was not fulfilled.

That condition, in substance, was, that the Seminole delegation should, after visiting the Western country, be satisfied with the character of the country to which they proposed to emigrate; and, also, of the favorable disposition of the Creeks (who were entitled to the country, and with whom it was proposed they should hereafter reside) to reunite with the Seminoles as one people.

The delegation visited the Western country, and, before their return, or having any communication with their tribe, on the 28th March, 1833, at Fort Gibson, signed articles with our commissioners, by which they expressed themselves satisfied with the character of the country, and of the favorable disposition of the Creeks to unite with the Seminoles as one people. This, on the face of it, with the exception of the change of the word unite for reunite, is a literal declaration of what was required by the treaty. But was it a substantial compliance? Was it an act of which, in good faith, we ought to avail ourselves? Is the complaint of the Indians without cause? General Thompson, in his letter of the 28th October, 1834, states it in their own language: "Jumper says they agreed at Payne's Landing to go and examine the country; but they were not bound to move to it until the nation should agree to it after the return of the delegation."

The delegation were their confidential chiefs—the agents of the Seminoles; or, if you please, umpires, authorized to determine for them. But, sir, were not the Seminoles to be heard before them as well as the United States? They were not heard. The delegation went to visit the West, and there, before returning to consult the Seminoles, surrounded by the whites, signed their determination. The Seminoles complained, and with justice, that the determination was made on an ex parte hearing. On their return, the delegation reported that they were satisfied with the country and the Creeks there. But their objection was to the hostile disposition of the surrounding tribes; that they saw scalps brought in. They were then told treaties would be made with the hostile tribes, of which they would be informed. Sir, they claimed a right to be heard, before their delegation made a final decision.

But, sir, this is not the most material part of the objection. A part of the condition was, that the delegation should be satisfied with the disposition of the Creeks—of the Creek nation—to reunite with them as one people. I now ask the attention of the committee to the facts.

By a treaty concluded with the Creek nation east of the Mississippi, on the 24th March, 1832, almost contemporaneous with the Seminole treaty, the country west of the Mississippi was secured to the Creek nation. The emigration commenced; and it appears, by a document annexed to the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs of February, 1834, that the whole number of the Creeks who had emigrated to the west was only 2,459; while the number remaining east was 22,638. The assent of the delegation to the supplemental treaty, declaring themselves satisfied, was yielded on the 28th March, 1833: they had, therefore, consulted only this small portion west. This was known to our commissioners at the time, and to our Government before the ratification of the treaty. This is no technical ground of objection. But a consequence resulted that formed a substantial reason why the Seminoles should decline to emigrate.

While a component part of the Creek nation, the Seminoles were a separate band, and, as such, were united with the Creeks. The treaty of Payne's Landing contemplated a reunion—not an amalgamation. By the treaty concluded with the Creeks west, on the 14th February, 1833, and the supplemental Seminole treaty of 28th March, 1833, the Seminoles were to be located by themselves, and a tract of land was designated for their location. Their rights to any location depended entirely on the assent of the Creek nation. The Creeks west assented for themselves only; but, in relation to this, the Creeks east were neither consulted nor informed. The fact of this treaty of the Creeks west was concealed from them. Perhaps the term concealed is too strong; it was, however, not communicated to them. These, as inferences, are drawn from a document which I will now ask the Clerk to read. It is a letter from General Eaton to the Secretary of War, of the 8th

March, 1835, to a portion of which I will ask the attention of the committee:

"There is another difficulty in the minds of these people: a separate tract, out of the Creek lands, has been set apart for their homes. There is a ratified treaty in your office, made by General Stokes, Ellsworth, and Schermerhorn, with the Creeks, which authorizes the location. While negotiating with the Indians last year, at Washington, I understood the Creeks discovered this act, and had sent word to the Seminole bands that, while they were willing to receive them in their limits as a portion of their nation, they would not suffer them to enjoy any separate allotment of their soil. This, too, has intimidated them, and is, I dare say, the essential cause of their reluctance to go off."

Yes, sir, in the winter of 1834, they discovered this western Creek treaty, making the separate location: they rejected it; they had a right so to do; they sent word to the Seminoles that they would not agree to it. And this, General Eaton says, was, in his opinion, the essential cause of their refusal to go off. But how was this material? What objection could the Seminoles have to an amalgamation with the Creek nation? I ask the attention of the committee to the grounds of their objection.

By the Creek treaty of 1821, before mentioned, it was agreed that the sum of $250,000 of the money to be paid to the Creeks for the cession of their lands should be paid to citizens of Georgia, for property taken or destroyed by the Creeks (then including the Seminoles) prior to the passage of the intercourse act of 1802, and which was accordingly reserved, and subsequently paid. The spoliation provided for must have taken place nineteen years before this treaty, and during these nineteen years individuals claimed and possessed the property originally taken from the citizens of Georgia. The treaty on the part of the Creeks could never have been intended to disturb the rights of individuals of the tribes, or any of its bands. Between the date of that treaty and that of the Seminole treaty of 1832, no such claim was set up. In the mean time, intermarriages had taken place between the Seminoles and their slaves. The first we hear of any claim was prior to the ratification of the treaty of Payne's Landing. General Thompson, in his report of the 1st of January, 1834, to Governor Duval, and by him enclosed to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on the 20th, says: "The principal causes which operate to cherish this feeling hostile to emigration are, first, the fear that their reunion with the Creeks, which will subject them to the government and control of the Creeks' national council, will be a surrender of a large negro property to the Creeks, as antagonist claimants." "The Creeks' claim to the negroes now in possession of the Seminoles grows out of the treaty of 1821." They have an agent now in the Seminole country urging the claim of the Creeks to negroes, or their descendants, which formed a part of the consideration for which the Creeks consented to pay the $250,000 to the Georgia claimants." It will be seen that the claim thus brought forward in 1834 referred to transactions of thirty-two years' standing, and was for negroes taken, and their descendants—for the wives and children of the Seminoles.

General Thompson, in his letter to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs of the 15th July, 1834, again refers to this claim, in connexion with the subject of amalgamation. "If, as a distinct body, under the protection and control of their own chiefs, located on the territory assigned to them adjoining the Creeks, the Seminoles would be afraid that a general council of the two tribes would deprive them of the slaves in question, it seems to me that their fears could not fail to be greatly increased by a promiscuous introduction of them among the Creeks, which would reduce their chiefs to privates, and subject them and their slaves more certainly to the entire control of the Creeks." Thus, sir, it appears their objection to amalgamation was founded on substantial reasons. Nor were they bound by the treaty to amalgamate with the Creeks; nor were the Creeks east bound by the act of the Creeks west, assigning them a separate location. The country west was ceded to the whole Creek nation; no part of it could be ceded to the Seminoles, without the assent of the Creek nation; neither the first 10 Creek emigrants, nor the first 100 nor the first 2,459, had the right to cede the whole or any part of the territory.

Indian Annuities, &c.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, it appears, in point of fact, that the delegation signed the supplementary treaty at Fort Gibson, surrounded by our commissioners and people, without consulting their tribe; that they never consulted the Creeks east; that no location was made that was authorized by the Creek nation; and that this was known to the commissioners at the time the supplemental treaty was signed. In addition to this, that the Creeks east insisted on their amalgamation, the Creeks west had agreed only to a reunion; that the Seminoles, for substantial reasons, refused to amalgamate, and that all this was known to our Government before the ratification of the treaty. The act, then, of the delegation, however formal, was an act done without authority, and, in its operation, in fraud of the rights of the Seminoles. Can, then, the United States honestly or decently avail themselves of this act as evidence of the fulfilment of the condition precedent?

It should be borne in mind that the question raised is between the parties to the treaty, and not between one of the parties and its citizens, or between the executive and legislative power.

The next objection to the validity of the treaty is, that it was not ratified on our part, and an appropriation made to carry it into effect, until two years had elapsed; during which period it was, by its terms, to have been in the course of execution.

The treaty was concluded on the 9th of May, 1832, and was received on the 29th; and during the session of Congress, which adjourned on the 16th of July, provision was made for commissioners on our part, to meet the Seminole delegation at Fort Gibson, in October, 1833. At what time either arrived there, or for what reason the supplemental treaty, or that with the Creeks west, was delayed, does not appear. The treaty with the Creeks was signed at Fort Gibson on the 14th of February, 1833, and the supplemental Seminole treaty on the 28th of March following, and received at Washington on the 28th of October of the same year. The Seminole treaties were ratified on the 8th and 12th of April, 1834.

From this statement of facts, it will be seen that the treaty of 1832 might have been ratified in 1832, and an appropriation been made provisionally for its execution in 1833. The condition precedent was to be fulfilled by an act on the part of the Seminoles, and required no subsequent assent on our part.

On these facts I submit, as an opening argument against the validity of the treaty, an extract from the letter of General Eaton of the 8th of March, 1835, which has been read:

"I have received your letter, with its enclosures, relative to removing the Seminole Indians, under the provisions of the treaty of 1832, but which was not ratified until 1834. I pray you, does not this circumstance raise a doubt whether, by strict rule, the treaty can be considered valid and binding? Our Indian compacts must be construed and controlled by the rules which civilized people practise, because, in all our actions with them, we have put the treaty-making machinery in operation, precisely the same way, and to the same extent, that it is employed with the civilized Powers of Europe. The rule practised upon by us has been, and is, that the ratification shall take place either within an agreed time, or in a reasonable time. When Florida was ceded, in 1819, the Cortes failed to exchange ratifications within the prescribed time, and afterwards, at a subsequent session, it was assented to by the Spanish Cortes. The sense of this Government was, that the first ratification made by the Senate was inoperative, and again the subject was submitted by Mr. Monroe for the action and approval of the Senate. This appears to me to be a precedent that runs parallel with this Indian compact. It says, one third shall remove the first year, viz: as early as practicable in 1833; and one third in the next, and the next, in 1834 and 1835. Now, until 1834, when the ratification took place, the treaty was a dead letter. It is in their power now to plead, and say, we were ready in 1833 and 1834; and, hearing nothing of your determination, we had a right to suppose you did not mean to stand by the treaty, and accordingly our minds have changed. With civilized nations, I think the plea would be available; and, if so, the Indian should have the benefit of it."

In consequence of this letter, the subject was referred to the Attorney General, whose opinion I now present to the committee.

"ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE,

March 26, 1835.

"SIR: In your letter of the 21st instant, after enclosing to me a communication of Governor Eaton, in which he suggests doubts concerning the validity of the treaty with the Seminole Indians, concluded on the 9th of May, 1832, and ratified on the 9th of April, 1834, in consequence of the delay which took place in the ratification, you requested my opinion upon the validity of the treaty, and upon the right of the United States to remove these Indians in the years 1835, 1836, and 1837.

"There is certainly great force in the suggestions made by Governor Eaton; and as the Government, in its relations with the Indians, is necessarily obliged to become, for all practical purposes, its own interpreter and judge, it is under the highest obligation to make no claim under the treaty, and to set up no construction of its terms, which are not fairly authorized by its sense and spirit. And if it can be shown that a material change of circumstances, connected with the question of removal, had actually occurred, during the period which elapsed between the signing and ratification of the treaty, then it is plain that the Indians can no longer be held to it; unless by some act since its ratification they have recognised and affirmed its validity. In the present case, as no time was limited for the ratification of the treaty, as the supplemental articles of the 28th March, 1833, treated it as yet in existence, although not then ratified by the President and Senate, and as no material change of circumstances is suggested, I think it must be deemed a valid and subsisting treaty.

"If the treaty be valid, the particular intent to remove in 1833, 1834, and 1835, must yield to the general engagement to remove in three years from the ratification; and the same provision must be made for the unforeseen case which has now arisen, which was expressly made for the case anticipated. It was evidently the understanding and the design of the parties that the removal should commence with the year following the ratification, and that the tribe should remove in about equal proportions during that and the two following years; consequently, they are now to be removed in the years 1835, 1836, and 1837.

"B. F. BUTLER."

I take it for granted that the Attorney General has made the best of his case; and, with great deference, I

H. OF R.]

Indian Annuities, &c.

[JUNE 3, 1836.]

will now proceed to examine the reasons on which it is founded.

1st. "As no time was limited for the ratification of the treaty." But, sir, the time for the commencement of its execution was fixed. The Seminoles are to commence their removal in 1833. This could not be obligatory on the Seminoles, unless the treaty was also obligatory on the United States—unless the treaty was ratified. It was undoubtedly contemplated, at the time of its being signed, that it would have been ratified in 1832. It was proper that it should have been so done. The stipulations on both sides were settled. All that remained to be done was to be done by the separate act of the Seminoles; it required no assent on our part. Why should they be asked to do that act before we had said that, when done, it should be final? But, before the ratification, the act of the Seminoles conferred no obligation on us to ratify the treaty. Had it been immediately ratified, the Seminole delegation must, if they wished to hold us to the treaty, have done the act required in season to have commenced the removal in 1833. If it was their fault that the act was not performed in time to commence before 1835, they could not hold us to the treaty, but on condition that they all removed in that year. They could not avail themselves of their own delay. The Attorney General seems wholly to overlook the consideration, that we might, and ought, immediately, during the session of Congress, when the treaty was returned, to have ratified it. But the delay of 1834 is solely imputable to our own neglect. The supplemental treaty was received in September, 1833, and no appropriation was made to carry it into effect during 1834. The principle of the Attorney General has no limit. If two years of the period of the execution might elapse, why not the three, or ten years?

2d. "As the supplemental articles of the 28th of March, 1833, treated it as yet in existence, although not then ratified by the President and Senate." Is it probable that the Seminole delegation knew whether it was ratified or not, or the effect of treating it as an existing treaty? If they considered it had been ratified, then they must have considered that the supplemental treaty made it binding; but would their considering one way or the other impose an obligation on the United States to ratify it? The signing the supplemental articles, then, did not make it binding on us or them.

3d. "As no material change of circumstances is suggested." And who, sir, was there to suggest it? It was an ex parte hearing. The Seminoles had no delegation there to make suggestions. The only thing before the Attorney General seems to have been General Eaton's letter and the treaty. But, considering this a treaty between two nations, admitting we have taken upon ourselves to be our own interpreters on questions of construction, are we entitled also to take upon ourselves to be the exclusive judges of the situation of the Seminoles? Had not they at least an equal right to judge of their own condition? They certainly had the best means of judging. They require no suggestions. They had this right. They exercised it; and of their determination we were informed before the ratification of the treaty—so well informed of it, that, as I shall show hereafter, it was then in contemplation that it might be necessary to use force to compel its execution.

Mr. Chairman, I have not yet done with the opinion of the Attorney General. I shall now rely upon it as an authority to show that the treaty was not obligatory on the Seminoles; I shall show that "a material change of circumstances" connected with the question of removal had actually occurred during the period which elapsed between the signing and ratification of the treaty.

What, sir, was the situation, or, rather, what were the "circumstances" of the Seminoles when this treaty was signed? They were living separate from the Creeks; they had had, from 1802 up to that time, a period of thirty years, undisturbed possession of the negroes taken by them from the citizens of Georgia. The claim of the people of Georgia was quieted by the Creek treaty before mentioned, of 1821. Since that time, the Creeks had set up no claim to them. No objection against the reunion of the Creeks and Seminoles, according to their former condition, existed, or was known to exist, on the part of the Creeks. Under this state of things, the treaty was signed; and it was signed on the basis of the continuance of this state of things, that the Seminoles should, as a separate band, be reunited to and form a component part of the Creek nation, as one people. But what was the situation of the Seminoles? What were their "circumstances" when the treaty was ratified, April 8, 1834? In the mean time, two material circumstances, or, rather, a change of two material circumstances, had occurred.

1. The Creeks had set up a claim to the negroes and their descendants, taken by the Seminoles from the people of Georgia prior to 1802, under the pretence that, on the payment of the $250,000, under the treaty of 1821, they became the property of the Creek nation, of which the Seminole band was a part. This has been already sufficiently explained. To the Seminoles it was no consolation that the claim was unjust; for,

2. The Creeks east had refused to sanction the agreement of the Creeks west, allowing to the Seminoles a separate location. This was, in effect, a refusal on the part of the Creeks to reunite with the Seminoles. No, sir; they would not reunite, but insisted on an amalgamation. It was certain that an amalgamation would subject this claim to the decision of the Creek council; from which the Seminoles had nothing to hope. Sir, this was no pretence. The objection was taken in good faith. You have the opinion of General Eaton that it was the essential cause of their unwillingness to go at all:

The materiality of this change of circumstances is manifest; it was the essential cause of the reluctance of the Seminoles to emigrate. In fine, it rendered the execution of the treaty impracticable, consistently with the just rights of the Seminoles; and had it existed at the date of the treaty, that treaty would not have been made.

These objections were communicated to our Government, as I have before stated, prior to the ratification of the treaty; and so important were they then deemed, that General Thompson, in his report of the 1st January, 1834, recommended "the policy of conclusively quieting the Creek claims, so as to leave those Indians (the Seminoles) forever at rest upon the subject."

I will here remark, sir, that General Thompson, in a subsequent letter, suggests a doubt as to the construction of the treaty of 1832—whether it gave to the Seminoles the right to a separate location, or obliged them to amalgamate. He gave to it the former construction, though he thought it susceptible of the latter. But, sir, we shall be placed in this dilemma: if the latter construction be adopted, the location was void, as made contrary to the treaty; if the former, then we are met by the refusal of the Creeks east; and in both we are met by the fact of a material change of circumstances between the signing and the ratification.

On the case now made, I claim the authority of the opinion of the Attorney General as decisive against the validity of the treaty.

"Unless, by some act since its ratification, they have recognised and affirmed its validity."

But, sir, the Secretary of War, in his communication of the 25th of May, this day laid on our tables, takes a new ground, with a view of making a case within this exception. I did not expect it. Yet, sir, I am prepared to meet it. Referring to a transaction of the 23d of April, 1835, he says:

JUNE 3, 1836.]

Indian Annuities, &c.

[H. OF R.]

"In obedience to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 21st instant, I have the honor to state that this Department has not received any information since my report of the 9th of February, to the Senate, in answer to their resolution of February 3, showing the causes that induced the Seminole Indians to commence hostilities, so far as they were known here. The abstract contained in the report I have the honor to enclose; and I beg leave, in addition, to state that it will appear, by reference thereto, and to the document submitted with it to the Senate, that the complaints of the Seminole Indians were investigated by General Clinch, General Thompson, and Lieutenant Harris; and that, on a full consideration of the whole matter, in open council, an arrangement was made to the mutual satisfaction of the parties, which was in the following terms:

"We, the undersigned chiefs and sub-chiefs of the Seminole tribe of Indians, do hereby, for ourselves and for our people, voluntarily acknowledge the validity of the treaty between the United States and the Seminole nation of Indians, made and concluded at Payne's Landing, on the Ocklawaha river, on the 9th of May, 1832, and the treaty between the United States and the Seminole nation of Indians, made and concluded at Fort Gibson, on the 28th day of March, 1833, by Montford Stokes, H. L. Ellsworth, and J. F. Schermerhorn, commissioners on the part of the United States, and the delegates of the said nation of Seminole Indians on the part of the said nation; and we, the said chiefs and sub-chiefs, do, for ourselves and for our people, freely and fully assent to the above-recited treaties, in all their provisions and stipulations.

[Signed by sixteen chiefs and sub-chiefs.]

When I said that the Secretary had taken a new ground, I did not mean to be understood that these articles were now, for the first time, published; they were inserted in the answer to the call of the Senate of the 9th February. But, sir, this is the first declaration, in form, that they were relied on, by the Executive, as a confirmation of the treaty, or that any obligation whatever was intended to be inferred from them.

Passing by the question whether this act, on the face of it, committed the Seminole tribe, I will now, sir, proceed to state to the committee the circumstances under which it was executed; and here, too, I shall confine myself to our own story, as recorded in the War Office.

On the 22d April, 1835, a council of the Seminole chiefs was assembled by General Clinch and Captain Harris, of the army, and General Thompson, the removing agent. Prior to this, they had been informed of the determination of the Seminoles, with few exceptions, not to execute the treaty; and orders had been given to General Clinch to execute it by military force. An account of the proceedings at this council is given in the joint letter of the 24th of April.

On the first day of the council, General Clinch said to the Seminoles:

"The time of expostulation had passed; that, already, too much had been said, and nothing had been done; that the influence of the agents of Government, their powers of persuasion and argument, had been exhausted, both in public councils and in private interviews, to induce them to do right; that we had lingered long enough in the performance of our duties to have averted, had they been willing, the evils that threatened their foolish resistance to the fulfilment of pledges solemnly and fairly made by them; and that now it was time to act. He had been sent here to enforce the treaty; he had warriors enough to do it, and he would do it. It was the question now, whether they would go of their own accord, or go by force." With this, they were told they might depart; and until morning was given them to think upon what had been said. "In the course of the morning, eight principal chiefs gave their assent to abide by the stipulations of the treaty; five remained opposed to it."

Micanopy was absent. "General Thompson had, upon the first intimation, in the council of this day, of further resistance on the part of the chiefs, demanded of the chief Jumper whether Micanopy (by whom he knew the movements of a number of them to be controlled) intended to abide by the treaty or not? And when Jumper finally confessed that he was authorized to say that Micanopy did not, he (Thompson) promptly declared that he no longer considered Micanopy a chief; that his name should be struck from the council of the nation; that he should treat all who acted like him in the like manner; and that he would neither acknowledge nor do business with him, or with any other, as a chief, who did not honestly comply with the terms of his engagements; that the door was, however, still open to them, if they wished to act honestly."

"In consequence of this, the names of the five opposing chiefs [Micanopy not present] were struck from the council of the nation."

All this preceded the signing the agreement; and under this threat and this act the articles were signed. If an enemy in arms, force may compel the conquered to submit to any terms the conqueror may dictate; but, sir, what can be said of this as a transaction between a civilized—a powerful nation—and a small band of Indians, with whom we were at peace; and who then dared to claim what they now dare to defend? Sir, between civilized nations it could not exist a moment.

But what do you think the Government said of this transaction? They rebuked their agent for breaking the five chiefs; they acknowledged that the assent of the chiefs to the articles was the effect of the menace. But what was said of that menace? Sir, I will not rely on witnesses: I shall sustain myself only by the record; and here it is.

The acting Secretary of War, on the 20th May, 1835, in reply to it, says:

"From your report, it appears that eight of the principal chiefs have signified, in writing, their determination to abide by all the stipulations of the treaties of Payne's Landing and Fort Gibson, and that five of the principal chiefs refused to acknowledge them. The assent of the chiefs is to be attributed, it would seem, to the declaration of General Clinch, that, if they declined to remove voluntarily, they would be removed by force. The President approves of this declaration, upon a full consideration of the circumstances under which it was made."

And what are those circumstances? "The Seminoles had trifled sufficiently long with the most solemn treaty obligations, to which they had, in the first instance, acceded, with a full understanding of their character, and the consequences of which they had had, during three years, full opportunity to perceive and appreciate."

And this is not all, sir. Mr. Thompson, in his letter of the 18th June, in reply, states that this declaration had been before repeated, under the authority of the Department.

Such, sir, was the arrangement in open council, which, it is alleged, was made to the mutual satisfaction of the parties!

II. That the Government has attempted to enforce the treaty, in violation of its own construction.

The construction to which I refer is contained in the Attorney General's opinion, that the Seminoles were to be removed in the years 1835, 1836, and 1837, instead of the years stipulated in the treaty.

H. OF R.]

Indian Annuities, &c.

[JUNE 3, 1836.]

In violation of this construction, the Government have insisted to the Seminoles that they should all remove in the year 1835.

General Thompson, in his letter of the 28th October, 1834, states that he told the Seminoles, "I have come from the President to tell you" "that you must prepare to remove by the time the cold weather of the winter shall have passed away." The proposition was general. No intimation was given that they were to be allowed a longer time.

In accordance with the principles of the subsequent opinions of the Attorney General, the Secretary of War wrote to General Thompson, distinctly stating that the part of the Seminoles required by the treaty to remove in 1833 should remove in 1835; and the plain inference from this letter was, that the remainder should remove in 1836 and 1837. General Thompson, in his letter of the 28th December, states that this letter was read in council to the Seminoles. But how was it understood by the Seminoles? Was it made the basis of any proposition? No, sir; the language to them was the same as had been held to them in October. He says that in council "I read your speech, explained it, and enforced it by such considerations as occurred to me; of which, however, my talk to them in October last may, in substance, be considered a transcript. I repeated what I had told them before, that they would be compelled by force to remove, if they did not do so willingly," &c. In his letter of the 27th January following he states: "I have heretofore [when?] submitted to the Secretary of War some reasons why the Indians should be removed all at the same time, by water." And, finally, on the 9th March, General Clinch states to the adjutant general: "In all the communications I have had with the chiefs, I have held out the idea that, as the three years stipulated in the treaty were about expiring, the whole nation would be required to remove this spring."

The President's talk of the 16th February, 1835, is also in accordance with the opinion of the Attorney General—that the Seminoles were entitled to the years 1835, 1836, and 1837, in which to remove.

It appears from the joint letter of Clinch, Thompson, and Harris, of the 24th April, 1835, that this talk was read in council on the 22d. And how, too, was this understood by the Seminoles? Was it made the basis of any proposition? It was not. This, sir, is the proper place to notice the residue of the statement of the Secretary of War of the 25th May last, that "the officers charged with the arrangement of this affair [the arrangement of the 23d of April, 1835] then made an agreement with the Indians, by which they were all to be removed during the succeeding January. These proceedings were approved by the President, and the matter was considered as definitively and satisfactorily arranged; and that, whatever they [the objections to removal] were, the above agreement put an end to them, and left to the Seminoles but one course to pursue, which was an entire removal in January, 1836."

The committee will call to mind the occurrences in the council of the 22d and 23d of April, when it is alleged this agreement was made. It opened with the declaration of General Clinch, that "now was the time to act; that he had been sent here to enforce the treaty; that he had warriors enough to do it, and he would do it. It was the question now, whether they would go of their own accord, or go by force." That until morning time was given them to think of it; that, in the morning, the names of five opposing chiefs were stricken from the council of the nation; and that, under this menace of instant force, the eight chiefs signed what has been called "the arrangement to the mutual satisfaction of both parties." This arrangement purported merely to be an assent to the stipulation of the treaty. It was silent as to the time of removal. From what, then, is the assent of the chiefs to remove in January inferred? I again refer to our own story: "The friendly chiefs, whilst assenting to go, begged that they might not be hurried away; they did not expect to go this year; the season was far advanced, and they wanted time to gather their crops and settle their little business." Sir, they begged for a reprieve from the immediate execution of the sentence, and that reprieve was granted. The letter states: "Under these circumstances, we deemed it our duty to say to the friendly chiefs that we would give their people until the 1st of December to reap their crops, and to complete their preparations; but that, as soon after that time as we could make ourselves ready, every Indian in Florida would be started upon his journey to the new country."

Such is the agreement which it is now insisted put an end to the objections of the Indians to their removal, and left them but one course to adopt—an entire removal in January, 1836. If the proposition was ever made by our agent for a removal in 1835, 1836, and 1837, other than I have stated, I have not been able to find the record of it.

III. The Government have attempted to execute the treaty by an act of war, before any act of hostility was committed by the Seminoles.

On examining the correspondence, I find, sir, that the menace of force has accompanied all our overtures, even prior to the ratification of the treaty.

On the 21st of February, 1834, the Secretary of War, in a letter to Governor Duval, uses this language:

"The Government uses no compulsion with the Indians. It is left to their free choice, in the first case, to go or stay; but after that choice is fully and freely made, and they have obligated themselves to remove, the Government will employ the necessary measures to enforce their removal."

In the council of the 23d of April the Seminoles were told, "You must go to the West; your father the President will compel you to go."

The talk of the Secretary of War of the 22d of November, 1834, says: "The President has directed a body of soldiers to be sent to your country."

This letter was preceded by General Thompson's letter, (of the 28th October,) saying that "a full view of all the circumstances leaves me without doubt that these deluded people are determined to resist the execution of the treaty."

On the 24th November, 1834, orders were given to march troops to Forts Brooke and King, and for General Clinch to co-operate with them.

On the 28th December, General Thompson says that, at the council of the 26th, "I repeated what I had told them before, that they would be compelled by force to remove, should they not do so willingly."

On the 27th of January, 1835, General Thompson suggested to the Department that the military force in Florida was insufficient.

In the President's talk of the 16th February, 1835, the Indians were told, "I have ordered a large military force to be sent among you, &c. Listen to the voice of friendship—you will go quietly; but should you listen to bad birds that are flying about you, and refuse to remove, I have then directed the commanding officer to remove you by force. This will be done," &c.

On the 8th March, Governor Eaton requested General Clinch to delay the execution of the orders until he should receive an answer to his letter to the Secretary of War of that date.

On the 26th March the Attorney General gave his opinion; and on the 14th of April the Secretary of War wrote to General Clinch that "if they (the Seminoles) all be willing to remove this year, it will certainly be better to remove them; but, in that case, let a written agreement be drawn up, stating the reasons of the delay, their entire readiness to remove by the time, and go in a body, and by such route as you and General Thompson shall think best for them, and most economical to the Government. But if they are opposed to this, and will generally agree quietly to remove by the 1st of March, or as soon as arrangements can be made, they may be suffered to remain until that time. Should the Seminoles, however, peremptorily decline to pledge themselves peaceably to remove next season, you will then proceed to carry into effect the instructions heretofore given."

This order produced the menace of Clinch, in the council of the 22d of April, "that he had warriors enough," &c.

On the 20th May, the Secretary of War, in reply to their joint letter of the 24th, wrote to Thompson, Clinch, and Harris, (referring to the letter above, of the 14th April,) "If, as stated in that letter, the Indians will generally agree quietly to remove by the time you have designated, and will signify their agreement in writing in the manner therein pointed out, no objections will be made to the postponement. But the Indians must understand that their removal will be enforced in conformity with the treaty."

About the 3d June, Powell, (Oseolo,) one of the most bold, daring, and intrepid chiefs in his nation, on account of his insolence, was put in irons—put an Indian chief in irons! On his release he appeared friendly. Who that knows the Indian character could rely on such appearance?

The next unfortunate occurrence was on the 18th June, when seven white men, meeting five Indians, took away their rifles, flogged four of them with cowhides, and, other Indians coming to their relief, a fight ensued, in which three white men were wounded, and one Indian was killed. Our officer demanded the Indian aggressors; and, what is more extraordinary, they were delivered up.

On the 11th August, the Seminoles killed a soldier, while carrying the mail, in retaliation for the Indian killed by the whites, and declared themselves satisfied. This was regarded in its proper light by our officer—as a mere act of retaliation.

On the 30th of November, the Seminoles killed one of their chiefs, who had been friendly to their emigration; and immediately all the friendly Indians, to the number of four or five hundred, fled to Fort Brooke for protection. This act was deemed decisive that the Indians would resist their removal by force. It was now, sir, no longer a question of menace. It was a question of war; of the employing a military force to execute a treaty. I characterize the act by the term applied to it by General Eaton in advance. In his letter of the 8th of March, he says, in reference to the execution of the treaty, "the employing a military force will be an act of war; and," further, "the Indians will embody and fight in their defence."

Our military force, consisting of twelve companies, immediately concentrated; and, on the 23d, a corps of two hundred men attempted to march through what might then be called the enemy's country. Thus, we had marched a military force into their country, for the purpose, repeatedly declared to the Seminoles, of removing them by force; and thus was the act of war completed before a single hostile act was committed by the Seminoles. The Seminoles, fulfilling the prediction of General Eaton, "embodied and fought in their defence;" and the fate of the unfortunate Dade was told by only three of his men. Here, sir, I leave the war at its commencement. How the battle has fared since, I leave to others to say.

It is proper, however, and it is just, to say that the administration here must necessarily judge of the state of things in Florida through the representations of their agents on the spot; that, from the first question of the execution of the treaty, all our officers and agents there strongly recommended the execution of the treaty by a military force; and, so far as it was intended to produce an effect as a menace, though a policy of a doubtful character, it might, in a just cause, be excused, if not justified. But, sir, if the question I have asked, Is our quarrel just? be answered in the negative, we must stand as the aggressors, without cause and without justification.

But, sir, take it for granted that the treaty was obligatory, and that we had only insisted on its just execution; the question then arises, has the Executive the power to execute a treaty by an act of war? It is the duty of the President to take care that the laws be faithfully executed, but by such means, and by such only, as the constitution or the laws have provided. To Congress it belongs to make all laws necessary and proper for the execution of the special grants conferred on Congress, and of all other powers vested by the constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof. The execution of a treaty by force, or attempting to obtain satisfaction by force, is virtually an act of war; and this power is vested in Congress alone.

In regard to our own citizens, treaties are the supreme law of the land, and are executed as such; but, as between the parties, they are matters of compact, in which each party judges for itself, and seeks its remedies under the laws of nations; and the exclusive right which we have assumed to judge for both parties, defines our power, but not our right. This, however, cannot change the character of treaties with the Indian tribes, and reduce them from compacts to laws.

The action of the Executive, in the cases of the Seminoles and the Creeks, though directly opposite, is within the same principle. In the case of the Seminoles, an attempt was made to execute a treaty by an act of war. In the case of the Creeks, the attempt is to violate a treaty by an act of the same character.

I forbear, Mr. Chairman, to comment on a variety of minor considerations which may have had an influence in favor of or against the voluntary removal of the Seminoles, or in adding to the excitement produced by the principal facts in the case—the desire of the whites to retain or to purchase their slaves, and to obtain their lands per fas aut nefas, operating on the one hand to obstruct their removal, and on the other to induce their immediate removal by force.

What, Mr. Chairman, may be, if not the probable, the possible, effect of the adoption of the amendment of the committee? It will be considered by the Executive as an authority, as a warrant, for the removal of the whole Creek nation by force. Is there not danger that it may excite the whole nation, or a large portion, to make common cause with the Seminoles? They will take courage from their success. They will, to use the language of General Eaton, "take up the tomahawk in despair." It may be to them a war of extermination, and to us of great peril. What are your present relations with the Cherokees?—a tribe which, since your first treaty with them, has never taken the scalp of a white man—a tribe which has borne and forborne. But, sir, have you done any thing of late calculated to prolong that forbearance? Sir, I learn from a publication in the Globe that we have lately made a treaty with them, by which we have fulfilled our longings of acquiring a cession of all their lands. I learn, also, from other sources, that this treaty has been made with one-tenth of the tribe, against the remonstrance of the remainder. What state of feeling will grow out of this, it is impossible to say. I hope, sir, they will acquiesce in the treaty, if not in its justice, fully believing that, as circumstanced, their happiness will be promoted by their removal. But, sir, they will judge for themselves. The force of the Indians east of the Mississippi is competent to much mischief. In a war which may become a war of extermination, is it wise to provoke new enemies to "raise the tomahawk in despair?" You may probably rate the force of the Seminoles at 1,500; the Creeks at 3,500; the Cherokees at 3,000; the Choctaws and Chickasaws, and others that are vagrant remnants of tribes, at 2,500 more: a force of 10,000 warriors. The modern Indian wars of the South are not of the character of those of Ohio, Kentucky, and Tennessee, of former days. Then, on the attack, the settlers flew to the rescue; now, sir, the flight is in any other direction. Causes over which individuals, perhaps, have no control, have given an entirely different character to our defence. And is there no danger that an Indian war may connect itself with a war of another character? Sir, those who are the most interested will judge in what scale to place these apprehensions. I trust in God they may never become realities.

Indian Annuities, &c.

But, sir, what is proposed to be done with the Indians? To remove them with all their hostile feelings—to remove whipped Indians to the west of the Missouri and Arkansas, and plant them there! What have you gained, but to change the scene, and increase your danger? You place them there to excite the surrounding tribes to war on your whole Western frontier—tribes who can bring into battle 30,000 warriors, and sustain them, too. They can choose their point of attack, and retreat, at pleasure, where you cannot follow, to return to the attack in some other quarter—tribes, too, which can be supplied with arms by a neighboring nation, which is not, perhaps, now in the best state of feelings towards you. Grant, sir, that these are mere possible dangers; yet, should we not be put on our guard even against remote contingencies? Why should we add further cause for increasing the hostilities which now exist? Why continue even these hostilities, if they can be avoided? Must we continue the Seminole war for another campaign? What new laurels are to be won? It is asked, is it practicable to end the war without further slaughter? Sir, on this subject I rely entirely on the opinion of those better acquainted with the character of the Southern Indians than myself; and, from the opinions of those entitled to confidence, I am satisfied that it is practicable, and that while our army is in summer quarters, the war might be ended. Sir, the experiment is worth the attempt; if we fail, nothing is lost.

I cannot but recur to the period when the system of removal commenced; when the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] introduced the bill of 1830. Predictions were then made, which were treated as impossibilities; but, sir, they will soon be a part of our recorded history.

Appendix to Mr. Everett's speech.

TALLAHASSEE, March 8, 1835.

SIR: I have received your letter, with its enclosures, relative to the removing the Seminole Indians, under the provisions of the treaty of 1832, but which was not ratified until 1834. I pray you, does not this circumstance raise a doubt whether, by strict rule, the treaty can be considered valid and binding? Our Indian compacts must be construed and be controlled by the rules which civilized people practise; because, in all our actions with them, we have put the treaty-making machinery in operation precisely in the same way, and to the same extent, that it is employed with the civilized Powers of Europe. The rule practised upon by us has been, and is, that the ratification shall take place within either an agreed time or in a reasonable time.

When Florida was ceded, in 1819, the Cortes failed to exchange ratifications within the prescribed time, and afterwards, at a subsequent session, it was assented to by the Spanish Cortes. The sense of this Government was, that the first ratification made by the Senate was inoperative; and again the subject was submitted, by Mr. Monroe, for the action and approval of the Senate. This appears to me to be a precedent which runs parallel with this Indian compact. It says, one third shall remove the first year, viz: as early as practicable in 1833, and one third in the next, and the next, 1834 and 1835. Now, until 1834, when the ratification took place, the treaty was a dead letter. It is in their power now to plead and to say, we were ready in 1833 and 1834, and, hearing nothing of your determination, we had a right to suppose that you did not mean to stand by the treaty, and accordingly our minds have changed. With civilized nations, I think the plea would be available; and, if so, the Indian should have the benefit of it.

Were these people willing voluntarily to remove, (though such seems not to be the case,) the whole difficulty would be cured, and no evil could arise. But as military force is about to be resorted to, it is material that the Government, before making such appeal, be satisfied that right and justice are on their side; and that they are not engaged in the execution of a treaty which, if void, is no part of the law of the land. I feel so strongly the force of these objections, and am so desirous that General Jackson shall avoid every thing of supposed error, that I shall to-day, unauthorized as I am, write to General Clinch, and request him not to act with force until he shall hear again from you. This he may probably do; and hence the propriety of your considering my suggestion, and advising him as early as possible.

Should you at Washington, who have books to resort to, to solve the doubt I have mentioned, come to the conclusion that it is tenable, why, then, the subject of the removal, and the manner of it, are unnecessary to be examined. An attempt must then be made to go into some new negotiation. If there be nothing in the proffered objections, then the best mode of starting them away recurs.

The employing a military force will be an act of war, and the Indians will embody and fight in their defence. In this event, you will want such an imposing force as shall overawe resistance. The few companies you have ordered will not produce this result. They will serve but to begin the fight, and to awaken angry feelings; so that, in the sequel, the militia will have to be called, which will end in the butchery of these miserable people. Send a strong, imposing regular force, which can be commanded, and prevented from doing more than actually is needful to be done; and then that force, judiciously acting and forbearing, may do much. But send only a handful of men, and difficulties will come upon you.

The next thing will be to have suitable transports, of seven or eight feet draught, lying at Tampa Bay, well provisioned, to receive them; for sure as you seek a passage over land, they will desert into swamps, and elude your pursuits. They are afraid to go by land. Bad men will raise up false accounts; arrest and throw them in jail, whereby to enforce payment. The fate of their chief (Blunt) last year at New Orleans, they fear will be theirs. Taking them by water to the Mississippi river, and there placing them in boats, with positive orders not to land or stop at any town or city, will prevent this disturbance to them. In three or four days the voyage can be made from Tampa Bay to the Balize, at a much reduced cost to what a land travel northwardly would amount to.

There is another difficulty in the minds of these people, and it is this: A separate tract out of the Creek lands has been set apart for their homes. There is a ratified treaty in your office, made by General Stokes, Ellsworth, and Schermerhorn, with the Creeks, which authorizes the Seminole location. While negotiating with the Indians last year, at Washington, I understood the Creeks discovered this act, and had sent word to the Seminole bands that, while they were willing to receive them in their limits as a portion of their nation, they would not suffer them to enjoy any separate allotment of their soil. This, too, has intimidated them, and I dare say is the essential cause of their reluctance to go off. To cure this, either the Creeks west should be gotten to say that the allotment made shall be for the exclusive separate use of the Florida Indians; or the latter should be prevailed upon, for some adequate compensation, to agree to go and amalgamate with the Creeks. Another mode of prevailing on these people to remove would be, to give orders to the troops to prevent them from raising corn this year: this is almost as severe a remedy as employing your bayonets. But the effect will be that, towards autumn, their necessities will compel them to depart. To go or starve, would then be the question.

JUNE 3, 1836.]

Indian Annuities, &c.

[H. OF R.]

General Thompson was here a few days since, and found a letter for him from the Department. He should not be addressed here, but at the Seminole agency, distant from this place, I believe, one hundred and fifty miles.

This Indian question of removal is one that should be managed with great caution and care, that the enemies in Congress, ever ready to find fault, may have no just and tenable ground on which to rest their rumors. Tread cautiously, then. The people here want the lands on which they reside, and they will urge a removal, fas aut nefas; and the Big Swamp, which in the treaty is declared to be the first of their country to be vacated, is of high repute, and it is that on which the eyes of speculators are fixed. But whether they shall have it this year or the next, or the next thereafter, is of less importance to the country than that any thing shall be done calculated to impair the character of the Government for justice, and for equitable and fair dealing. Whence the necessity of any speedy removal? Presently, if left alone, these Indians will go of their own accord; because they cannot avoid it. To stay is to starve; and nature and its demands will soon tell them more and better, and more convincing things on this subject, than you and the President can write. Then they will go, and go without any interruption to the quiet and harmony of the country. Now, with all your efforts, and the army to aid you, they could not be carried off and gotten to their western homes before June or July. Then no crop could be raised, and for two years they will be without provisions. The preferred and preferable course, I think, will be to send amongst them active and intelligent men to court them to what is right, in the hope that, during the year, their minds may be so prepared as to be induced to depart during November; at least, that they may reach their homes in time to raise corn the succeeding year. On the whole, to conclude a tiresome letter, I offer this advice: avoid the exercise of force as long as possible, and let it be the only, the last sad alternative; and then let not, by any means, the militia be applied to—they will breed mischief.

With great respect,

J. H. EATON.

LEWIS CASS, Secretary of War.

TALLAHASSEE, March 8, 1835.

SIR: I have received from the Secretary of War a letter asking me to suggest to him any views I might entertain as to the removal of the Seminole Indians. Enclosed in his communication was a copy of a letter addressed by you to the adjutant general, dated 22d January, 1835; a reply to it by the Secretary, of the 16th February, with a talk from the President, also dated the 16th February. In reply, I have offered my opinions freely and frankly; and, amongst other things, suggested whether the treaty of 1832 be not void, for want of timely ratification. If this be so, it will be unfortunate that the military force of the country be actively employed.

In my letter I have said, "by the next mail (unauthorized) I shall write to General Clinch, and suggest to him not to employ force towards the removal until he shall again hear from you. He may, perhaps, under all the circumstances, accord to my request; and hence the necessity of your speedily informing him of the course he shall pursue." If, under the orders given, you shall think you can practise forbearance until the Secretary is again heard from, I shall be glad; because my opinion is, there is greater safety in the course. But of this you alone are to judge, under the responsibility of the orders which have been forwarded to you. Very respectfully,

J. H. EATON.

To General D. L. CLINCH.

When Mr. EVERETT had concluded,

Mr. WHITE, of Florida, said: I understand the proposition now before the committee to be, whether this House will sanction two amendments of the Senate to the Indian appropriation bill, providing a fund of one million of dollars for the removal of the Creek and Seminole Indians to the country assigned them on the west of the Mississippi river. This sum has been proposed by the Secretary of War, in two communications addressed to the Indian Committee of this House, in which it is stated that the measure now recommended is essential to the peace of the frontier, and indispensable to the security and preservation of the Indians themselves.

In moving a concurrence on the part of this House in the amendment of the Senate, the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs has told us that it is hardly admissible to expect the removal of these Indians until they are subdued and conciliated. It does not require much knowledge of the Indian character to understand that chastisement never produces conciliation, though it may produce submission. Whatever may be the feelings of these Indians, or the consequences resulting from them, the United States are bound by the most powerful considerations of policy, as well as the solemn stipulations of a treaty, to remove them, "peaceably if they can, forcibly if they must," to the country they have contracted for.

Before proceeding to the consideration of the history of this Seminole war, in regard to which the gentleman from Vermont has entertained the House for the last two hours, I must notice one of the preliminary observations, in which he says this House have no authentic information of a Creek war, and no evidence that there have been at any time twenty-five Creeks assembled. He further intimated, that the only intelligence we had from the seat of war was from the afflicted and flying inhabitants, whose misfortunes and distresses have, upon several occasions, been made the subject of jeering, derogatory, and debasing remarks, in official despatches as well as speeches on this floor.

Sir, what evidences have you of the existence of a war? We have the official reports from the Governors of Georgia and Alabama; letters from Major McIntosh, commanding at Fort Mitchell; reports from the postmaster at Columbus; requisitions from the Secretary of War for appropriations; the actual calling out of four thousand troops from Alabama and Georgia, and a brigade from Tennessee; with the movement of all the regular troops. In addition to these evidences, you have actually made an appropriation of five hundred thousand dollars to suppress these hostilities; and yet we are asked for proof that there is a war; or that twenty-five Indians have ever been assembled at any one place!

Indian Annuities, &c.

[JUNE 3, 1836.]

You have had information, through the official journal at this place, of the seizure of the public mails, and that the mail route from Chhattahoochie to Line creek was strewn with mangled bodies of murdered victims of savage ferocity. You have seen that 400 armed Indians have taken the town of Roanoke, and captured two steamboats; and when measures of protection and defence are asked for, we are coolly and indifferently asked if there is, in fact, any war? I understand the object of all this manœuvring perfectly well. It is to censure the Executive for not having made a direct communication on this subject. Whether this be within his constitutional duties or not, is not for me to decide. Whether he has done his duty or not, I trust will not be made the subject of mockery and outrage upon those whose misfortune it is to live within the range of the application of the tomahawk and scalping-knife, which have been so tauntingly and indifferently referred to on this floor.

I have one word to say on the subject of these unfortunate sufferers, who are represented as a panic-stricken, flying population, not stopping to see whether they are pursued by "squaws or by warriors." These people live in detached neighborhoods, in a sparsely populated country, having no large settlements to fall back upon, and no fortified places to retreat to; are driven by the feelings of natural affection, first to place their wives and children out of the reach of a treacherous, barbarous, and blood-thirsty savage enemy, who disregard all the principles of civilization and humanity. It is an easy thing, at this distance, and with the security of a thousand miles from the operations of such an enemy, to talk about fighting and pursuing them, instead of retreating to a place of safety until a sufficient number can be assembled to meet them with some prospect of resistance. In the best days of the Roman republic, the life of one citizen was considered of sufficient consequence, not only to produce a sensation throughout the capital, but in the remotest provinces. Here, it appears that more sympathy is felt for the imaginary rights of the Indians, than for our butchered women and children, who have had no agency in bringing about the horrible war now raging on your frontiers.

I proceed, however, without further remark, to the question put by the gentleman from Vermont. He demands, as preliminary to voting this money, that this House should decide "whether our quarrel be just." He proceeds then to make a statement which deeply implicates the honor of the nation, and subjects this administration, if true, to the condemnation of the just and liberal throughout the United States. Sir, it is not my province to defend the present administration. Neither I, nor the people I represent, have much reason to enter into their defence. I have but one rule, however, on this subject; and that is, to defend this or any other administration from improper imputations, or unjustifiable abuse. I have, however, a much higher, and, I trust, nobler motive than a miserable party conflict, in vindicating the honor of my country against charges of Punic faith, of violated treaties, and of heartless oppression of these miserable, despicable, and degraded savages. The gentleman from Vermont attempts to maintain two propositions: 1st, That the treaty with the Seminoles is not, and never was, binding upon them; 2dly, That the treaty itself was forfeited for a non-compliance with the conditions contained in it; and he proceeds to denounce the President for threatening to execute it by force, and has read various extracts from the negotiations between these Indians and our commanding officers, to excite commiseration for them, and public indignation against the Government and its officers. He has commenced his history of this transaction with the treaty of Camp Moultrie, in 1823, and has intimated that the Government did not produce "the state of starvation in which the Indians were found, but that they only took advantage of it." I propose to go back a little further into the history of these Indians than it has suited the purpose of the gentleman to go; and I pledge myself to maintain, before this House and the nation, that the conduct of this Government to these ruthless barbarians has been marked by liberality, forbearance, lenity, and magnanimity.

The Florida Indians are the remains of that ancient and warlike tribe known under the designation of the Natchez tribe on the Mississippi, which, being almost extirpated by the French, retreated along the northern coast of the Gulf of Mexico, and united with broken bands of Biloxies, Red Sticks, and runaway Creeks, called Seminoles. The word "Seminoles" signifies "a wanderer or runaway." The largest portion of these Indians are lower Creeks, and are of the most dissolute, daring, and abandoned, of that tribe.

During the wars that succeeded our revolutionary contest, they were pressed down below the Spanish line into the country then the dominions of Spain, and now the territory of the United States. Their force was greatly increased by all who fled from the nation, when General Jackson invaded it in 1814. These Indians entered into a treaty of offensive and defensive alliance with the Spanish Government, as early as the year 1784.

By this treaty they were incorporated into the Spanish monarchy, with certain reserved rights, depending chiefly on the will of that Government.

By the treaty between the United States and Spain, of 1795, it was stipulated that the Spanish Government should restrain their Indians from committing hostilities against the United States.

In this state of things, the Floridas were ceded, in full dominion and absolute property, to the United States, by the treaty of the 22d February, 1819. In this treaty there was no allusion to, or provision for, these Indians, in any manner whatever. The two provinces of East and West Florida were delivered to the United States by the Spanish commissioners. The white population was confined to the towns of St. Augustine and Pensacola, and the whole region between these two places, one on the Atlantic, and the other on the Gulf of Mexico, distant four hundred miles from each other, was occupied in some sort by these roving savages. The United States took possession of the country, and one of the first questions that occupied the attention of the administration, or of Congress, was, what should we do with these Indians? It was then represented, even at that period, that they were reduced to great extremities for the want of the ordinary articles of subsistence. They had nearly abandoned the chase, on account of the scarcity of game, and their idle, vicious habits presented an insuperable obstacle to the cultivation of the soil.

To have acquired a territory of such extent, embracing one thousand two hundred miles of seacoast, to be left in possession of these Indians, was too absurd to merit one moment's consideration. The Secretary of War, Mr. Calhoun, on the 28th of January, 1823, in answer to a call of the Indian Committee, at the head of which was General Metcalf, late Governor of Kentucky, communicated various reports and correspondence; among which were several letters from the present President of the United States, then Governor of Florida. In one of these letters from General Jackson, dated the 20th of September, 1821, referring to a talk he had had with the head chiefs of the Florida Indians, he says: "They acknowledge that it is just that those who rejected peace when it was offered to them, and fled from their own country, continuing the war, ought to return to their own nation." The President proceeds: "I am of opinion, from the smallness of their numbers, and the shape of the Floridas, that it would be much better policy to move them all up, and amply to provide for them by an annuity."

Indian Annuities, &c.

General Jackson, in a talk to the Indians on the 18th September, 1821, told them, "those who fled from their nation, and joined in the war against us, must return to their country, where their chiefs are willing to receive them. They cannot be permitted to settle all over the Floridas."

The chiefs were satisfied with what was then communicated to them. By a letter subsequently addressed to the Secretary of War, he says: "The exposed situation of the Floridas imperiously demands that its frontier upon the coast should be immediately inhabited by white citizens." He states, "the largest portion of the Seminoles are a part of the Creek nation," and adds, "with what pretence of justice can those who fled from the Creek nation, and kept up an exterminating war on our frontier, until crushed by the arm of our Government in 1818, set up such claims?"

After examining these documents, the Committee on Indian Affairs of this House reported that, in their opinion, the Indians, as a nation, own no land in Florida, except where it was granted to them by the Spanish authorities—that they stood in the relation of domestic dependent communities. This report was concurred in by the House. It was apparent, therefore, that it was the intention of the executive Government, as well as of Congress, that the largest portion of these Indians should be sent back to the nation to which they belonged—being, as I have said, runaway Creeks, and having no such attachments to the "bones of their ancestors" as is so often and so falsely ascribed to them; a mere fancy, much better suited to poetry, fiction, and romance, than what we know of their senseless and brutal characters.

Some time after this, a commission was authorized to treat with these Indians, and their negotiations led to this treaty of Camp Moultrie. It will be observed that, at this treaty, these very runaway Creeks, in direct opposition to the recommendations of General Jackson, and the deliberate views of Congress, as expressed in Governor Metcalf's report, were permitted, in conjunction with the others, to contract for and obtain the possession of about 5,000,000 acres of land in the peninsula of East Florida. I admit that this treaty constitutes a guarantee of possession, until changed or rescinded by some subsequent contract or convention. Within a few years after the conclusion of this treaty, the Indians were found actually in a state of starvation, and a large sum was appropriated by this Government. Ay, sir, a much larger sum than has been doled out by a reluctant hand to our own suffering fellow-citizens, who have a right to appeal to this Government for protection, and who were intended to be provided for under the generous resolution which passed this House with such unanimity at the commencement of hostilities.

In consequence of intimations given by these Indians, through their agent, that there was not sufficient game to support them, I was appointed a commissioner, in the year 1827, to offer them a country of sufficient extent to the west of the Mississippi, with a guarantee of title and possession forever, in exchange for the lands occupied by them in Florida. They were unwilling to go without an examination of the country, and I had no authority to enter into a contract to pay the expenses of a deputation; all which was reported to the Government. In 1831 or 1832 it was represented to this Government, by the Indians themselves, that they desired to form a treaty with the United States, to exchange these lands for others on the west of the Mississippi. Colonel Gadsden was appointed commissioner; and, in a council of all the head chiefs and warriors, fully represented, at Payne's Landing, on the 9th of May, 1832, a conditional convention was entered into.

In the preamble to this treaty it was recited that "the Seminole Indians, regarding with just respect the solicitude manifested by the President of the United States for the improvement of their condition, by recommending a removal to a country more suitable to their habits and wants than the one they at present occupy in the Territory of Florida, are willing that their confidential chiefs should be sent to examine the country assigned to the Creeks; and should they be satisfied with the character of the country, and the favorable disposition of the Creeks to reunite with the Seminoles as one people, the articles of compact and agreement shall be binding on the respective parties."

By the first article of this treaty, which was thus to be binding upon the performance of two conditions precedent, the Seminole Indians relinquish to the United States all claim to land they occupy in Florida, and agree to emigrate, &c.

This same article provides for an additional extent of territory to be added to the Creek country for the Seminoles.

The second article provides that the United States shall make compensation for all improvements, and pay certain annuities.

The third article provides for goods to be delivered after their arrival. The fourth and fifth for blacksmiths and valuation of cattle.

By the sixth article, the United States are to pay $7,000 for slaves and other property alleged to have been stolen by the Indians.

The seventh article provides for their removal within three years, and that the expenses of the removal should be paid by the United States, with their subsistence for twelve months after their arrival.

This treaty was signed by James Gadsden on the part of the United States, and by fifteen chiefs and headmen from this vagabond Seminole nation.

The confidential chiefs and agents, in pursuance of the convention entered into, visited these lands west of the Mississippi in the year 1833, and in a treaty then and there entered into at Fort Gibson, on the 28th of March, 1833, with three United States commissioners, they express their satisfaction with the country assigned them; and the "favorable disposition of the Creeks" was manifested by a treaty solemnly entered into, by which they agree that the Seminoles should be reunited with them.

The treaty of Payne's Landing was to take effect upon the happening of two contingencies—the expression of satisfaction of the confidential chiefs, and the favorable disposition of the Creeks; both of which were ascertained, reported, and acted upon, and the treaty regularly presented by the President of the United States for the advisement and consent of the Senate, and due proclamation of the ratification made in April, 1834.

Now, sir, this is a faithful history of the relations and negotiations between this Government and the Indians up to the period when this treaty was ratified, proclaimed, and published, and became the supreme law of the land; to execute which this appropriation has been proposed and passed by the Senate. The United States have set apart the lands, paid the annuities, and in every form and manner executed with fidelity, and the most scrupulous honor, all their stipulations.

We are now told, for the first time, that this treaty is not binding, and we are called upon to set it aside. We are called upon, too, by gentlemen who complain most loudly against the nullification by Georgia of a decision of the Supreme Court, made in support of the rights secured to Indians under the treaties with this Government. I demur to the jurisdiction of this House, and deny its authority to vacate or annul a treaty ratified by the Senate, and proclaimed by the President as the law of the land. I go further: I deny the authority to withhold an appropriation to execute an existing treaty, or to refuse to supply the subsistence to those Indians who have removed, or those who may go or be removed during the present year. This House, by a unanimous vote, decided that, in their opinion, the French Chamber of Deputies had no right to refuse the appropriation to carry into effect our convention with France, and that the treaty must be insisted upon. I might ask whether any gentleman who voted for that resolution can consistently vote against an appropriation to execute this treaty? I say this treaty! Have we authority in this indirect way to vacate it?

Indian Annuities, &c.

I proceed, however, to examine the grounds on which it is attempted to be impeached, and I will show they are as deficient in sound argument as they are fallacious in principle.

The first ground taken is, that this treaty is void because it was not presented to the Senate at the first session after its conclusion, for ratification.

To this I have first to answer, that neither the constitution, the usages of this Government, nor the principles of international law, require any such thing. On the contrary, what is now contended for, for the first time, is condemned both by practice and principle. We have examples under this Government in which the executive and legislative departments have, in their intercourse with foreign Governments, maintained the reverse of what is now contended for by the gentleman from Vermont. The Florida treaty was concluded the 22d of February, 1819, and was not ratified by the King of Spain until late in the year 1821. We did not then argue that that treaty was void. On the contrary, the distinguished gentleman [Mr. ADAMS] over the way vehemently maintained that it was a treaty from the date of its signature by the respective plenipotentiaries, and the President and Congress maintained the same ground.

The French convention, which has so recently excited such deep interest from one end of this country to the other, was signed at Paris on the 4th of July, 1831, and a contest has been carried on for the last two years whether this was a treaty or not, without the confirmatory approbation of the French Chambers in the form of an appropriation. This House resolved unanimously to insist upon it as a treaty.

Here, then, is a treaty, signed by the competent authorities, dependent upon two acts, which the President and Senate, to whom have been confided by the constitution the diplomatic relations of our Government, have decided to have been performed, the treaty ratified in due form of law, and yet it is proposed to vacate and nullify it by a self-constituted "aula regis," which assumes to decide what the constitution never gave them, the right to inquire into and to set at naught the supreme law.

I proceed, however, to the second ground alleged by the gentleman. If I understood him correctly, he maintained that because one third of these Indians had not been removed in 1833, and one third in 1834, the whole could not be removed in 1835, when the treaty required that the last of them should be removed. That they did not go and examine the country, and report their agreement, or dissent, in time for one third to remove in 1833, was their own fault, or omission, which, upon any principle of national law, they cannot claim as a release of their obligation. The final period fixed for the removal of the whole tribe expired in May, 1835. Whether the delay of the two preceding years was produced by the acts of the Indians, or the omissions of the Government, is a matter which in nowise invalidates the obligatory effects of the treaty. It does not appear that the Indians, through their agent, complained, and no one has a right to complain for them.

If it really be a hardship upon these Indians to execute their agreement, and remove to the westward, one third of the nation has had the benefit of two years' residence in Florida longer than was contemplated and agreed upon, in consequence of their omission, and of course cannot complain of the Government for this forbearance and indulgence. The treaty was ratified in 1834. The period arrived when, by the expiration of three years, the tribe were to remove. They manifested some reluctance to execute this contract, and, after various equivocations, delays, and impositions, they were told they must go. Yes, sir; this cruel and inhuman Government, who were urged on by some gentlemen who are now opposed to this appropriation to make war on France for a delay in not executing their contract, signified to the Indians, as they did to Louis Philippe, that we insisted upon the treaty; they were further told that if they longer delayed to perform what they had promised, after they had accepted the annuities and considerations stipulated by this Government, they must be forced. This is the cruel injustice so much complained of by the gentleman from Vermont. After some remonstrances and petitions on their part to the commanding general, they entered into a new agreement with him, which has been printed and placed on our tables, communicated by the President in a special message, which I will read:

"We, the undersigned chiefs and sub-chiefs of the Seminole tribe of Indians, do hereby, for ourselves and for our people, voluntarily acknowledge the validity of the treaty between the United States and the Seminole nation of Indians, made and concluded at Payne's Landing, on the Ocklawaha river, on the 9th of May, 1832, and the treaty between the United States and the Seminole nation of Indians, made and concluded at Fort Gibson, on the 28th day of March, 1833, by Montford Stokes, H. L. Ellsworth, and J. F. Schermerhorn, commissioners on the part of the United States, and the delegates of the said nation of Seminole Indians on the part of the said nation; and we, the said chiefs and sub-chiefs, do, for ourselves and for our people, freely and fully assent to the above-recited treaties, in all their provisions and stipulations.

"Done in council at the Seminole agency, this 23d day of April, 1835.

[Signed by sixteen chiefs and sub-chiefs.]

"In presence of

"A. C. W. FANNING, Brevet Lt. Col. U. S. A.

"C. M. THURSTON, Captain 3d Regt. Artillery.

"T. W. LENDRUM, Captain 3d Regt. Artillery.

"JOSEPH W. HARRIS, First Lieut. 3d Artillery.

"WILEY THOMPSON, Superintendent to remove Seminole Indians."

It appears by this agreement, thus voluntarily entered into, that a further time of nearly one year was given to them, upon a solemn pledge that they would execute their agreement, in conformity with the provisions of the treaty, by a removal to the land assigned them. This agreement was signed by sixteen chiefs.

Some time after this, Powell, who had made the greatest difficulty, came in and signed the same agreement voluntarily, as detailed in the report of the War Department, which I will read:

"General Thompson, in a letter of the 3d June, reported that Powell, one of the most influential chiefs of Seminoles, had behaved so badly in his office that he was put in irons and confined. On the next day, however, he signified his regret, and his willingness to sign the agreement and emigrate. To test his sincerity he was released, and had five days given to him, while at liberty, during which he could come forward to affix his name to the instrument the others had signed." "True to his professions," says the agent, "he this day appeared with seventy-nine of his people, men, women, and children, including some who had joined him since his conversion, and redeemed his promise. He told me many of his friends were out hunting, whom he could and would bring over on their return. I have no doubt of his sincerity, and as little that the greatest difficulty is surmounted."

Between the 25th of April and the time of gathering their crop, the whole period was employed in preparations for war. The period arrived at which, by this new agreement, the Indians were to remove. It will be observed that this was the third contract signed by all the chiefs, with the prolongation and indulgence I have referred to. In violation of these promises and conventions, they commenced open hostilities against the unfenced inhabitants of Florida, laid waste and desolated three counties, destroyed more than a million of property, and massacred one hundred of your best officers and troops, before any force could be called into the field to resist them.

Now, if the validity of this treaty is to be determined by this House, according to the rule prescribed by the gentleman from Vermont, upon an inquiry whether "our quarrel is just," I ask every member of this committee whether, before God and all mankind, our cause is not just?

You have seen that, under the Spanish Government, these Indians, as a nation, owned no lands in Florida. You have seen that, by a treaty with the Spanish Government, they had acknowledged the Spanish King as the lord and sovereign of the country; and that his Catholic Majesty had ceded the provinces to the United States, without any stipulation for these Indians. I have referred to the message of President Monroe, and the communication of the Secretary of War, (Mr. Calhoun,) in 1823. I will now read a part of the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs, made at the second session of the seventeenth Congress, in pursuance of the opinions then entertained and expressed by the administration of Mr. Monroe.

The committee say:

"By referring to the documents which were communicated to the committee by the honorable Secretary of War, it will be found that, previous to the cession of Florida to the United States, the Indians were incorporated among the subjects of his Catholic Majesty, and that each Indian had a right to land as well as, and on the same footing with, white, free black, and colored subjects, in any part of the province; a right to lands individually, but none nationally; as the full and complete jurisdiction and sovereignty was vested in, and exercised by, the Spanish Government."

You have seen that, notwithstanding these opinions of President Monroe and his administration; of a committee of the House of Representatives, concurred in by the House; of the recommendations of General Jackson, then Governor of Florida—in the face of all these, a treaty was made with these Indians, guarantying to them the possession of five millions of acres of land in East Florida; and that, from their lazy, indolent, and vicious habits, when they were in a state of actual starvation, they were relieved by the charity of this Government, until, by their own act, and upon their petitions repeatedly presented, they surrendered, by treaty, this country, thus improvidently granted to them in the first instance, and, after two ratifications of the same, they commenced a barbarous, unprovoked, and ferocious war upon men, women, and children; and we are now in this hall called upon to decide whether our "quarrel be just," before appropriations are made to force them to execute this treaty.

I have thus given you a history of the acts of this Government in reference to these Indians, by which it will appear that, from the period of President Monroe's administration to the present day, the conduct of this Government has been marked by forbearance, moderation, and humanity, to these miserable, half-starved, runaway rogues and assassins, in whose favor some sympathy and commiseration are attempted to be excited, at a moment when their tomahawks and scalping-knives are reeking with the blood of innocent women and children, and when your whole Southern frontier is agonized by this ruthless and unprovoked war.

We are told that the first act of hostility abrogates all treaties; and, after the most unsuccessful military operations, in which we have failed to chastise this banditti, that we are to inquire whether it is not better that this Government shall abandon the idea of compelling, by forcible means, the execution of this treaty, thus made, ratified, and sanctioned. This would, indeed, be adding disgrace to misfortune, and prove that this Government, like that of Rome, after Augustus, had at this early period become afflicted with a dropsy at the heart and a paralysis in the limbs.

Sir, if we are to abandon this whole frontier and seacoast to this miserable gang of desperadoes, there is not a Power on earth that will not despise us for our impotence and pusillanimity.

The gentleman from Vermont has read papers detailing the conduct of our Indian agent in cashiering and deposing five chiefs; which act he omitted to tell the House was disapproved, condemned, and censured, by the President and Secretary of War. He has also referred to other acts of this agent and General Clinch, which seem to me to be only referred to in odium of the Government. Whatever may have been the good or evil deeds of this agent, he has gone to his last account, falling a victim to that treacherous hand which, in token of friendship, received from him the rifle which became the fatal instrument of his own destruction.

The language of General Clinch was that which he was instructed to use by the President of the United States. And what was that language? It was to inform these deceitful, equivocating barbarians, that, unless they complied with their contract, they should be forced to it. There are some gentlemen on this floor who were prepared to use this language to that gallant and high-minded nation with whom we were recently on the eve of a serious difficulty. It has been intimated that this difficulty was precipitated by an attempt to secure, by some means, fair or foul, the negroes that these Indians had stolen from the citizens of Georgia many years ago. It has been said, too, that application was made to the Indian office, and an intimation given by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, that, notwithstanding the intercourse law of 1802, individuals without license could be permitted to purchase these negroes. It has been said that individuals, acting upon this opinion, had proceeded to the agency, and although they were not permitted to enter the nation, that they intimated to Indian negroes at the agency their objects and purposes; which, being communicated to the negroes of the nation, was one of the primary causes of this violation of the treaty, and of the desolating war which succeeded.

Of this I know nothing. But I have prepared a resolution calling for this information, which, if true, may call down upon those concerned in it the consequences which must follow from such a development.

I must here notice a letter which has been read from the Governor of Florida, dated in March, 1835. Of the contents of this letter I never heard, before it was read by the Clerk, at the instance of the gentleman from Vermont. This letter, as I understand it, expresses the doubts of the Governor of the validity of the treaty of

Indian Annuities, &c.

Payne's Landing, in 1832. It proceeds to warn the Government of the consequences of attempting to enforce it. The Governor is about the last authority that I should appeal to for the correct construction of, or an enlightened opinion upon, a treaty of this Government, even with an Indian tribe. He will find himself in a new position when he sees himself quoted by those who never acknowledged his authority on any other subject, to assail the administration, and to impeach one of its treaties. I do not know whether I can quote the precise words, in the hasty manner in which the letter was read; but if I understood properly a sentence in that letter, it was, "that the people want the land of the Indians, and will urge their removal, per fas et nefas." This is a grave charge, if the Governor understood the meaning of the terms. I undertake to say that the people of Florida have never desired the lands of these Indians, and have never urged their removal, and that they are incapable of so base an act as that of urging their removal per fas et nefas.

The Governor proceeds to say that the speculators are anxious to get possession of the "Big Swamp." Now, sir, he did know, or ought to have known, that this "Big Swamp" is owned by a most estimable and honorable gentleman at Tallahassee, whose title has been confirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, upon a valid Spanish grant; that court having decided that the title of the lands was in the Spanish Crown, which was competent to convey, by grant, the fee, and that that was not incompatible with the Indian right of occupancy. Now, I will venture to say that this gentleman, the proprietor of the land, has never expressed even a desire to any officer of the general or local Government to get possession of this land; and I know him to be incapable of doing it per nefas. He has always believed, as every sensible man must believe, that it was impossible that the Indians could remain in that location; and that both the policy of the Government and the preservation of the Indians, as well as the security of that whole frontier, required their removal. He would have had an undoubted right to demand of this Government the possession of his land, confirmed by the treaty with Spain; and being, at the date of the treaty of Camp Moultrie, private property, could not be appropriated to the use of the Indians, without a violation of the constitution and treaty with Spain.

I will not charge, positively, any other than a patriotic motive for this letter, though we might find in the position of the Governor a much more forcible reason than he can assign for this disreputable charge on the people of Florida, by the supposition that he may have desired the continuance of the Indians, upon which his salary as superintendent depended. He urges either their continuance or further negotiations. Upon one a salary depended; and upon the other, as the Governor is always ex officio commissioner, as well as ex officio superintendent, he was to negotiate, at the rate of eight dollars per day; and, in either event, was an interested witness against this treaty.

The President is not a man for new negotiations, when a plain contract has been made and violated. His maxim, of maintaining "what is clearly right," applies here. My only regret is, and my suffering constituents will participate in it, that the Government, being forewarned, was not forearmed for this conflict. The Secretary of War, animated by his clemency and humanity, from the purest motives of a kind heart and charitable disposition, was for using persuasion and expostulation, instead of placing at the disposition of General Clinch a force sufficient to chastise these contumacious savages.

The gentleman from Vermont, in reading from one of the documents, of which he has such a mass before him, has given us the true secret of the hostility of these Indians. The fact there developed, combined with the attempt to get their negroes, gives us the clue to this disastrous affair. He states that some of this confidential delegation informed a portion of the tribe in Florida that the Creeks would compel them to account for that portion of the negroes in their possession which had been stolen by the Creek nation from citizens of the State of Georgia. Here, sir, is the denouement of the whole plot. The Creek nation of Indians, by the treaties of Shoulderbone, Galphington, and Augusta, and, perhaps, in some subsequent ones, stipulated to pay for all property destroyed by their men belonging to the citizens of the State of Georgia. It appears that this nation had destroyed and stolen from the people of the State of Georgia property to the amount of about $250,000; and that, in a treaty subsequently entered into with the Creek nation by the United States, this Government received from that nation lands, and consented to pay, in exchange for them, the Creek debt to the citizens of Georgia. As these roving Seminoles and fugitives had taken their portion of the plunder within the Spanish territories, and have concealed these negroes within the depths of that almost impenetrable forest, the Creeks were disposed to avail themselves of the contemplated contiguity of possession to call these hardened criminals to account for having fled within the Spanish territory with these slaves stolen from the people of Georgia, for which the Creeks had paid in the manner I have before mentioned. This, with the attempt of others to get their negroes, is, no doubt, the cause of the war. We may add one additional reason: and that is the impossibility, with their habits, of obtaining subsistence without plunder.

It will be seen that these desperate rogues, in their treaty of Payne's Landing, anticipated the possible identification of some of the slaves they have stolen, and they provide, to quiet such and leave them in possession of this plundered property, that the United States shall pay $7,000 to get rid of the claims.

I must here remark, sir, that the history of this Government does not furnish an instance in which a border population has lived in so much peace and harmony and quietude as that of the people of Florida, in the vicinity of these Indians. There have been no criminations and recriminations or collisions in ten years, except the one referred to by the gentleman from Vermont. The Indians have repeatedly crossed the lines, and stolen the cattle of the inhabitants. The sufferers have chosen rather to pass these trespasses by, than to trouble this Government with petitions, or to come in conflict with the Indians. They preferred to bear and forbear, as long as it was practicable to preserve the peace of the frontiers; and what has been their reward? The destruction of all their property by these ferocious savages; and we are now to debate the question, whether our cause is just, before we decide whether an appropriation is to be made to carry into effect this treaty.

It is even denied that it is a treaty. The question, in fact, is, however it may be presented, whether we shall take part with the Indians, or with our Government and people.

I set out with three propositions, which I think the documents and arguments I have referred to and employed will prove to the satisfaction of a large majority of this House.

The first is, that these Indians have been treated with lenity, humanity, and indulgence, by this Government. Upon this point I do not propose to make any further observations.

I maintain, in the second place, that whatever may have been their rights of soil or of occupancy under the Spanish Government, and by virtue of the treaty of Camp Moultrie, such right was extinguished by the treaty of Indian Annuities, &c.

[H. OF R.]

Payne's Landing, and their ratification of it at Fort Gibson. I have shown that the Senate have ratified, and the President proclaimed, this as a treaty. I deny that the House of Representatives have the constitutional power, in this informal and incidental manner, to inquire into, or vacate, that which the President and the Senate have proclaimed and published as a subsisting treaty. I go further: the House of Representatives themselves have acted upon this instrument as a treaty, and have provided the appropriations for the annuities of the Indians stipulated in it. Two co-ordinate branches of the Government, whose duty it is to see the laws executed, have pronounced this of binding obligation by all the sanctions of solemn legislation; and I have shown that it cannot be impeached under any provision of the constitution or laws of nations. The question then presented is, are we to confess ourselves beaten, acknowledge that we were in fault, "sue for peace" in a more humble attitude than Oscola did to General Gaines, and give up the contest?

The breaking out of war puts an end to treaties. This war is commenced by the Indians. Are we to yield, or are we to maintain that these Indians have, by treaty, surrendered all the lands they own in Florida, and that we will compel them to execute this treaty, or annihilate them by force of arms? I am sure, if this question is presented to the American people, there can be but one answer; and that is, that, as long as we maintain, among the nations of the earth, a character for justice, and honor, and courage, we are not to be bullied, whipped, or driven, into such a debasing alternative. I appeal to all those gentlemen who represent districts of country which have long since been happily freed from such an annoyance, whether there is an instance in the whole United States in which more lenity has been used, and whether this is an occasion in which any misplaced and sickly sentimentality can be employed, when a savage enemy, who has violated your treaties, and is destroying your countrymen, is to be indulged, either to assail the administration, or to prevent an appropriation for carrying into effect your treaties?

In the third place, I maintain that this House has no jurisdiction, under the constitution, to annul a treaty; and that you cannot refuse to appropriate money for the removal and subsistence of the friendly portion of the Seminole Indians, or of those who may be subdued in the progress of this unfortunate and ill-conducted war, which is to recommence when our troops leave their "summer quarters."

I invoke gentlemen, upon such a question, to disregard all party considerations, and look upon it as it is presented under the constitution and the treaty.

It is not my province to speak of the origin and causes which led to this Creek difficulty. There are individuals here who represent the States in which this war is now raging. It is for them to defend the course of the States of Alabama and Georgia. Whatever irritation may have been produced by speculations in Creek lands, I am satisfied that the true cause of this Creek war arises from the circumstance of the great extremity to which the nation is reduced for the want of provisions, and that it is a war waged for plunder, and to prevent starvation. Under these circumstances, I am satisfied that both sound policy and humanity require that this appropriation should be made for their removal.

Mr. VINTON said there were documents in relation to this subject which had been ordered to be printed, but which had not yet been laid on the tables of the House. As it was indispensable that the information contained in those documents should be in the possession of the House, before acting on these appropriations, he hoped the bill would be postponed till all the evidence was sent in. He therefore moved that the committee rise.

Mr. LAWLER stated a fact that he had received a letter only yesterday, from a source in which he had the utmost reliance, containing the assurance that the upper Creeks were prepared for emigration, were encamped for the purpose, but were utterly unprovided, and were begging for agents. He had also other authentic intelligence to the same effect. He therefore put it to the gentleman whether that committee were not bound to act promptly.

Mr. VINTON replied that there was a sum of one hundred and fifty odd thousand dollars already appropriated for the purpose. Let the Government, then, send on an agent with that; and, in the mean time, the House could consider of the propriety of appropriating more money. Let the gentleman from Alabama accept the amendment of the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. EVERETT.] The amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs contemplated the forcible removal of the Creeks. Mr. V. then withdrew the motion that the committee rise.

Mr. GLASCOCK hoped the committee would act finally on this bill without rising. He was sure no gentleman from the South desired to suppress the fullest investigation, either in relation to the National or the State Governments, as regarded the conduct of either towards the Indians. For himself he desired it. Mr. G. said he wished to address the committee at length; but as the gentleman from Ohio had the floor, he would yield it to him, and he hoped that gentleman would proceed. He had no doubt the gentleman knew the contents of those papers.

Mr. HAYNES said the gentleman from Ohio had fallen into an error. The amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs did not contemplate the forcible removal of the Indians.

Mr. VINTON said he did know the contents of those papers, and he therefore renewed the motion that the committee rise, so that they might be put in possession of them. Mr. V. withdrew the motion at the request of

Mr. ADAMS, who said that, until that morning, no information had been furnished to the House in regard to the immediate causes of the Indian war. Mr. A. then went on to reply to the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. WHITE,] and adverted to the effect of the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BELL explained, that forcible removal was not contemplated by the amendment.

Mr. HAYNES was at a loss to conceive how the amendment could be interpreted to be intended to go further than the provisions of the treaty. Nothing like forcible removal was certainly embraced in it.

Mr. ADAMS resumed. The question was, whether we were at peace or at war with these Indians. If the latter, force must be contemplated. He went on to argue this point at some length, and to reply to the gentleman from Florida. He said no information had been furnished to the House, by which it could tell whether these appropriations were asked to carry on an offensive war, or to carry into effect the provisions of a treaty. In reference to the latter point, he quoted a letter of the Governor of Georgia, which said the "Indians must be removed at the point of the bayonet." If this was to be considered carrying a treaty into effect, it was a most extraordinary mode.

Mr. BELL said a few words in explanation. He understood that there was a large proportion of the Creeks who were neither hostile, nor inclined to be hostile, but were desirous to emigrate. It was with reference to them alone that the appropriation was recommended by the committee, and no force was intended to be applied to them. Specific appropriations for the hostile portion of the Indians had already been made.

After a few remarks from Mr. ASHLEY, the committee then rose and reported.

The Pea Patch—Fortification Bill, &c.

[JUNE 4, 6, 1836.]

The Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. WHITE, of Florida, by leave, offered a resolution requiring certain information from the Secretary of War, in relation to Seminole licenses in the winter and spring of 1825; which was considered and agreed to.

Mr. BELL, on leave, offered a resolution, calling for certain information from the same Department in relation to the Creek hostilities.

Mr. CAMBRELENG hoped the gentleman from Tennessee would make this bill the order of the day for Monday at 12 o'clock. Mr. C. said, on to-morrow at 12 o'clock he would call up the "fortification bill." He could not help expressing his astonishment that information in relation to the origin of the Seminole war should be called for at a moment when this bill was under consideration, and when it was admitted on all hands that the Indians were starving, and were being driven into hostility.

Mr. BELL's resolution was then considered and agreed to.

The House then adjourned.

SATURDAY, JUNE 4.

THE PEA PATCH.

The "bill to authorize a compromise, and secure to the United States the title to the Pea Patch Island, in the river Delaware," was the first bill in order, the question being on its final passage.

Mr. MILLIGAN moved to lay it on the table.

Mr. REYNOLDS, of Illinois, asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and the question was decided in the affirmative: Yeas 96, nays 87. So the bill was laid on the table.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said that the period of the session was so late, and there were so many important bills before the House, he felt compelled to move a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the "bill making appropriations for certain fortifications for the year 1836," and on that motion asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. KINNARD moved to amend the motion by including the bill from the Senate in relation to the Cumberland road.

Mr. ALLAN, of Kentucky, moved to include the bill in relation to the revolutionary soldiers.

Mr. BRIGGS moved to lay the motion to suspend on the table.

Mr. CAMBRELENG called for the yeas and nays; which being ordered,

Mr. BRIGGS withdrew his motion, and

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, renewed it.

Mr. REYNOLDS, of Illinois, asked for the yeas and nays; which being ordered,

Mr. WILLIAMS withdrew the motion.

Mr. ALLAN's motion was then negatived.

Mr. ASHLEY moved to amend the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. KINNARD,] by including the bill to continue the national road from the Mississippi to the city of Jefferson, Missouri. Lost.

Mr. McCARTY then asked for the yeas and nays on the amendment of his colleague, [Mr. KINNARD,] which were not ordered, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SEVIER moved to include in the motion of the gentleman from New York the two bills for the admission of Arkansas and Michigan into the Union. He remarked that he hoped the House would consent to take up those bills, consider them, and stick to them till they were disposed of. The motion was lost.

The question then recurred on the original motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, and it was decided in the negative: Yeas 95, nays 89—not two thirds.

MCCLELLAND AND SMITH.

The "bill for the relief of Thomas McClelland and James Smith" was taken up, the question being on its final passage.

Mr. MANN, of New York, opposed the bill; and, after some further remarks from Messrs. LANE, BELL, HARDIN, PARKS, PIERCE of New Hampshire, TOUCEY, GARLAND of Virginia, WHITTLESEY of Ohio, and MASON of Ohio,

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of Claims. Lost.

Mr. CRANE asked for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill, which were not ordered; and the question being taken, the tellers reported yeas 66, nays 51—no quorum.

Mr. MANN, of New York, then renewed the call for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 88, nays 62. So the bill was passed.

CONVENTION WITH SPAIN.

Mr. ADAMS, on leave, from the committee of conference on the part of the House upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the "act to carry into effect the convention between the United States and Spain," made a report thereon, (which had been already concurred in by the Senate,) which was concurred in by the House.

POTOMAC BRIDGE.

On motion of Mr. BOULDIN, the House took up the joint resolution authorizing the repair of the Potomac bridge, and the same was read a third time and passed.

JOHN MCCARROLL.

The "bill for the relief of John McCarroll, Jr.," was read the third time, the question being on its passage; and, after some remarks from Messrs. MANN of New York, HAWES, TALIAFERRO, UNDERWOOD, MERCER, BOULDIN, CHAMBERS of Pennsylvania, MASON of Virginia, VINTON, and PARKER,

Mr. PARKER moved to postpone the bill till Friday next. Lost.

The discussion was further continued by Messrs. HUNTSMAN and McCOMAS; when

Mr. JOHNSON, of Louisiana, moved the previous question; when 42 only voting in the affirmative, (there being no quorum present,) Mr. J. withdrew the motion.

After some further remarks from Messrs. HUNTSMAN and PARKER,

Mr. ANTHONY moved an adjournment; which was carried, and

The House adjourned.

MONDAY, JUNE 6.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. MANN, of New York, rose and said it should be recollected that about this period Congress was now in the seventh month of this session, and that public expectation was already awakened to the period about which they were to close their labors. Several efforts had been heretofore made to suspend the rules to introduce a resolution with a view to fix the day of adjournment of Congress; and he would now submit a motion to the Chair, which he hoped would meet the assent of the House.

Mr. THOMAS asked the gentleman from New York to suspend his motion for a few moments, to give him (Mr. T.) an opportunity of saying a few words in relation to the Maryland resolutions.

Mr. MANN replied that he would comply with the request of the gentleman from Maryland, but those resolutions would come up as soon as the motion Mr. M. intended to submit was disposed of. Mr. M. then moved to suspend the rules for the purpose of taking up the joint resolution of the Senate fixing the day of adjournment of the present session of Congress. If the House should consent to take it up, he gave notice that he would then move to postpone its further consideration till some early day next week, when there might be a general understanding on the subject.

Mr. BRIGGS remarked, as it was important there should be a full House present on this subject, he moved a call of the House. Lost.

Mr. BRIGGS then asked for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, expressed a wish that the gentleman from New York would withdraw his proposition, so that they might have an opportunity that morning to present petitions and memorials.

Mr. MANN replied that his motion would not take up more time than the calling of the yeas and nays, and he could not, therefore, consent to withdraw it.

The yeas and nays were then ordered; and, on taking the question, the vote was, yeas 90, nays 63.

So the House refused to suspend the rules, two thirds not voting in the affirmative.

MARYLAND RESOLUTIONS.

The joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Maryland, recommending the subject of the distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands among the several States of the Union, presented several weeks ago, came up as the first business in order.

Mr. THOMAS then rose and spoke, in substance, as follows:

Mr. Speaker: Before this subject is disposed of, I desire to say a few words. In the National Intelligencer of Saturday, the remarks of my colleague, [Mr. JENIFER,] made some time since, in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, are published. They form a part of the proceedings of Congress, and will constitute a portion of the debates of this House, to be published possibly hereafter in permanent form. The article in the Intelligencer is therefore essentially different from an ordinary newspaper publication. This being the case, I can with propriety advert to it, without subjecting myself to the just censure of those who rightly complain of the time which is consumed here, in unprofitable discussions of irrelevant matters. If the publication in question did not form, as it does, a part of our proceedings, however it might concern me personally, it would not be noticed on this floor. As it is, the House will pardon a few remarks.

It will be remembered that the gentleman, [Mr. JENIFER,] late at night on the 24th of May, when the fortification bill was under discussion, and when the House was very impatient to dispose of that measure, rose to address the Chair, and requested me particularly to attend to what he had to say concerning "the State of Maryland, himself, and myself." Thus invited, I could not, reluctant as I was to perform a part in the scene, refuse to take a seat where I could hear what was to be said. After I discovered that it was the purpose of the gentleman to comment on the language used by me, when he had presented the resolutions from Maryland, concerning the power of either House of Congress to expunge entries from its journal, I felt a strong desire to induce him to postpone what he had to say on this subject until the resolutions themselves came up for consideration. With that view, (seeing that the gentleman had so far extended his remarks that I could not, and would not then, interrupt the business of the House long enough to reply,) I asked him not to detain the committee, but to publish what he had to say, and promised to reply through the same medium, if any reply should become necessary. To this request he responded by declaring that he was responsible for what he said, or for what he might print. This induced me to ask whether I was to consider any thing which had been said to be of a personal character. And he replied, "No, sir; not at all." Now, sir, this disclaimer is omitted in the published speech; while several phrases of a questionable character are retained, especially that just named. This imposes on me the necessity to ask the attention of the gentleman to one or two sentences in this publication that are calculated to do both of us injustice. They are somewhat equivocal, and ought not to be so. It is due to him that there should be no doubt as to his intentions, and it is due to me that nothing of this character should be left to conjecture.

In the publication in the Intelligencer, the gentleman is reported to have said, although my colleague says "he did not object to the reception of the resolutions on account of their contents, I will undertake to show, from irresistible inferences, that it was to the contents alone, to which he did object." And again he is reported to have said, "and yet my colleague, from the upper district in Maryland would have you believe that it was not the contents of those resolutions to which he objected."

That there may be no misapprehension as to the meaning to be attached to the words here quoted, I ask the gentleman to say whether it has been or is his purpose to question or bring in question my veracity?

[Mr. JENIFER rose, and after referring to other portions of the former debate, concluded by declaring that he had no intention to impeach the veracity of Mr. THOMAS.]

Mr. THOMAS proceeded, and said he was satisfied. He had a right to expect such a reply, and was glad that it had been given, as it was equally due to his colleague and to himself. He was done with it. These personalities were to him very annoying in one particular. It is generally believed that all who are concerned in them delight in and seek that miserable ephemeral notoriety—not fame—which they are calculated to secure. And, for one, he did not desire for a moment to possess that reputation with any intelligent being.

Mr. T. said, that having disposed of that which concerned him as a man, he would notice those parts of this published speech that concerned him as a representative. He would not reply to that part of his colleague's remarks which related to the two gentlemen from the city of New York, except to say that there is a strange incongruity in some of its sentences. The gentleman [Mr. JENIFER,] has declaimed warmly against our profligate expenditures, and says "many of the appropriations have been unprecedented, extravagant in the highest degree, and uncalled for by any system of economical expenditure." "It is the policy and determination to squander it [the public money] away upon useless objects, sooner than there shall be a surplus to be returned to the people by an equitable distribution among the States." This is certainly strong language; these are bold charges; but the force and effect of the one and the other must be entirely destroyed when a preceding sentence in the same speech is adverted to. There the gentleman has declared: "Mr. Chairman, for myself, I have opposed no obstacle to the appropriation bills proper, more particularly that for the defence of the country externally, and that for the suppression of hostilities within our borders or upon the frontier."

It so happens that we have passed no bills making appropriations which could, with any plausibility, be denounced as extravagant, and calculated to increase the patronage of this Government, or diminish greatly and improperly the surplus revenue, but those to the passage of which the gentleman says he has "opposed no obstacle." And assuredly complaints about "profligate expenditures" come with an ill grace from any one who cannot show, at the time they are uttered, that he has, at least by his votes, endeavored to enforce a system "of economical expenditure." If he has not voted against either the navy bill, the civil list bill, the fortification bill, or any one of the bills intended to provide for the defence of our frontiers, and the suppression of Indian hostilities, he must share, with the rest of us, the responsibilities attached to the passage of them all—a responsibility which I think cannot be considered very onerous.

After having disposed of these grave matters, the gentleman has proceeded to settle an account with me, which, we are told, concerns also himself, myself, and the State of Maryland. Well, I could be content to pass over this settlement without correcting its errors, for it is intended, I presume, especially for the benefit of the people whom we in part represent; and as they would readily correct the gross errors which the gentleman has committed, I could with great propriety leave the whole settlement to be corrected by them; but as I am up, I will detain the House with a few remarks.

It is remarkable that he has not attempted to justify the conduct of that part of the people of Maryland who persist in resisting all amendments of the constitution of that State, calculated to do justice to those who are not only a very large majority of the people, but who pay much, very much, the largest proportion of all the revenues that are collected by the State for public purposes.

The truth is, this conduct of the minority of the people of Maryland, who have accidental control of the Government, is such, so unjust, so tyrannical, and anti-republican, that it would be an unpleasant task to defend it before such an assemblage as this. It may be vindicated before an audience in one of the small counties, or in the borough of Annapolis, where your hearers are deeply interested in perpetuating these monstrous abuses; but in an assembly like this, constituted as it is of men who have imbibed the liberal doctrines of the age on the subject of the rights of man, it would be indeed to an ingenuous man a most odious and irksome task to vindicate the antiquated and obnoxious constitution of Maryland. Avoiding a work of that character, the gentleman has thought proper to tender collateral issues. Foreseeing, perhaps, that he would be discomfited in an attempt to show that the Legislature of the State is so constituted as to be authorized to speak for the people concerning national politics, and apprehensive, probably, in an effort to exhibit any thing peculiar in the condition of the people of Maryland that required the majority to submit to the dominion of the minority, he has discreetly discussed other matters, meriting a passing notice.

The grave matter to which I shall advert is that introduced in these words: "I will only refer you to my colleague, [Mr. THOMAS,] who sits by me. His political experience will inform you how easy it is to have washed out the deepest dye of federalism, even if derived from the blood of forefathers." In this the gentleman is mistaken. I have not certainly the required experience in my own person. There has never been any "deep dye of federalism" to be washed out. I have never assumed and have never felt the slightest responsibility for the acts or principles of either of the political parties of this country, done or entertained before I reached manhood. As to the period when that occurred, it would be unkind to compel me to speak with entire precision. Being a bachelor, and of course more than five-and-twenty, (for without that I could not be here,) I am of that age when a single man dislikes to tell his birthday. This I can say, however: I was not born in 1798, and never had an opportunity to vote for any Chief Magistrate, until I voted for General Jackson, in November, 1824. From that time until now I have continued to be an open, ardent, undisguised, member of that political party with which I am now identified. This party was first organized and known in Maryland as the Jackson party. Since then it has assumed the style and title of the democratic republican party; and with that name emblazoned on our banner, we will carry on the contest until my own native State is regenerated and redeemed. With this change of name there has been no abandonment of principle. We organized in 1823, to aid in the elevation of General Jackson to the presidency. We reorganized in 1827, to vindicate the sovereignty of the people, assailed as it had been in the election by Congress of an individual to the presidency who was not the choice of a majority of the people. And we have, under the administration of the present Chief Magistrate, done much to harmonize the conflicting interests of the country, brought into dangerous collision by the rivalry of ambitious statesmen. With the politics of my party associates I am content. Maryland has always been hostile to a high tariff—the root from whence has sprung most of the bitter fruit of which we have been compelled to taste. And during my experience in Congress, four fifths of those with whom I act here aided to reduce the tariff; and nine tenths of the same party have, at the present session, resisted all attempts to agitate that question which, above all others, is dangerous to our peace, and to the duration of this Government. My colleague cannot felicitate himself in like manner. The national republicans of Maryland, of whom he was one, being themselves hostile to a high tariff, struggled for years to elect to the presidency its bold and talented champion. Thus inconsistently attempting to give vast powers to the enemy of these principles, and to arm with the veto power a man pledged solemnly to exert it for the preservation of that policy which Maryland has always desired to overthrow. And the same party is now engaged in the forlorn undertaking to elect General Harrison, while many of his friends, in and out of Congress, are mischievously distracting its councils, and jeopardizing the safety of a large portion of the population of Maryland, by agitating out of place and unwisely a disturbing and most delicate question.

The matter next in order, on which the gentleman has dwelt so long, will be briefly disposed of. He has undertaken to criticise the language used by me when he presented the resolutions of Maryland concerning the power of either House of Congress to expunge obnoxious matter from its journal, and insists that I was "mistaken" when I declared that the contents of those resolutions did not induce me to object to their reception. If the gentleman had not forgotten his own language, to which mine was in reply, the strange misapprehension of the import of my words, which has caused this very idle discussion, could not have existed. He had offered to present the resolutions. I asked him to offer them when the rules of the House did not forbid debate; and he, in reply, signified that the subject-matter of the resolutions was so unacceptable to me that I did not desire to see it printed by the House; and said he was ready to show that the opinions expressed by the State in the resolutions were well founded. It was then that I declared I was misunderstood, and that I "did not object to the reception of the resolutions on account of their contents."

This was tantamount to, and was intended to be, a declaration that I did not object to the reception of the resolutions because they contained matter of which I disapproved, or which I was unwilling to see published. It was not my purpose to inquire whether the House had, or had not, the power to expunge from its journal part of the records of its proceedings. It was not my purpose to oppose the printing of these resolutions on a proper occasion. And hence I desired to correct a misapprehension of my colleague, who I supposed thought that the "contents" of the resolutions were so peculiarly offensive, I was, on that account alone, unwilling to see them either published or received. The report of my remarks in the Globe is (as I have said) substantially correct; and if the whole of that report is taken into view, it does appear to me that there can be no excuse found for the tedious comment with which one of its sentences has been honored. Take, for instance, into consideration these sentences: "Mr. Thomas said it was unnecessary to read them, (the resolutions.) He knew they professed to express the voice of the people of Maryland. Now, whether they attempted to give that voice as to one question or another, he should equally protest against their reception this morning." And in a subsequent part of the same report, I am represented to have protested against the exhibition to the country of any resolutions of the Maryland Legislature, "as evidence that the people of the State are for or against any particular measure of national policy." Unquestionably these sentences ought to be in contemplation of any one, disposed to do me justice, when construing that which has been the subject of most unprofitable criticism. If this be done, my meaning is apparent. I "did not object to the reception of the resolutions, on account of their contents"—or, to speak with more precision, because they contained matter of which I disapproved; but because they were offered on "that morning," when the rules forbade discussion, and because they professed to express the voice of the people of Maryland as to "one question" of "national policy." That that objection would have been made to their reception, at that time, if they had had reference to any other question of "national policy," is proved from the fact that I had also protested, that morning, against the reception of the resolutions from Maryland recommending a distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands. Undoubtedly, if either of those resolutions had contained opinions in accordance with my own, I should have devolved on another the duty of exposing the organic character of the body from whom they had emanated; and in that event I should not have risen in my place to claim for such resolutions that which they could not be entitled to, but would have frankly confessed that the Legislature of the State (the members being apportioned without regard to either population, territory, or taxation) had no authority to express the opinions of a majority of the people.

Maryland Resolutions.

Notwithstanding my reluctance to pursue this discussion further, I cannot permit some other passages of the published speech of the gentleman to pass without comment. I am charged with misrepresenting the people of the State, and even of my own district, in being hostile to the passage of the land bill now on the table, which has been sent to us from the Senate. Before I conclude, I will make all who hear me understand that the gentleman, by making this charge, has assumed a heavy responsibility, and has resorted to most extraordinary measures to sustain it. To prove that I am in an attitude hostile to the wishes of those I have the honor to represent immediately, the gentleman avers that only two of the members of the House of Delegates of Maryland from my district, and not one from the county in which I reside, recorded their votes against the resolution which has been presented here, recommending a distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands. The gentleman well knows that the congressional district from which I come is composed of two entire counties, and of a part only of the county of which I am a citizen. The section of the county in which I reside has, of course, no power to choose delegates to the Legislature, except in conjunction with that part of the same county represented here by another gentleman, [Mr. WASHINGTON.] This fact is well known to the gentleman, I suppose. If it be not known to him, he is very ill informed, indeed, as to the political divisions of the State, and ought not to treat of them until possessed of more accurate information. Now, sir, in this section of a county the friends of this administration constitute a most decided majority. In it I have received at three successive elections a large majority of the votes. At the election of 1833, when it was distinctly understood that I had been hostile to the passage of the land bill in the preceding Congress, and would, if elected, vote against any and every similar measure, I received in this section of a county where I reside a majority of the suffrages, exceeding eight hundred. If, then, all the Delegates from the two counties composing in part the district I represent had voted for resolutions in the Legislature approving of the principles contained in the land bill on your table, will any fair man, with a knowledge of the facts now detailed, contend that their proceedings ought to control my course? They were chosen by one body of constituents—I have been elected by another. They represent two counties, while I represent those two counties and a portion of another.

But is it true that the Delegates referred to have voted for a resolution requesting the representation of Maryland in this House to vote for the land bill? Assuredly not, sir. The resolution which they have sanctioned has been published in the speech of the gentleman, and is in these words, viz:

"Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives of this State in the Congress of the United States be requested to use their exertions to procure the passage of a law to appropriate to the use of the different States of the Union such part of the proceeds of the public lands of the United States as may be equitable and just, and in accordance with the public interest."

There is certainly in this resolution latitude enough. The representatives of the State in this House and in the Senate are requested to distribute the proceeds of sales of the public lands to the use of the different States, but the proportion to be given to each is not prescribed. We are requested to make such a distribution "as may be equitable and just." But, then, whether the distribution proposed to be made in this land bill is "equitable and just" or not, we are to decide. Further, we are requested to make such a distribution as shall be "in accordance with the public interest."

Well, who is to judge whether the action of the land bill, if it should become a law, would accord with the public interest? Is not that question to be decided here by the representatives from the States, each member to judge for himself, under his responsibilities to his constituents and to the country? This resolution appears to have been most cautiously worded. It commits no one very far. It may have been voted for by enemies as well as friends of this land bill. It cannot be necessary to pursue further this argument, to prove the gross injustice and absurdity of the charge that I am, by opposing the passage of the land bill, violating the known will of my constituents. I ask indulgence for a few brief sentences, to expose another extraordinary misapprehension of the gentleman, and I will close my remarks. He has said:

"Looking to her rights as well as to her interests, Maryland has, upon all occasions, viewed this measure [the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands] as one of the highest importance; and it has been approved by all political parties. In 1821 it received the sanction of a federal Senate and a democratic House of Delegates; in 1832 it passed again both branches of the Legislature; and, in 1836, the Van Buren and anti-Van-Buren parties united in support of it; for the former did not dare to go against it. Thus, whenever it has been before the Legislature, amidst all the conflicts of parties, the principles of the land bill have been approved, and the people of Maryland have always sustained their representatives who advocated it."

Maryland Resolutions.

There cannot be readily produced assertions more completely unfounded than many that are made in the sentences here quoted. It is declared that "the principles of the land bill have been approved" by the representatives of the people of Maryland, in their Legislature, in 1821, in 1832, and in 1836. Is this true? The gentleman who has uttered and published this statement no doubt believes it to be true, but stubborn facts can be produced to show the contrary.

What are the principles of the land bill? It is before us. It provides that ten per cent. upon the nett proceeds of sales, within their respective limits, since 21st December, 1832, shall be granted to each of the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Alabama, Missouri, Mississippi, and Louisiana, over and above what each of the said States is entitled to by the compact entered into upon their admission into the Union.

It further proposes to grant to Mississippi, Louisiana, and Missouri, 500,000 acres each; to Indiana, 115,272 acres; to Illinois, 20,000 acres; to Alabama, 100,000 acres—to be applied to internal improvements. And after this has been done, the bill provides for the distribution of the nett proceeds of sales (after deducting the above ten per cent. and the expenses of survey, &c.) of the public lands, among the twenty-four States of the Union, (including of course those to which the above-named donations are to be made,) according to their respective federal representative population. These are some of the most important principles of the land bill. Whether they were "approved of" by the Legislature of Maryland in 1832, I know not. The proceedings of that body, on that occasion, are not now before me. I feel, however, authorized to speak more distinctly respecting the proceedings of the Legislature of that State in 1836. They are here, and it will not be maintained that they contain any evidence whatever that the principles of the land bill, above recited, have been approved by the representatives of the people of Maryland. Indeed, I venture to say, without the fear of contradiction from any respectable quarter, that no proceedings of the Legislature of Maryland can be produced, approving of further donations of public lands to States that have been already much favored in that way, by this Government, prior to the time when a distinguished statesman from the West became the advocate of such a measure. On the contrary, I will show that the opinions and proceedings of all parties in that Legislature were directly antagonistical to any such act on the part of the United States, until Mr. Clay became the advocate of "the principles of the land bill;" since which time his friends and followers in Maryland have seen the rights of the State through a new medium.

In 1820-'21 the following resolutions passed the Senate of Maryland unanimously, and the House of Delegates with but two or three dissenting voices, viz:

"Resolved by the General Assembly of Maryland, That each of the United States has an equal right to participate in the benefit of the public lands, the common property of the Union.

"Resolved, That the States in whose favor Congress have not made appropriations of land for the purposes of education are entitled to such appropriations as will correspond, in a just proportion, with those heretofore made in favor of the other States."

In 1822 the author of these resolutions published a report on the subject, in which he proposed a plan by which the Atlantic States and Kentucky might receive that benefit from the public domain which was claimed for them exclusively. The following extract from this report will show what that plan was: "Should Congress adopt this territorial apportionment as the rule by which to ascertain the quantity to which the Atlantic States and Kentucky are entitled, let them then authorize the President, by law, to cause to be selected, out of such parts of the public domain as he may deem expedient, and to be laid off in the same manner as military bounty lands have heretofore been laid off, a number of tracts, in different parts of the public lands, which shall, in the aggregate, make up the quantity required. These lands being distant from the States for whose benefit they are intended, and within the jurisdiction of others, cannot, either with advantage or convenience, be distributed among them respectively, either for rent or sale." "Let them, then, be sold under the authority of Congress, according to the laws regulating the sales of other public lands, at such times, and in such quantities, as to them may appear expedient, and let the proceeds be paid over, by the Secretary of the Treasury, to commissioners appointed by each of the States entitled to receive a share, in such proportions as may be determined by Congress."

These, I presume, are the resolutions, to be executed as here proposed, to which the gentleman had reference when he said, "thus, whenever it [the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands] has been before the Legislature, amidst all the conflicts of parties, the principles of the land bill have been approved." This declaration cannot but be considered, by all who will compare the opinions of the Legislature of Maryland as expressed in the above resolutions in 1821, as "a bold assumption, contrary to the facts." In proof of this, no argument can be needed. Here are the Maryland resolutions of 1821.

We have given a synopsis of the land bill; and "he who runs may read" that the first measure is in direct conflict with the principles of the latter. The bill proposes to make liberal donations to the new States. The resolutions proposed to make donations of lands to the Atlantic States and to Kentucky alone; and are founded, obviously, in the belief that too much land had been granted in 1821 to those States to which the bill is intended to secure more.

Having, as I hope, demonstrated that the charge brought against me of misrepresenting my constituents, and of disregarding the long-established purposes of my State touching the national domain, is entirely unjust and unwarrantable, I will, with a few comments on one other position assumed by the gentleman, close my remarks. He has stated that, at the presidential election of 1832, "the majority of the aggregate vote of the State was upwards of 1,000 votes against the present incumbent." I had supposed that no member of the party in Maryland which was dominant in the Legislature in 1831-'32, would make it necessary to advert to one of the causes of the result of the presidential election of 1832, which has been stated. But as it has been done, I will state a few facts, and the House will judge whether that result was not produced by one of the boldest political frauds that has ever been perpetrated.

Prior to the census of 1830, the three western counties of Maryland formed one electoral district, empowered to elect two electors of President and Vice President. At the presidential election of 1828, General Jackson received the vote of that district. By the reapportionment of representatives by Congress, under the new census, Maryland lost one member. This rendered it necessary for the Legislature of that State to reorganize the electoral districts. It so happened that the increase of population in the three western counties had been such as to entitle them to choose two electors of President, notwithstanding the increased ratio. If, therefore, the whigs, or national republicans, as they were then styled, had been disposed to act fairly, they would not have changed the boundaries of this district, unless it had been done to establish a system of election for electors of President by a general ticket.

Unfortunately for the rights of the people of the three western counties, the result of the elections of 1831 served to show that the friends of General Jackson had a majority in these counties, and that the election of 1832 would eventuate probably as it had done at the presidential election preceding. To prevent this, as I believe, and to deprive General Jackson of the two electoral votes which he would otherwise receive, the Legislature of the State formed one electoral district, by annexing to the three counties six other counties, and the city of Annapolis, wherein there was a large majority of national republican voters, and gave to this new district power to elect four electors. Not content with this palpable violation of the rights of the people, the Legislature adopted other disreputable means to secure a majority of the electors for Mr. Clay. The county of Baltimore, having a majority of more than twelve hundred favorable to the election of General Jackson, was made to form one district, authorized to elect one elector. The city of Baltimore, where the republicans also largely preponderated, was formed into another electoral district, with power to choose two electors. This being done, all the other counties of the State not included in the above-named district were made to form another district, entitled to choose three electors; there being every reason to believe, judging from past elections, that there was a small majority of the supporters of Mr. Clay therein. At first, the republicans of all parts of the State manifested a disposition to participate in the presidential election, although they knew it would be vain to attempt to deprive Mr. Clay of the seven electoral votes that had been secured for him by the most high-handed measure that has ever characterized the legislation of any free community; and electoral candidates were nominated by them accordingly. Finally, the republicans of Frederick, after full deliberation, decided that it did not become them to go to the polls. The Legislature, they thought, had virtually disfranchised them, and made choice of the electors; and they were unwilling to recognise the validity of the law by which they had been deprived of their rights, by going to the polls and passing through the mere formulas of an election. The gentleman who had been nominated as an electoral candidate by the friends of General Jackson in Frederick county declined being a candidate; and at the election in November there were less than twenty votes given to the republican ticket, and less than three thousand to the candidates friendly to Mr. Clay, although there are more than seven thousand legal voters in the county.

Of those seven thousand voters, nearly one half are, and were in 1832, friendly to the present Chief Magistrate. It is not surprising, therefore, that the aggregate vote of the whole State, for the electoral candidates favorable to Mr. Clay, exceeded that given to the opposing ticket one thousand, since at least three thousand of the friends of General Jackson, in the county of Frederick, indignantly refused to vote, while less than eight hundred of their political opponents in the same county were absent from the polls. History does not furnish an instance of greater tyranny than that which has been described. It has made an indelible impression on the hearts of all its victims. They have now a general ticket system in the choice of electors, and have a fair opportunity, at the approaching presidential election, to make their opponents feel this power. I will make no predictions, but will only say to my colleague, and to this House, that the republicans, the democratic republicans of Maryland, are in motion—roused by the recollection of many wrongs; and that State will heave, from the Atlantic to the Alleghenies, to throw off that incubus which has long weighed upon her heart.

I owe an apology for detaining the House so long on topics not connected with its legislation, but I could not easily, more briefly than it has been done, place myself and my political friends in my State in our true positions, respecting the matters discussed in the speech of the gentleman.

Mr. JENIFER said a few words in reply, and moved that these resolutions, and also the resolutions of the same Legislature in relation to the expunging resolutions before the Senate of the United States, be laid on the table and printed; which was agreed to.

OHIO, MICHIGAN, AND ARKANSAS.

Mr. SEVIER asked the consent of the House to offer a resolution to set apart Wednesday next, at 11 o'clock, and each day thereafter, until the same be disposed of, except Fridays and Saturdays, to consider and dispose of the bills to establish the northern boundary line of the State of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of Michigan and Arkansas into the Union.

Objection being made, Mr. S. moved a suspension of the rules, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. PATTON moved a call of the House. Lost.

The motion to suspend the rules was agreed to: Yeas 137, nays 45.

Mr. C. ALLAN moved to amend the resolution by including the bill to extend the provisions of the pension act of 1832, and asked for the yeas and nays thereon.

Messrs. VANDERPOEL and SPEIGHT raised the point of order, whether the amendment could be moved after the rules had been suspended for a special purpose; and, after some conversation on the point by the SPEAKER, and Messrs. SUTHERLAND, SEVIER, SMITH, C. ALLAN, and CAMBRELENG,

Mr. SEVIER moved the previous question; which was seconded by the House—yeas 110, noes not counted—and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. C. ALLAN then asked for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution; which were ordered.

Mr. DENNY asked for a division of the question: first, on that part of the resolution ending with the bill for the northern boundary of Ohio; and, second, to include the two bills for the admission of Arkansas and Michigan into the Union.

The CHAIR decided that the resolution was not susceptible of such a division, under the 38th rule of the House, and cited a case analogous to the point.

Mr. McCOMAS appealed to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. ALLAN] to withdraw his amendment, and let the question be taken without committing the House at all on the other bill.

Mr. ALLAN did not assent.

The question was then taken on the adoption of the resolution, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 137, nays 57—being two thirds, as follows:

INDIAN ANNUITIES, &c.

In further execution of the special order, the House on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SMITH in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill "making appropriations for the current expenses of the Indian department, for Indian annuities, and for other similar objects, for the year 1836."

The question pending was the ninth amendment made to the bill by the Senate, as follows:

"For the removal of Creek Indians, and their subsistence for one year, including subsistence of those recently removed, in addition to the balance of one hundred and fifty-five thousand dollars of former appropriations, three hundred and forty-eight thousand two hundred and thirty dollars."

"For the removal of Seminole Indians, and their subsistence for one year, in addition to a balance of thirty-three thousand dollars of former appropriations, one hundred and fifty-eight thousand four hundred and thirty-seven dollars and fifty cents."

Mr. BELL, under instructions from the Committee on Indian Affairs, moved that the Committee of the Whole House agree to this amendment, with the following amendments:

Before the word "Creek," in the first line, insert "twenty-one thousand."

Strike out "three hundred and forty-eight thousand two hundred and thirty," and insert, in lieu thereof, "one million and twenty-three thousand five hundred and fifty."

Strike out "one hundred and fifty-eight thousand four hundred and thirty-seven dollars and fifty cents," and insert, in lieu thereof, "one hundred thousand dollars."

Mr. EVERETT proposed a substitute for the above, to come in after the Senate's amendment, as follows: "Under the 12th article of the Creek treaty of 1832, and for holding treaties with the hostile Indians east of the river Mississippi, and for their removal west of that river, $675,330," and addressed the committee at great length on the subject of his amendment, and on the general policy of the Government in reference to the Indian tribes.

Mr. VINTON moved to lay the bill aside, and proceed to the consideration of some of the other bills embraced in the special order, on the ground of want of sufficient information from the War Department.

Mr. OWENS opposed the motion, on the ground that the bill was one of great importance to the South; that the information required was not important; that by delaying the bill for the purpose of obtaining the papers called for, the bill might be lost; that the discussion could still proceed in committee. When the bill came into the House, the information called for would in all probability be read, and then gentlemen could discuss the subject at large.

Mr. GRENELL briefly supported it, and moved that the committee rise, but withdrew it at the request of Mr. GLASCOCK.

Mr. VINTON withdrew his motion to postpone, and the subject of the amendments was then discussed at length by Messrs. HAYNES, ADAMS, SPEIGHT, MANN of New York, GRENELL, EVERETT, WISE, ASHLEY, BELL, and GLASCOCK.

Mr. LEWIS expressed his surprise at the course which honorable gentlemen thought proper to pursue; not of opposition to this appropriation, for they profess to be in favor of it, but of embarrassment to the consideration of it at this time, and until, as they allege, full information can be received from the War Department as to the causes which have led to the hostilities of these two tribes. Sir, (said Mr. L.,) I pretend to know nothing of the causes of hostilities among the Seminoles; but, as the war in the Creek country has been confined exclusively to the district which I have the honor to represent, I take this occasion to say to gentlemen, that, get whatever information they may, they will not be able to convict this administration of indifference to the rights or the interests of the Creek Indians. I shall be credited by those who know the political position I have occupied and still occupy towards this administration, when I say that, so far from the Government having manifested a disposition to violate their treaty obligations to these Indians, its whole course of policy has been one of the most considerate kindness and regard to their rights. Sir, if there has been any error, it has been in carrying this feeling too far, in listening too long to their complaints, and in confiding in their pacific professions until the very moment of perfidious massacre and murder upon our unprotected inhabitants. At the very time that the Government were investigating the alleged frauds committed upon these Indians in the sale of their reservations—at a time when three commissioners were busily engaged in this service—the war-whoop was raised, and a scene of bloodshed and desolation was spread indiscriminately over the land. And, sir, while this war is now raging, gentlemen coolly come forward and refuse to vote the necessary sum for the removal of these Indians west of the Mississippi, until they shall be informed by documents from the War Department that the treaty faith of this Government has been inviolably preserved. From whence comes this new-born zeal for Indian rights? Is it because of the fidelity with which they (the Indians) have kept their treaty stipulations, or is it to justify and even to reward their late perfidy?

Do gentlemen want to know the purpose for which this appropriation is asked? Let them look to the provision in the late Creek treaty, by which this Government stands pledged, not only to the Indians, but to the State of Alabama, to the people who have purchased land in the Creek country, to remove the entire tribe west of the Mississippi. In their zeal to protect the treaty rights of these Indians, do they intend to refuse to execute this provision of a solemn treaty? This is not a question involving an appropriation to hold, as the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] supposes, a new treaty, but whether we will execute the provisions of one already made and ratified, as long ago as 1832. Nor is this appropriation asked to enable us to prosecute the war, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] has suggested. The sum of five hundred thousand dollars has already been appropriated for that purpose; and I feel confident that it is enough to bring the war to a speedy close.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] says that this money is asked to enable us to make war on these Indians, for the purpose of forcing them against their will, at the point of the bayonet, west of the Mississippi. Sir, can the gentleman from Massachusetts assign this as one of the purposes of a war commenced by the Indians themselves, at a time, too, when the Government was using its best exertions to secure them in their rights, and before any attempt at removal was made? The gentleman seems exceedingly anxious that these Indians should not be removed against their will. Let me say to that gentleman, that a portion of these Indians who have not taken up arms are at this time most anxious to remove, and for the reason, principally, that they may escape the consequences of this war which the lower Creeks have brought down upon them. I am informed, sir, that several of the friendly portions of this tribe are now imbedded, and call upon this Government, agreeably to the treaty, for an agent, with means to remove them west of the Mississippi. At one point it is said that three hundred are imbedded, and, for the want of this appropriation, they have not the means of subsistence. Will the exclusive advocates of Indian rights suffer these parties to disperse for the want of food, and, in their starving condition, to wander about to beg that bread which this Government is bound to furnish them? Are they not aware that as soon as they are dispersed through the country they are in danger of being shot, through mistake, for hostiles? How are the people of Alabama to distinguish between them? And will gentlemen, with professions of humanity on their lips, put these friendly Indians on a footing but little better than that of the perfidious hostiles? Sir, I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, who insists that these Indians are not to be removed against their consent, what is to be done with such as are taken with arms in their hands? Will you ask them if they are willing to be removed? Will you observe towards them the faith of treaties, while their hands are reeking with innocent blood? Or will you treat them as they really are; as a hostile tribe who, in violation of all treaties, have commenced a most savage and bloody war; a war of indiscriminate massacre upon helpless women and children! What claim have they on the sympathy of gentlemen?

I repeat the question, what is to be done with such as are taken with arms in their hands? What disposition will you make of such as in the chances of war are overpowered by our troops? Shall we retaliate on them by murdering them? Gentlemen will say no. Can we give them a parol of honor? If we turn them loose one day, would we not meet them in fight the next? Are they to be again sent abroad among the people of Alabama to desolate and destroy? Is this the policy which my constituents are to expect at the hands of this Government? If this be the decision, it is one which dooms every Indian now in arms to extermination. The people of Alabama will consult their own safety in utter destruction of the hostile tribe. They cannot make peace with them; they cannot and will not again trust their pledges and professions of friendship.

Sir, said Mr. L., every motive of policy, every requisition of justice to the people of Alabama, every consideration even of humanity to the Indians now in arms against us, requires that this appropriation should be passed to remove them by force—yes, sir, even at the point of the bayonet—west of the Mississippi. It is unjust in the extreme to contend that they are to remain in the heart of a population they have outraged by the most savage treachery, until they shall give their consent to be removed. Do gentlemen expect us to fold in our very bosoms the adder whose venom we have already felt, that he may again sting us to our vitals? No, sir; we claim their forcible removal from among us. We demand that no terms shall be held with them until they are taken out of the limits of the United States; and if it is then necessary, as the gentleman from Missouri suggests, to guard our Western frontier against their further treachery, let us there station upon them a military force, which can awe them into submission. If we send any more agents among them, let them be military agents, with the ability to coerce them into obedience.

Mr. L. said, I have made these remarks in reply to the objection that we should not proceed further in this matter until additional information is received. What further information is desired? Do gentlemen wish to be notified of the existence of an Indian war with a large portion of this tribe, that this war was commenced by that tribe, and that the laws of war, and not a violated treaty, are to govern in punishing and expelling the hostile savages from our soil? Gentlemen say that the amount of this appropriation is increased. Has not this very war rendered additional appropriation necessary? Sir, as I before said, the friendly Indians will willingly emigrate, to escape from this war. The hostiles, as soon as subdued, must either be removed or murdered as prisoners of war. The bill contemplates the removal within this year of nearly the whole tribe; and the amount asked will be found not too large to effect this purpose.

Sir, I desire that this question should be met, not in a preliminary discussion, but upon its merits. I pledge myself ready to meet gentlemen face to face, in the freest and fullest investigation. I hold myself ready to vindicate my constituents from every imputation as to the causes which have produced this war. As to the legislation of my State over these Indians, I will not condescend to offer palliation or apology. What she has done has been within her acknowledged chartered limits, in the exertion of her high sovereign will; and she is not responsible in the exertion of that will either to this House or to this Government. Upon any other topic connected with this question I will meet either the taunts or the arguments of gentlemen; and all I ask of them is to come up to the real question without delay. Sir, if we act upon this subject at all, we should act promptly.

Mr. GLASCOCK, after proceeding for some time, gave way to

Mr. BELL, on whose motion the committee temporarily rose; and

The SPEAKER laid before the House a variety of executive communications from the War Department, &c., in relation to Indian hostilities; which were ordered to be printed.

The House then again went into committee, and Mr. GLASCOCK concluded his remarks.

The amendment of Mr. EVERETT was then rejected. Yeas 28, nays 98.

The amendment proposed by the Committee on Indian Affairs was then agreed to; and the Senate's amendment, as amended, was concurred in without a division.

The tenth amendment of the Senate, as follows, was then concurred in:

"SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to invest, in a manner which shall be, in his judgment, most safe and beneficial for the fund, the sum of thirty-three thousand nine hundred and twelve dollars and forty cents, being money in the Treasury as the proceeds of lands purchased from the Seneca Indians, of Sandusky, by a treaty concluded on the twenty-eighth of February, eighteen hundred and thirty-one; from the Senecas and Shawanees by a treaty concluded on the twentieth of July, eighteen hundred and thirty-one; and from the Shawanees by a treaty concluded on the eighth of August, eighteen hundred and thirty-one; and upon which sum the United States are, by stipulations in the said treaties, bound to pay to the said Indians an annual interest at the rate of five per centum per annum: Provided, That the said Secretary shall make no investment of the said sum, or any portion of it, at a lower rate of interest than five per centum per annum."

The following, being the eleventh amendment of the Senate, was then read:

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That it shall be competent for the President to assign to the Indian agent at Michilimackinac, in addition to his proper duties, the duties of superintendent of Indian affairs for all that district of country heretofore constituting the Territory of Michigan, and lying east of the line established as the eastern boundary of the Territory of Wisconsin, by the act of Congress of the twentieth of April, eighteen hundred and thirty-six: Provided, however, That no additional compensation or emolument shall be granted on account of the said duties; and the President may require the said agent to reside at such place as he may think fit within the said district."

This amendment was also concurred in without a division.

Mr. LOVE proposed an amendment appropriating $650 for the expenses of the Seneca delegation to Washington. Agreed to.

Mr. SEVIER submitted an amendment authorizing the appointment of a superintendent of Indian affairs south of the Missouri river, with the same salary as the similar officer at St. Louis; which, after some remarks from Mr. S. and Mr. ASHLEY, was rejected.

Mr. SEVIER submitted another amendment, to provide for the compensation to certain Indian agents of the Creeks, Cherokees, Choctaws, Quapaws, &c.

Mr. CAMBRELENG suggested to the gentleman that he had better submit these amendments when the Cherokee bill came up.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee then rose, and the bill and amendments were reported to the House.

Several amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were then severally concurred in.

On the ninth amendment, (discussed at length in Committee of the Whole.)

Mr. VINTON asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and Mr. V. also called for a division of the question: first on that branch of the amendment containing the appropriation for the removal and subsistence of the Creek Indians; and, secondly, on that relating to the Seminoles.

After some remarks from Mr. ASHLEY, in opposition to the amendment, the question was taken, and it was concurred in: Yeas 106, nays 50; and the amendment of the Senate, as amended, was also concurred in.

The question was then taken on the second branch of the amendment, and concurred in without a count; and the amendment, as amended, was also concurred in.

The other amendments were then severally concurred in by the House.

R. P. LETCHER AND T. P. MOORE.

On motion of Mr. MASON, of Virginia, the House again went into Committee of the Whole on the bill "for the relief of Robert P. Letcher and Thomas P. Moore."

[The principles involved in this bill are generally known. These two gentlemen both claimed to have been returned to Congress from the fifth congressional district of Kentucky, and both presented themselves at the bar at the first session of the last Congress. The House came to a resolution that neither gentleman should then take the seat, until the Committee of Elections had investigated the merits of the case; and they accordingly both returned home to collect testimony, &c. The committee made a report that Thomas P. Moore had a majority of the votes, and was therefore entitled to the seat; but the House, after a lengthy discussion, decided that it could come to no conclusion, and finally sent it back to the people. The foregoing bill appropriated the usual pay and mileage to each of the gentlemen.]

The bill having been read,

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved to strike out that part relating to the pay of Thomas P. Moore. He did so on the same ground he had voted against the payment to Mr. Newland, viz: that no more than one being entitled to the seat, no more than one was entitled to the pay.

Mr. R. M. JOHNSON remarked that this bill was defeated at the last session of Congress, on the very ground that it provided for the payment of only one of the gentlemen; and he therefore hoped his colleague would withdraw his proposition.

Mr. BOND opposed the whole bill, on the ground that Congress having arrived at the conclusion that neither of the gentlemen was entitled to the seat, therefore neither of them ought to be paid. He addressed the committee at some length on the subject. He adverted to the fact that one of the individuals had presented to the House a release or protest from any claim, and he saw no reason why it should be forced upon him.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, adverted to the extraordinary circumstances of the contested election for Kentucky. He believed it was the first which had occurred in which neither of the contesting members had a complete return, and neither was permitted to take a seat until the House could decide on the right to the contested seat.

With regard to the protest of one of the gentlemen, [Mr. Moore,] Mr. M. remarked that it ought not to affect any rights which he [Mr. Moore] might possess. It was written in a spirit of generosity, and with the hope expressed, that a desire to allow him pay might not affect or prejudice the claim of his opponent.

The circumstances of the case were in themselves of a novel character. It was determined by the House that neither of the gentlemen should take the seat, but that they should both await the report of the Committee of Elections, and the decision of the House thereon; and they consequently did remain in attendance until the month of June, when the House decided against the claims of both, and returned the election to the people.

Mr. BRIGGS sent to the Clerk's table a letter from Mr. Moore, addressed to the Speaker of the House, on the subject; which was read.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, made a brief explanation in relation to the contents of the letter. He said he himself had originally introduced the resolution directing the standing committee to inquire into the expediency of paying Mr. Letcher. The name of Mr. Moore was not included in his resolution, but moved by another gentleman; and, so amended, the House adopted it. He would only add that he never had a word of conversation with Mr. Moore in his life on the subject of his compensation. His motion had reference only to Mr. Letcher, with whom, though a political opponent, he was on terms of friendly personal intercourse. At the instance of another gentleman, the name of Mr. Moore was introduced; the committee made the inquiry, and this bill was the result of their investigation.

Pay and Mileage.

Mr. MANN, of New York, would only remark that it was upon his motion the name of Mr. Moore was introduced in the resolution, and it was due to that gentleman to state that he (Mr. MANN) did it entirely of his own suggestion. From the moment he had known Mr. Moore to the present hour, he had never exchanged a word with him on the subject of his pay.

Mr. BOULDIN said he would detain the committee but for a moment. He would not trouble them at all upon this subject, but for the fact that several had mentioned the subject of private friendship; and it had been charged that those who voted for this bill were probably influenced by that feeling. Mr. B. rose to deny that the vote he should give would be at all influenced by any feeling of that kind. He had no ground of friendship or aversion towards Letcher or Moore. In relation to that canvass, he would say that neither of them had done himself any great credit in going to such lengths in prosecuting the contest. Neither did he think that this House (of which he was then, as well as now, a member) had done itself any very great credit in having suffered or encouraged the candidates to protract the contest to such a length, and carry it on with such violence. Party spirit was probably the cause, and must be plead as the excuse of us all, in thus having continued a contest that ought to have been settled, as all such things should ever be, immediately on the meeting of Congress. We had, however, kept the district as well as the candidates waiting in suspense, and the candidates on expense for months, and finally told them and the world that such were the doubt and difficulty in determining which was elected, that we could not, with any certainty, decide which was the rightful representative, and, therefore, would send them both back to the people.

Mr. B. said he viewed the subject in a light somewhat different from that in which some gentlemen saw it. He did not look upon it as a contest between the candidates only, or even principally, but as a suit prosecuted by the people before Congress, claiming a representation in this House, and calling on Congress to determine which of two persons was elected by the district. This claim was for the people's benefit, and the costs ought to be paid out of the people's money. Without the people are permitted to pay their costs out of their own money, it would only be necessary for a rich candidate to contest an election, and put it out of the power of a poor one, however talented and patriotic, to carry on the contest, and the people, not only of the district, but of the whole United States, be thus choused out of a representative in Congress to whom they were lawfully and constitutionally entitled. Should an unnecessary contest be raised by a candidate to obtain the pay, he ought to be made to lose it. But when it was so doubtful that the House of Representatives could not determine it, it was mocking the candidates, the district, and the nation, to tell them that it was so plain that the candidates and the district ought to have known which was elected, and made no dispute about it.

Mr. B. said he was one of that majority that could not satisfy themselves which was elected. He could not then tell them the thing was plain that they must pay their own expenses here. He thought the point a doubtful one, and that the right to have a member from every district was a right dear to the whole nation. He would, therefore, pay both or neither. He did not wish to disparage or wound the feelings of either of the candidates, or to say by his vote that the district had caused or encouraged an unnecessary contest.

Mr. WISE said there was only one way in which he would vote a dollar to these parties, viz: that the per diem pay of $8 and the allowance of mileage for one member of Congress be divided in equal proportions between them. He was here at the time, knew the whole history of the case, and he believed it was his single vote that sent it back to the people. He decided conscientiously upon that occasion; for he was incompetent to say, from the evidence, which was entitled to the seat. If either, then, received compensation, they ought both to receive it; and he was willing to vote them both the allowance of one member; but he protested against the principle of paying men eight dollars a day for coming here to contest a seat in Congress. If a gentleman came there with a certificate of his election, and took his seat, him he would pay. They were not authorized to pay more than 240 members; but adopt this principle, and they would be paying 241. The principle was wrong. So soon as the pending amendment was disposed of, he should submit one embracing his views.

The amendment of Mr. UNDERWOOD was disagreed to.

Mr. RENCHER proposed an amendment deducting from the amount of pay to each party $8 a day for the time they were absent from Washington, in completing their testimony. Lost.

Mr. WISE then moved to reduce the sum to one half, to be divided equally between Messrs. Moore and Letcher, viz: $4 per diem allowance, and half the customary mileage to each. Lost.

The committee then rose, and reported the bill to the House.

The SPEAKER having resumed the chair, and pronounced the question on concurring with the report of the Committee of the Whole,

Mr. GRIFFIN asked for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill; which were not ordered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD renewed his amendment.

Mr. HOWELL moved that the House adjourn. Lost.

Mr. UNDERWOOD asked for the yeas and nays on his amendment; but the House refused to order them, and the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. WISE then renewed his amendment, and asked for the yeas and nays thereon; which were ordered.

Mr. SPEIGHT moved the previous question.

Mr. WISE moved an adjournment. Lost: Ayes 33, noes not counted.

Mr. WISE appealed to the gentleman from North Carolina to withdraw his motion for the previous question, and let the country know who voted the money out of their Treasury.

Mr. SPEIGHT not assenting, the motion for the previous question was then taken, and the tellers reporting ayes 71, noes 44—no quorum—

Mr. WISE moved an adjournment. Lost.

The motion for the previous question was then seconded by the House: Ayes 76, noes 47.

Mr. RENCHER asked for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question to be put; but the House refused, and the question was ordered without a count.

Mr. WISE asked for the yeas and nays on the main question, being on the engrossment of the bill; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 86, nays 45.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House then adjourned.

TUESDAY, JUNE 7.

PAY AND MILEAGE.

Mr. RENCHER, from the select committee on mileage, reported a bill to establish a more uniform rule of computing the mileage and per diem compensation of members of Congress.

Mr. RENCHER moved the engrossment of the bill.

Mr. JENIFER moved that it be laid on the table, and printed. Lost.

Mr. VINTON moved to amend the clause providing that the per diem compensation should not be allowed

Land Bill.

for those days on which members were absent from the House, by excepting those cases in which members are absent on leave of the House.

On motion of Mr. MANN, of New York, the bill and amendment were postponed to Saturday next, and ordered to be printed.

LAND BILL.

The House then took up the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands of the United States, and for granting lands to certain States."

The following motions were pending: 1. By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, to commit to Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. 2. Mr. CARR, to the Committee on the Public Lands. 3. Mr. GILLET, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The question was then taken on referring the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and decided as follows: Yeas 97, nays 96.

The CHAIR, under the 9th rule of the House, being entitled to vote when his vote given to the minority would make it equal, voted in the negative, making yeas 97, nays 97; so the motion to refer the bill to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was decided in the negative.

The question then recurred on the motion of reference to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. MERCER made a few remarks on the subject.

Mr. LANE said he trusted the House would reject the proposition to submit this bill to the Committee on the Public Lands, in order that it may be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. This is the appropriate committee. The bill proposes an appropriation of some thirty millions, and it is the province of that committee to examine, to guard, and supervise that revenue.

It has been said that the chairman of that committee is hostile to the provisions of this bill, and therefore it ought not to be submitted to his charge; that the object of those who vote in favor of the reference to this committee is to give it the go-by, to avoid the responsibility of a direct vote, with a full knowledge that the bill will be detained in the pocket of the chairman of the committee until the close of the session.

Sir, so far as it regarded himself, said Mr. L., it had no application; he was ready and willing to meet, by a direct vote, at any and at all times, this or any other measure that he might be called upon to vote; that his object was to refer it to the appropriate committee, that it may be reported back to the House with the opinion of that able committee, acted upon, and finally disposed of. Then, sir, we shall be able to make some final, some satisfactory disposition of the surplus.

At present, he should not attempt to discuss the merits of the bill, and would not point out the good or bad provisions of it. But, sir, why talk of this bill? why sacrifice the time of the House? why hold out false hopes to the people? Is it to deceive, to delude them? For, sir, who does not know, who in this House that does not believe, that this bill cannot, will not, become a law.

Mr. L. said, when it should be in order to discuss the merits of this bill, he would claim the indulgence of the House while he should be able, according to the extent of his feeble abilities, to give his views upon the bill and its effects upon the new States.

Mr. VINTON said that he rose to say a word on the subject of the commitment of this bill, before the vote was taken, that the House and the country might know what would be the effect of referring it to the Committee of Ways and Means, or to the Committee on the Public Lands. The gentleman from New York, who made the motion to commit it to the Committee of Ways and Means, stated his motives in making it. He says he wishes the bill to go to that committee, so that it may make a report upon it, after all the appropriation bills, and all other bills proposing appropriations of money, shall have been acted upon. It is his avowed object that the chairman of that committee shall keep the bill in his pocket till all of these bills are acted upon. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is not a gentleman in this House, who has had any experience here, that does not know that if the committee pursue the course pointed out by the mover of the reference, and wait till the appropriations of the year are made, the bill will not be reported back to the House till the very last hour of the session; and that, of necessity, will be the end of the bill. I am justified, by the arguments in favor of committing it to the Committee of Ways and Means, in saying that such will be the course of that committee; and he wanted the country to know it, that the people may understand how the bill was killed, and who is responsible for it.

[Here Mr. CAMBRELENG, the chairman of the committee, said he would not hold up the bill.]

Mr. VINTON said he was warranted by the avowed intentions of the mover of the reference to that committee, and by the arguments of those who have advocated that reference, in saying such was the course they intended should be pursued by the committee. And as the House, by the vote it has just given, refusing to commit to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, acted under those arguments and on that avowal, he was justified in presuming such was the intention of those who voted against a reference to the Whole House on the state of the Union, since the declaration now made by the chairman was not then before the House; and it was to the intentions of the House, and not of that gentleman, we were to look. He asserted again, that the object of those who were for committing to the Ways and Means was to prevent the bill from being acted upon till the end of the session, so that with the session it might die a natural death. He did not complain of this. He knew that it was parliamentary for those who were opposed to the bill, and wanted to avoid the high responsibility of voting on its merits, to resort to this way of killing it by a side blow. Gentlemen had a right to do this, but he wanted the people to know how they did it. And it was that they might know how it was done, and with what motive, and whom to hold responsible, he had now risen to address to the House a few words, and for that purpose alone.

As to a reference to the Committee on Public Lands, he had only to say, that committee had already expressed their hostility to the principle of this bill. We know they are opposed to it. Whether they would ever report the bill back to the House or not, was a conjecture he would not make. From what we knew of that committee, he had only to say that to send the bill to that committee was the same thing as to give the keeping of the lamb to the wolf. Gentlemen would judge for themselves what would be the fate of the lamb. The bill was a measure of the deepest interest to the people of this country. For that reason he wanted a vote directly on its merits; and if gentlemen resorted to this method of avoiding its merits, and killed it in this indirect way, he hoped the people would understand it, and who it was that did it.

Mr. DENNY moved instructions to either committee to which the bill should be referred, to report the same on Wednesday next.

Mr. BOULDIN then addressed the House in favor of referring the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, and in opposition to the principles of the bill, until the hour of one o'clock, when the Chair announced the special order.

Fortification Bill.

[H. OF R.]

FORTIFICATION BILL.

In further execution of the special order of the 26th of January, the House, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELL-ENG, proceeded to the consideration of the "bill making appropriations for certain fortifications for the year 1836." The bill was reported from the Committee of the Whole, with sundry amendments, and the question was on concurring in these amendments. The first amendment was the following:

"For fortifications, Charleston harbor, South Carolina, and preservation of the site of Fort Moultrie, $150,000," increased by the Committee of the Whole to "$200,000."

Mr. WADDY THOMPSON expressed his disapprobation of the manner of doing business in the House, by crowding in amendments for extravagant expenditures, and hurrying them through without time or opportunity for discussion and consideration. He was opposed to the bill, because he believed that one half of the appropriations were not only not necessary, but that they could not be expended within the year; and he thought the bill was designed to effect another purpose not disclosed in it. He alluded to a report which stated that, last year, $150,000 could not be expended in New York, because, although every effort was made in New England and elsewhere, sufficient laborers could not be found; and he inferred that the bill would have little effect but to keep the public money in the hands of the deposit banks.

Mr. T. then went on to reply to some remarks of Mr. ADAMS, made some days since, in relation to the annexation of Texas to this Union; and he thought England would not interfere, as that gentleman had supposed, because that nation was preparing for a conflict with Russia, and would have enough else to do. He then went on to reply to some portions of the speech of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. TOWNS,] about a month since.

Mr. HUNT addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker, to this bill, as originally reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, I had no objection to urge, and I had intended giving it my support in a silent vote. But, sir, after the scenes we were compelled to witness when this bill was last in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (May 24, 1836,) I feel it to be my duty to oppose the amendments foisted into the bill on that memorable night, and to assign some of the reasons which have led me to that opposition. In doing so, I cannot flatter myself that I shall be able to give any freshness or variety to the debate, but may hope to aid in calling the attention of a portion of the country to the present condition of the public treasure, and to the mad schemes projected and projecting for its exhaustion. Following the example of those who have preceded me in this debate, allow me, in the outset of my remarks, to submit briefly my views on the subject of national defence, as connected with fortifications, the army, and navy. National defence has been rung in our ears, through all its variations, as though there were here or elsewhere any one, with an American heart beating in his bosom, opposed to the defence of his country—as though any one, at this day, doubted the policy of preparing for war in times of peace. But, sir, how prepare? By studding a coast of three thousand miles (as proposed in another part of this bill) with fortifications so near each other that the report from the guns of the first may be taken up by the others and transmitted through the whole line. This plan may be called magnificent in conception, but is alike opposed to the resources, the wants, the genius, and the liberties of the people.

I am, sir, in favor of fortifications at the great and prominent points of our seaboard, as furnishing safe depositories for the materials and munitions of war, and as tending to afford to your harbors and commercial cities security against the attacks of a single ship from an enemy's squadron. But, sir, forts never have, in this or any other country, nor will they, prevent the descent of an invading army. In case of threatened invasion from a competent force, you are to look for safety, not to walls of stone and mortar, but to that wall of fire which the patriotism of freemen will erect around your borders.

Then, sir, as to your army. I have ever been the advocate of such a peace establishment as should enable you to protect your frontiers against the savage, and should furnish the nucleus of a disciplined army in case of foreign invasion. As to the navy, I have been taught from my childhood to look upon it with favor, and to consider it the right arm of the national defence. The children of ocean's queen, our origin, habits, and natural position, all point to the sea, and demonstrate that, in our path to prosperity and greatness, our "march must be o'er the mountain wave, our home upon the deep." But, in reference to these great subjects, it is a matter of curiosity, if not interest, to look back upon the history of their friends and opponents. When did they commend themselves to the favorable consideration of those who now modestly claim to have been infallible in political sagacity, to have never changed, to have been consistent, nay, to be at this moment the only true democrats of the land, and to have been the exclusive keepers of all the democracy, pure and unadulterated as when delivered to them by their great high priest? Why, sir, gentlemen are within the sound of my voice, who were actors upon the stage when these same consistent politicians denounced fortifications as the strongholds of tyranny, an army as dangerous to the liberties of the country, and a navy as useless. Yes, sir, it is well known that General Washington, having laid the foundations of this Government deep and broad, considered a respectable land and naval force essential to its well-being and prosperity. He and Hamilton were denounced as the advocates of an arbitrary and strong Government by the very men who are now pushing, to their extremest verge, doctrines never contended for even by the much-abused successor of General Washington. Well, sir, amidst the throes and heavings of Europe at this time, a great political change was in progress in our country; and in order to render that change more certain, it became necessary to make a broad distinction between those seeking for power and those who then held it. This necessity, unless I would impeach the common sense of their authors, can alone account for the wild and visionary theories of government then put forward—theories which had their day, and, having answered their purpose, have been discarded. To this may be traced the statesmanlike project of defending a great and commercial people by gun-boats, embargoes, and proclamations; and to the same spirit are we indebted for an army totally inadequate to man your Indian block-houses, to meet the first wants of your frontiers, and to check the rising of two petty tribes of Indians.

I make not these remarks in any spirit of unkindness towards distinguished individuals now no more; nor do I wish to revive the party excitement of by-gone days; but that gentlemen may understand that the history of those days, which is the history of the friends and opponents of the great measures of national defence, has not been lost nor forgotten.

Sir, your navy has literally fought its way to the notice of the dominant party. Having borne its full share of the hardships of the Revolution; having, in mere infancy, carried your country's flag in triumph to the shores of Europe, and humbled the pride of the freebooters of the Barbary coast; having covered itself with glory in the affairs of the Guerriere, and laid at your feet the bloody trophies of its lake victories; you could no longer close your eyes in indifference to this hitherto neglected arm of protection. Entertaining, then, the sentiments which I have expressed, let me not be charged with hostility to any of the defences of my country. But, sir, what have we now proposed to us, under the specious title of "making appropriations for certain fortifications of the United States, for the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six?" A bill, as originally reported, (and founded, we are to presume, upon the estimates of the proper Department,) asking for these objects the sum of $1,875,592 95; and this bill increased in Committee of the Whole to the enormous sum of $3,667,645 95. An increase sprung up at midnight upon a House exhausted in body and mind by a protracted session of fourteen hours, without any previous warning, and without the knowledge of, at least, a portion of the very Committee of Ways and Means. In vain we asked for estimates, for reasons for this strange procedure—none were to be furnished, on compulsion, to a "factious minority." In vain we urged the impossibility of expending so large an amount during the short recess of Congress, and the danger to the country of increasing improperly and unnecessarily the price of labor. We were met by a dead vote. From such a course of proceeding, such indiscreet haste, what can we infer, other than a foregone conclusion on the part of a majority, confident in its strength, to deplete the Treasury of the people, without regard to the wants of the Government or the objects of expenditure? When, before, in the history of this Government, have committees dared to tease the heads of bureaux, to know whether it were not possible to expend a given amount of the people's money? Sir, I pronounce the proposed expenditure, in itself, improvident, and uncalled for by the wants of the country; and yet the proposition comes to us from the friends of an administration that was to curtail extravagant expenditures, reform abuses, prevent the power of the General Government from coming in conflict with the freedom of elections and of opinions, and to bring it back, in all its branches, to its original simplicity.

How far the freedom of opinion has been regarded, let the list of removals from office for opinion's sake attest—a list exceeding in seven years the aggregate of all removals (for cause or otherwise) during all previous administrations. And then as to retrenchment. A distinguished Senator from Virginia, in 1827, in his place, pointed to the alarming increase in the ordinary expenditures of the Government since the days of Mr. Jefferson. The expenditures in 1827, by an administration denounced for its extravagance, was thirteen millions of dollars; in 1828 it was about thirteen and a half millions, and the estimated expenditure for 1829 was about fourteen millions. I speak, of course, irrespective of payments towards the public debt during these periods, and I stop not to fatigue the House with the precise amounts, nor to extend the examination through a long series of years. General results will illustrate every argument, and I have taken for the starting point the time immediately preceding the commencement of the present administration.

Not to take up the language of the Virginia Senator before alluded to, and pronounce an ordinary expenditure of thirteen millions as extravagant and boding evil, and making every liberal allowance for the growth, and consequently increased wants of the country, we may certainly assume eighteen millions to be a liberal allowance for an administration professing so great a regard for strict economy; and yet we were told at the commencement of the present session, by the Executive, that about twenty-four millions of dollars would be required for the present year.

I might, sir, find ample justification for my opposition to the amendments under consideration, in this open and bold violation of every pledge of economy given to the people by those now in power, at a time when they were seeking it. But I have other grounds of opposition to these amendments. I am in favor of the bill now on your files, "to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands;" and the present exhausting project is designed, indirectly, to defeat the great objects of that bill. This is not the time to enter at large upon the argument of that subject. The time will, however, come, when the merits of that bill must be discussed, and no longer kept from public view by the legerdemain of legislation. The people are making up an issue on that subject, and every effort of mine shall be made to hasten the trial of that issue. Without, however, going at large into the argument, I may be allowed, I trust, (because most pertinent to my purpose,) to glance, in passing, at some of the reasons inducing me to favor a distribution.

First, then, I hold it to be the only course left, in the present condition of the country, in which you can fully and fairly answer the terms and objects of the deeds of cession. I will detain the House by referring to the terms of but one of those deeds—the one from Virginia, made and accepted on the 1st of March, 1784. The terms of one of the conditions of that cession are as follows: "That all the lands within the territory, as ceded to the United States, and not reserved for, or appropriated to, any of the before-mentioned purposes, or disposed of in bounties to the officers and soldiers of the American army, shall be considered as a common fund, for the use and benefit of such of the United States as have become, or shall become, members of the confederation, or federal alliance of the said States, Virginia inclusive, according to their usual respective proportions in the general charge and expenditure, and shall be faithfully and bona fide disposed of for that purpose, and for no other use or purpose whatsoever." This language is, for all substantial purposes, the same with that used by the other States in their cessions of the public domain. And the national debt contracted, and being contracted, at the time of the cession, having been paid off, the question arises: How are the terms of this high trust, in its further fulfilment, to be executed? By graduating, then treating as refuse, and afterwards ceding, the public lands to the respective States within whose limits they may be situated? By what perversion of language can Virginia be said to "be included" in a gift of all your lands to Missouri? Were this a case of a private trust, I submit to the House, with great confidence, that no legal tribunal would hesitate to enforce its performance in the manner proposed in the bill to which I have alluded. The objections to a distribution of the surplus revenue, whether arising from customs or the sales of the public lands, contained in the celebrated veto message of the 4th of December, 1835, were not felt as early as 1829. In the annual message of the 8th of December, 1829, the President says: "To avoid these evils, it appears to me that the most safe, just, and federal disposition which could be made of the surplus revenue, would be its apportionment among the several States, according to their ratio of representation." The same high officer again, in language equally explicit, recommended the measure of distribution in the message of the 7th of December, 1830. Distinguished statesmen, in the several States, had for years before been looking to a state of things when the General Government might, without embarrassment, apportion at least the proceeds of the sales of the public lands; and the repeated recommendation of the President left little doubt of the fulfilment of their hopes. The recommendation was hailed as in accordance with an enlightened public sentiment, and as giving an earnest of the well-considered opinions, and settled convictions, of the Executive and his cabinet. In view of this, I cannot feel the force of the argument heretofore urged upon this floor, "that it would be useless for Congress to legislate on this subject, and pass the land bill, inasmuch as it could never receive the sanction of the Executive, and become a law." Considering our fallibility, and the changes of opinion going on in the world, as well as the various opinions expressed by the Executive in reference to another important subject, (the United States Bank,) I should rather infer that the opposition expressed in the message of 1833 might, nay, had yielded to a more thorough examination of the subject. Be that, however, as it may, we cannot take counsel from considerations of that kind; our path of duty is plain, and must be trodden, regardless of consequences. Sir, of this public domain, there are yet unsold seven hundred millions of acres of land, situate without the States; and, probably, about three hundred millions of acres situate within the States. I make this statement from an inspection of your documents, and the best information I have been able to obtain; (and I have taken some pains to examine the matter;) it may not be precisely accurate, but I am satisfied it is sufficiently so for all the purposes of this argument. Basing my calculations upon the present condition of your Treasury, the probable receipts for the remainder of the year, and the reasonable demands of your Government, I aver that the proposed appropriation would give to the State of New York $3,309,503, and to each congressional district the sum of $84,074 annually. What a fund to relieve the States from taxation, enable them to prosecute their magnificent schemes for internal improvements, for educating the poor, and for developing their resources, and ameliorating the condition of society! Distribute this fund, and you may then with truth say "you have restored to the States their lost rights."

But, sir, the proposition to graduate and then cede the public lands to the States is not only a violation (if carried out) of the terms and objects of the cession, but unjust in reference to the old States. To say nothing of the thirteen old States, will Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois—States but yesterday new, to-day comparatively old—consent to part with their share of the inheritance acquired by the blood and transmitted to them by the providence of their fathers?

The policy of your Government has ever been to place the lands at a price to enable actual settlers to purchase, to induce them to settle upon their purchases, and fell your forests. The General Government has been and is abundantly able to carry out its policy. Can any one venture to say as much for the State Governments? Are they as competent to resist the pressing calls upon their treasuries, backed by the cupidity of speculators, and tending either to retard the settlement of the country or to force the settler to pay an enhanced and exorbitant price for his land?

Again, sir, I am in favor of a distribution of your surplus revenue at present, because, secondly, I am most anxious to reduce the large amount of moneys now held by banks without law or regulation. The amendments to the bill under discussion will not effect that object, but leave the extravagant sums called for where they now are, to be reported hereafter as unexpended balances of appropriation. In approaching the subject of the deposit banks, I feel an embarrassment, arising in part from the consideration that every effort to induce gentlemen to look to the safety of our Treasury is denounced as an effort of party, for party purposes, and therefore to be disregarded; and in part, again, from the extreme delicacy of the subject. But whilst, on the one hand, I would not rashly tamper with your monetary system, nor excite unnecessary alarm, no mawkish sensibility shall, on the other, deter me from proclaiming to the people the truth on this subject; and disclaiming, for one, any mere party views, I call upon those having the control of public affairs to reflect upon the fearful responsibility they incur to their country, in case this treasure, or any portion of it, be ultimately lost. When the Bank of the United States was the depository of the public moneys, the Executive felt it to be his duty, more than once, to call the attention of Congress to the safety of the deposits. This he did in his message of the 4th December, 1832, and again in the subsequent message of the 3d December, 1833. And so sensible, at that day, was the National Legislature of the importance of correct information, that a committee was raised to examine the subject, and report the result of such examination. That committee instituted and went through with a most minute and laborious examination, which induced this House solemnly to declare to the nation, by resolution, that the public moneys were safe in their then place of deposit. Now, in 1832, when the attention of Congress was called to this subject by the Executive, the Bank of the United States had, on deposit, of public moneys, $6,957,621 54, and it had of specie in its vaults, $8,026,055 45, more than dollar for dollar to meet the demands of the Government. Compare, sir, this statement with the present condition of the people's money. You have thirty-six deposit banks, and an official paper from the Secretary of the Treasury of the 18th April, 1836, shows the immediate liabilities of these banks to be $93,000,069 96. Their immediate means to meet those liabilities to be $38,082,699 93. Again, sir, in another official paper, showing the situation of those bank son (or nearest to) the 1st May, 1836, we are told they hold of our money $38,496,755 09, and that they have of specie $10,202,245 80½. In view of these things, can the faithful sentinel proclaim "all is well?"

But this is not all. Suppose one of the receivers at your land offices to refuse to take from purchasers the notes of specie-paying banks, but, by way of particular favor and accommodation, cash the notes at 5 per cent. discount, and thus realize a small fortune. If reports be true, this is not a mere case of supposition. I put it, however, only as a supposable case, and even in that point of view it is worthy of our attention and examination. I do not propose now to discuss the vexed question, whether State banks are competent to answer the great end of their selection, to regulate the currency of the country, prevent derangement, and facilitate to the mercantile world domestic exchanges. They have been selected, (whether for good or for evil time only can fully determine,) and I am only desirous of so regulating them that the country may sustain no loss.

It was urged with great force and effect against the Bank of the United States, that it paid no interest upon the deposits of public money, although that bank had paid for its charter one million and a half of dollars. The deposit banks pay no interest—they have of course paid nothing by way of bonus, and are not subject to federal legislation. We were told of the impropriety of a course of legislation tending to make "the rich richer, and the poor poorer," and of the danger to our institutions in permitting foreigners to hold our stocks. Yet the Manhattan Bank of the city of New York is a deposit bank—it has a capital of two millions and fifty thousand dollars—six hundred thousand dollars of which capital I believe to be owned by the family of the Marquis of Carmarthen. This bank, by the returns nearest to the 1st of March, 1836, held to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States $3,000,552 37, and to the credit of public officers the sum of $272,943 53.

I do not make these remarks now by way of censure upon the dominant party. The change in your deposits was well characterized as "an experiment," and the present system is operating, under a new order of things, with no national debt, and a Treasury full to plethora. They are made with the single view of inducing gentlemen, having the power, to come up to the work of examination—to disregard all influence arising from the cry "that the opposition are willing to reunite with them in pressing a full and fair investigation of subjects connected with the safe keeping of the national treasure, and its proper use and application." The necessity for immediate legislation is by no means lessened by a reference to the alarming increase of State banks and paper circulation within the last six years. In 1830, the whole number of banks may be set down at three hundred; in January, 1835, at seven hundred and fifty, with a circulation double what it was in 1830. I have not the means of stating the precise amount of circulation at the present time, but believe myself within bounds, putting it at one hundred millions. One of your Territories, (Florida,) with a population at present, and probably destined always to be, sparse, has, within the current year, proposed an increase of banking capital to the amount of twelve millions, with life and trust companies without limits. My own State (New York) has, during the past winter, increased her banking capital $5,670,000. What is to check this mad career in State legislation, and give to the country a metallic basis sufficient to support a superstructure already unwieldy, disjointed, and disproportioned? In looking at recent occurrences in another part of this hall, (upon "a bill to regulate the deposits of the public money,") I entertain the hope that something may yet be done, ere the close of the present session, to place your Treasury under the protection of law, and in the hands of responsible agents. It is due to all the best interests of the country, nay, to the banks themselves, that we should not separate without regulating, by law, the deposits of the public money. There is at present an uncertainty hanging over the subject, which must embarrass and cripple the banks, (if they have any reference to their own safety,) in attempts to meet the wants of the business classes, and relieve the pressure of the money market. They know not when they may be called upon to give up their deposits; they feel that the Secretary of the Treasury has it in his power to close their doors at any moment; and one consequence of this uncertainty is, that the large amount now in deposit is virtually withdrawn from circulation.

I trust I am not mistaken in anticipating action upon this subject from those having the control of majorities. If so, we shall hear no more of an exhausted Treasury; of the want of surplus revenue; of fears that the States are to be bribed with their own money. It possibly may then be admitted that there is quite as much danger in leaving forty millions of money under the control of a man restrained by no law, if by any moral obligation, as in distributing it amongst the several States according to their ratio of representation.

Entertaining these views, and believing you will have in the Treasury, at the end of the year, between sixty and seventy millions of dollars; that you cannot expend over about thirty millions, including seven millions for Indian treaties, and including also the Indian wars now raging upon your borders, with the large appropriations already made for the navy and army, I shall oppose the extraordinary amendments proposed to the bill upon your table—believing that, in so doing, I grant to the country all that can be expended upon desirable objects, and that I shall contribute my mite in securing a fund now in jeopardy, and in restoring it to the people, from whom it was derived, for purposes entirely beneficent—that this is my high and imperative duty as one of the guardians of the public treasure, and as an American desirous of perpetuating the republican institutions of this Government.

The debate was continued by Messrs. TOWNS, THOMPSON of South Carolina, CAMBRELENG, BRIGGS, and PINCKNEY.

Mr. STORER moved to amend the bill so as to reduce all the appropriations, except that for Fort McHenry, one half the amount specified in the bill; and argued at length against so large appropriations, and in favor of the reduction.

After some remarks from Mr. HOWARD, in reply, Mr. KINNARD called for the previous question; which was not sustained.

Mr. KINNARD said he desired to say a few words in explanation of his reason for having moved the previous question. It must be apparent that this bill has already consumed its equal share of the consideration of this House. He could not, for one, consent to postpone the other great questions about which the people of the country had more anxiety than about the appropriation of the enormous amount of money embraced in the amendments proposed to the bill. It was true, the previous question would have affected those amendments. But is the necessity to debate them for days and weeks so urgent as to justify the defeat of much, and perhaps nearly all, of the other measures which have been long demanded by the interests of the country, and particularly by the Western States, to whose affairs very little time had as yet been devoted? He would instance the case of the Cumberland road. It was well known that the work on that great thoroughfare had long been suspended, on account of the failure to pass the necessary appropriation. Considering the time when it was acted on in the Senate, and introduced in this House, Mr. K. thought it was entitled to an early consideration. When, some days since, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means proposed to make the present bill the special order of the day, Mr. K. felt it his duty to solicit the honorable chairman to include in his motion the Cumberland road bill. His wishes, and the measure referred to, seem to meet with no favor from that quarter.

It would be recollected that the appropriation originally proposed for that road in the other branch had been greatly reduced. On what ground, sir? The ostensible reason, although Mr. K. believed it untenable, was, that there would not be time to expend the money. While this delay is to be extended, is it fair to apply such an argument against the measure, in which the whole West is interested, while it falls powerless in the estimation of some gentlemen, when urged against the amendments now under consideration? Here you propose to add to the fortification bill an immense amount of the public money, exceeding by millions the original estimates. Are we satisfied that this amount will be required before the next session? Is your corps of engineers so numerous as to justify the expectation that this money can be judiciously applied to the construction of the works which they are to superintend during the present season, or within twelve or eighteen months? He apprehended that such an expectation is not generally entertained. Shall we, then, debate endlessly about appropriations which the public service does not now require, to the postponement and defeat of those which are absolutely necessary? This, he conceived, would not be extending fair treatment to the other interests of the country, and to the numerous persons who had claims against the Government outstanding and unpaid.

Mr. K. remembered full well what doctrine was held during the former Congress, in relation to appropriations of this character, by the republican party. Whenever it was then proposed to amend the fortification bill in this way, the House was reminded of the importance of the estimates; that it was prodigal and extravagant to exceed them; that new works ought not to be commenced until the old were repaired and completed; and that new and extraordinary objects of expenditure should not be sought out and ingrafted upon bills of this description. Mr. K. considered this good doctrine; he had adhered to it throughout. The prospect of a French war impending over the country had induced him and the party with which he had acted to depart from it, in order to meet that particular emergency. When we have not such reasons, shall we depart from the usages and principles which have heretofore governed the republican party? Is there no other demand upon the Treasury, upon the time and action of this House, besides these fortifications? If we dare do nothing else, if any portion of this House should dissent from the course of policy indicated by the amendments, and by the arguments of some gentlemen, and should be denounced for it, it would then appear to him that one of the important landmarks of the democratic party was about to be abandoned, and it might become a matter of doubt how the parties of the day are divided. He hoped always to have it in his power to act with those whose polar star had been economy in the public expenditures. To that original and fundamental principle of the republican faith he, for one, was determined to adhere. Mr. K. was for appropriating whatever was required for the public defence in the proper time and manner. But, while he remembered that he was the representative of a laboring, agricultural, tax-paying, and patriotic people, he would not vote to disparage their principles and his own, and would endeavor to avoid giving his approbation to any system of prodigality which might be proposed from any quarter.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. LANE, HARDIN, HAWES, BOON, PARKER, and BRIGGS.

Mr. BRIGGS asked for the yeas and nays on the amendment; which were ordered.

Mr. HARD moved an adjournment about 7 o'clock; lost: 73 to 83.

After some remarks by Mr. BELL, in opposition to the amendment,

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved that the bill be made the special order of the day for Friday next, from and after the hour of 11, A. M.; which was agreed to.

DISTRICT BANKS.

The bill from the Senate to extend the charters of certain banks of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was then taken up on its reference.

Mr. PINCKNEY moved to refer the same to the select committee on the District banks.

Mr. LANE moved its reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Pending these motions, after some remarks from Messrs. LANE, BOULDIN, and THOMAS,

The House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 8.

FRENCH WINES.

On motion of Mr. LAWRENCE, the following bill on the Speaker's table, entitled "A bill to repeal so much of the act of March 2, 1799, as respects the issuing of certificates on the importation of wines," was taken up and ordered to be engrossed; and, having been engrossed, was, after some conversation between Mr. LAWRENCE, Mr. HAMER, and Mr. McKIM, read the third time and passed.

REVENUE SERVICE.

On motion of Mr. SUTHERLAND, the bill to regulate the compensation of officers of the revenue cutters was taken up on its third reading; and after some conversation between Messrs. WILLIAMS of North Carolina, SUTHERLAND, BOND, WISE, LAWRENCE, and GIDEON LEE,

Mr. GILLET observed that the duties and compensation of the officers of the revenue cutters are prescribed in the act of March 2, 1799. When this law was passed, the coast and commerce of this country were far more limited than they are at present. All know our commerce was then small, and our seacoast extended only to Florida. Our commerce is now expanded to an astonishing extent, and our limits have been enlarged so as to include the extensive coast of Florida, Alabama, and Louisiana. All who are acquainted with the climate of this added coast, and the course of commercial operations in that quarter, must arrive at the conclusion that this service has been rendered more arduous and hazardous. It is also incontestably true, that the expense of living in that quarter is far greater than it is in any other part of the Union. In 1799 the compensation then given these officers would procure them nearly double the necessities and comforts of life that the same sum now gives them. Every thing has risen in price, as all must know. The causes he would not now examine. It could hardly be disputed that it cost more to support a family on the seacoast than it did in 1799. This had been conceded by acts of Congress. A portion of the revenue officers had, by a law in 1816, or about that period, their pay increased fifty per cent. Another portion, those whose compensation depended upon fees of office, had had their pay increased by the increase of business at their respective offices; so that, on the whole, the pay of nearly every officer, except those in the cutter service, has been increased. These officers, who are very limited in number, remain as they were when their pay and duties were first prescribed; and this, too, when their duties are rendered more arduous and dangerous. They now guard the coast from the Passamaquoddy to Texas, and are out all seasons of the year. They must be on duty at sea amid the storms of the North and the hurricanes of the South. They must visit all vessels approaching our coast, whether there is disease on board or not. They must watch the movements of those who have designs upon the revenue, and fly to the relief of the wrecked mariner. Such services ought to be so compensated as to command men of capacity and integrity. This bill did not compensate them beyond what was given to others in the service, whose duties are not so arduous as those in the revenue service. He hoped the bill would pass.

Mr. HARDIN, after a few remarks, called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill; which were ordered.

After some further remarks from Messrs. SPEIGHT and BOON,

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, remarked, that, believing the House to be almost unanimous on this subject, he moved the previous question; which was seconded by the House: Yeas 80, nays 40.

The main question was then ordered, and, being put, was decided, by yeas and nays, in the affirmative: Yeas 146, nays 52.

So the bill was passed.

MICHIGAN AND ARKANSAS.

In execution of the special order of Monday last, the House then proceeded to the consideration of the following bills:

"An act to settle and establish the northern boundary line of the State of Ohio."

"An act to establish the northern boundary of the State of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union, upon the conditions therein expressed."

H. of R.]

Michigan and Arkansas.

[JUNE 8, 1836.]

"An act for the admission of the State of Arkansas into the Union, and to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the same, and for other purposes."

The first bill having been read,

Mr. THOMAS, after a brief explanation of the provisions of the bill, which he maintained had become unnecessary, from their being embraced in the bill to establish the Territorial Government of Wisconsin, and the bill to provide for the admission of Michigan into the Union, moved to lay it on the table.

Mr. VINTON appealed to the gentleman to withdraw the motion, as he desired an opportunity of showing that the separate boundary bill was indispensable.

Mr. THOMAS said: Mr. Speaker, the bill before the House contains three sections. By the first it is proposed to establish the northern boundary line of the State of Ohio where that State contends it ought to be fixed. The second section is designed to confirm the northern boundary line of the State of Indiana, as surveyed and designated by a former act of Congress, in conformity with the provisions of the law providing for the admission of that State into the Union. The third section of this bill was intended to fix the northern boundary line of the State of Illinois, as designated in a survey made in pursuance to the provisions of the constitution of that State. It will be remembered by the House that we have passed an act at the present session, establishing a Territorial Government for Wisconsin. In that act the southern boundary of the Territory, and the northern boundary of Illinois, are fixed on the line which, by the third section of the bill before the House, is to be made the north boundary of that State.

It is manifest, then, that the third section of this bill is unnecessary; the same may be said of the other two sections. The objects designed to be accomplished by them will be attained, if the bill next on the Speaker's table becomes a law. By its provisions the northern boundary lines of Indiana and Ohio are established, as it is proposed to fix them by this bill. This surely supercedes the necessity for any action on the bill before us. It will be a work of supererogation to place on the statute book two laws, designed to accomplish, in part, the same purposes, in totidem verbis. Believing this, and foreseeing that we shall gain time by such a proceeding, I move to lay the bill now before us on the table.

Mr. VINTON said he could not consent to renew the motion, and he would therefore ask for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 103, nays 103. The Chair voting in the affirmative, the vote was yeas 104, nays 103.

The next bill, being the "act to establish the northern boundary of the State of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of Michigan into the Union," &c., being then announced from the Chair,

Mr. WISE moved to postpone the further consideration of this bill till Monday, in order to proceed with the Arkansas bill.

Mr. THOMAS said he would call the attention of the House to the position of the two bills on the Speaker's table, and endeavor to show that this postponement is entirely unnecessary. These bills are from the Senate. By the rules of this House, two, I may say three, questions will arise, to be decided before they can become a law, so far as this House is concerned. We must first order each of these bills to be read a third time; the next question then will be, when shall the bill be read a third time? and the last question to be decided will be, shall the bill pass? Why, then, should Southern men now make an effort to give precedence to the bill for the admission of Arkansas into the Union? If they manifest distrust, must we not expect that fears will be entertained by Northern members, that unreasonable opposition will be made to the admission of Michigan? Let us proceed harmoniously, until we find that our harmony must be interrupted. We shall lose nothing by so doing. If a majority of the House be in favor of reading a third time the Michigan bill, they will order it to be done. After that vote has been taken, we can refuse to read the bill a third time, go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, then consider the Arkansas bill, report it to the House, order it to be read a third time; and in this order proceed to read them each a third time, if a majority of the House be in favor of that proceeding.

Let it not be said that Southern men may be taken by surprise, if the proceeding here respectfully recommended be adopted. If the friends of Arkansas are sufficiently numerous to carry now the motion to postpone, they can arrest at any time the action of the House on the Michigan bill, until clear undubitable indications have been given that the Missouri compromise is not to be disregarded.

Mr. MASON, of Ohio, moved to lay the former bill on the table, and asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. MASON then withdrew the motion.

Mr. LEWIS asked for the yeas and nays on the motion to postpone the Michigan bill till Monday; which were ordered.

Mr. WISE advocated the motion to postpone the Michigan bill, and the debate was continued by Messrs. CUSHING, PATTON, SUTHERLAND, BOULDIN, LEWIS, SPEIGHT, WILLIAMS of Kentucky, SEVIER, MANN of New York, HARDIN, and VANDERPOEL. Mr. BOON moved the previous question, being on ordering the bill to a third reading.

Mr. VINTON raised the point of order, that the previous question could not be moved, inasmuch as it had not been read.

The House refused to second the motion for the previous question: Yeas 69, noes 108.

Mr. ADAMS said a few words on the subject, and stated that when the Arkansas bill came into the House, if no one else moved the subject of the restriction of slavery, he should.

Mr. WISE, after some remarks, modified his motion by moving to refer both bills to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with instructions to that committee to incorporate the two bills into one bill.

Mr. PATTON opposed the latter motion, and gave his reasons at length against it. If his colleague would so modify his motion as to refer both bills to the Committee of the Whole, omitting the instructions to incorporate them into the same bill, he would vote for it.

Mr. BOULDIN said he agreed with his colleague [Mr. PATTON] in a fact too plain for any to overlook, that both bills must be acted on separately, and that one must have the preference in point of time. Michigan had it at that time—he was willing it should hold it. His colleague [Mr. PATTON] seemed to think that in the incipient steps in relation to this bill, it would be well enough to suffer Michigan to hold her present position; but that, before the final passage of the bill, it would be well to require of the House (or rather of the non-slaveholding portion of the Union) to give some unequivocal guarantee to the South that no difficulty would be raised as to the reception of Arkansas in regard to negro slavery.

Mr. B. was willing to go on with the bill for the admission of Michigan. He had the most implicit confidence in the House, particularly alluding to the non-slaveholding part of the Union, that no serious difficulty would be made as to the admission of Arkansas in regard to negro slavery.

If there were any serious difficulties to be raised in the House to the admission of Arkansas, upon the ground of negro slavery, he wished immediate notice of it. If his confidence was misplaced, he wished to be corrected as soon and as certainly as possible. If there really was any intention in the House of putting the South under any difficulty, restraint, limit, any shackle or embarrassment on the South on account of negro slavery, (some gentlemen said slavery, but he said negro slavery,) he wished to know it.

If there were any individuals having such feeling, he wished to know them; he wished to hear their names upon yeas and nays. If there were a majority, he should act promptly, decisively, immediately upon it, and had no doubt all the South would do the same. There might be some question as to the claim of non-slaveholding States to stop the progress of Southern habits and Southern influence Northward. As to Arkansas, there could be no question; and if seriously pressed, such claims could leave no doubt on the minds of the South as to the object of those who pressed them, or the course to be pursued by them. Such a stand being taken by the non-slaveholding States, it would make little difference whether Michigan was in or out of this Union.

He said he would sit down, again assuring the House, and the gentlemen particularly from the non-slaveholding States, of his entire confidence that no such thing would be seriously attempted by any considerable numbers of this House.

Mr. LEWIS said he should vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. Wise] to lay the bill for the admission of Michigan into the Union on the table, until the bill for the admission of Arkansas should be first passed.

He should do this, for the obvious reason that there were dangers, he would not say how great, which beset Arkansas, and which did not beset Michigan. The question of slavery could be moved as a condition for the admission of Arkansas, and it could not as a condition to the admission of Michigan. I look upon the Arkansas question as therefore the weaker of the two, and for that reason I would give it precedence. Besides, upon the delicate question which may be involved in the admission of Arkansas, we may be the weaker party in this House. For that reason, if gentlemen mean to offer no obstructions to the admission of Arkansas, let them give the assurance by helping the weaker party through with the weaker question. We of the South cannot, and will not, as I pledge myself, offer any objections to the domestic institutions of Michigan with regard to slavery. Can any gentleman make the same pledge that no such proposition shall come from the North? Besides, the two bills are not now on an equal footing. The bill for the admission of Arkansas must be sent to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The bill for the admission of Michigan need not necessarily go to that committee. It will therefore pass in perfect safety, while we shall be left to get Arkansas along, through the tedious stages of commitment, as well as we can.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SUTHERLAND] says that these two bills will be hostages for the safety of each other. Not, sir, if you pass the stronger bill in advance of the weaker. Besides, the North want no hostages on this subject. Their institutions cannot be attacked. We of the South want a hostage, to protect us on a delicate question; and the effect of giving precedence to the Michigan bill is to deprive us of that hostage.

Mr. L. said that he had understood the Delegate from Arkansas to say, that as the admission of Arkansas into the Union contained no appropriation of money, it therefore need not be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

He read the 5th and 6th sections of that act, to show that there were appropriations to pay judges and district attorneys. Now, sir, gentlemen will see that the bill for the admission of Arkansas into the Union must be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It must pass through the dark valley and shadow, not of death, I hope, but of trial. During this passage we have been told that it is to be attacked by the gentleman from Massachusetts. If Northern gentlemen wish it a safe deliverance, let them send with it, to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the bill for the admission of Michigan into the Union. Let the two bills travel the same road, share the same dangers, be subject to the same delays; and if one is attacked on the way, let not the other desert his fellow-traveller until the danger is over. Let them be reported from the committee at the same instant. Let them come into existence at the same natal moment, and be subject to the same dangers during the period of weakness and infancy. If gentlemen are willing to do equal justice to these two measures, this is a fair proposition, to which they will accede. If they do not accede to it, we ought to look to the safety of Arkansas.

The debate was continued by Messrs. VINTON, MERCER, THOMAS, and BRIGGS.

Mr. BRIGGS said he was in favor of committing both these bills. They proposed to admit two new States into this Union. These were measures of the greatest moment. The importance of the questions involved presents the strongest reason for this commitment, where they may have free and ample discussion.

The bill for the admission of Arkansas, it is admitted by all sides of the House, must be committed, as it creates the office of judge and marshal, with salaries attached to them. There is no direct appropriation in this bill, but as it provides for the appointment of officers, who, if the law goes into effect, must be paid out of the public Treasury, it creates a charge upon the Treasury, and requires commitment. He believed, by the spirit of the rules of this House, the bill for the admission of Michigan should be committed. If it becomes a law, that State will send her Senators and Representatives to this Congress, and they must be paid out of the public Treasury. The charge upon the Treasury is as direct and inevitable in the one case as in the other. The amount to be paid to their Representatives is established by a general law, and when the State is admitted, they will have the same claim for their pay for mileage and attendance as the present members of Congress have. This was a reason which he had not heard urged for the commitment of this bill; but he believed, if gentlemen would give their attention to it, they would come to the same conclusion that he was brought to. He would not raise the question of order, but desired to bring the subject to the notice of the House, in the hope that it would influence their vote. He asked for a division of the question, that the vote might be first taken on commitment, and then on the instructions.

The discussion was further continued by Mr. BELL.

Mr. ANTHONY observed that he should vote to give such direction to the Michigan bill as would keep it within the power of the House. We had already been upwards of six months in session, and much important business yet remained to the country should go into Committee of the Whole, in order that they might receive a full and untrammelled discussion, without being liable to be cut off by the previous question. Although he sometimes felt disposed to give his views on some subjects before the House, he had usually refrained from entering into debate, as he felt mortified to see the unwarrantable length to which discussion on almost every bill was generally extended. He regretted to observe the course pursued by some gentlemen, who acted as if they were desirous to continue the session till the 1st

H. OF R.]

Michigan and Arkansas.

[JUNE 8, 1836.]

Monday of November, when the next session is to commence. Some of the minority loudly deprecated the passage of bills, without affording them an opportunity of unrestrained debate on their merits.

The honorable member from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] strongly protested against the majority of the House passing bills so important, by the operation of what some gentlemen were pleased to term the "gag-law." Did not that highly respectable gentleman know that much of the past six months had been spent in useless and uninteresting debate? Did he not know that nearly every speech of any considerable length was composed, principally, of political anathemas against certain aspirants to political power and influence, or an elaborate essay on partisan politics, without any apparent reference to the subject under discussion? Did he not know that the commencement of a set speech was usually the signal for members to take their hats, leave the hall, and lounge about the public grounds, or walk off to dinner, suffering the orator to address empty benches, and perhaps a dozen fellow-members, who remained in their seats, because they were anxious to obtain the floor and follow in the same manner with an eloquent and appropriate speech for home consumption? Was it not notorious to every member of this House, that after some eight or ten speeches were delivered on almost any topic, every thing sufficient had been said to enable gentlemen to determine how they should vote; and all the speeches afterwards were a mere repetition, without a single new idea, to enlighten the mind of any member? After listening to an able exposition of each case that came before the House, by those who had carefully examined it, with a view to instruct and enlighten their fellow-members, it was a perfect waste of time to continue the discussion from day to day, and from week to week. Members had made up their minds, and all that could be urged in argument never changed a vote.

Mr. A. then remarked that the admission of the Territories of Michigan and Arkansas into the Union had been agitated in Congress for a long time, and he had little doubt that every member had determined his course; he was not, however, for stifling freedom of debate, and preventing a fair and proper discussion of these bills in the House. Gentlemen would have an opportunity to express their sentiments, and suggest such amendments as they deemed important. The House had already shown, by refusing to second the previous question, that members would not be arbitrarily deprived of debate; and he did think that at this late stage of the session, after so much time had been spent in protracted and often useless and unprofitable discussion, gentlemen would not make these bills the theme for long-winded speeches, of a partisan, political character, and which would not be listened to by one tenth of the members. He always had been and was now willing to trust to the sound discretion and unbiased judgment of the majority, if they determined, after suitable explanations, to cut off further debate by the previous question. The minority had no reason to complain; the responsibility of the measure rested upon the majority; they were accountable for the result, be it good or evil; they only said to those who wished to prolong the controversy, "Our minds are made up, our judgment is fixed, and it is now proper to come to a decision."

He had frequently listened with pleasure to the gentlemen from Tennessee, Virginia, Massachusetts, and Ohio, who wished to discuss the admission of these States; but he trusted that, as they had already embraced so many opportunities to address their fellow-members, they would not now, when other important bills must be acted on, and so much had been said on all political topics of the day, desire to procrastinate the business of the House by a protracted debate on a subject on which members, he doubted not, with few, if any exceptions, had come to a conclusion and were prepared for action.

Mr. A. repeated that he ardently hoped the House would keep the Michigan bill within its control. They already had reason to regret the unwarrantable length to which debate often extends, when the House had no power to restrain it— not even by sitting up all night and adjourning on the Sabbath morning. By refusing to commit this bill, we would avoid a "sea of troubles;" we would be able to afford a reasonable time for discussion; and when the majority were satisfied that enough had been said, they could put an end to the debate.

This course would enable us to reach other bills of a highly important character, and to decide upon them according to their merits. It would enable us to adjourn within a reasonable period, and we should return to our constituents with the cheering reflection that we had not consumed the whole of the session in talking instead of acting; in making partisan speeches for home consumption, instead of enacting wholesome laws for the benefit of our country.

Mr. HAWES asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. PATTON inquired the opinion of the Chair as to the necessity of committing these bills.

The CHAIR replied that the bill for the admission of Arkansas, as it contained an appropriation for the judges, would, under the rules, require being committed; and that the bill for the admission of Michigan, although it contained no express appropriation, created a charge upon the Treasury, and came, though not clearly, within the spirit of the rule. The Chair read a former decision on the point, made in 1832.

After some remarks on the point from Messrs. SPEIGHT, VANDERPOEL, REED, MANN of New York, BRIGGS, and BOON,

The CHAIR decided that, according to the former decision, the Arkansas bill required to be committed; and accordingly, if that bill required to be committed, so did the other.

Mr. WISE withdrew his instructions, and the motion to commit was carried in the affirmative, without a count.

On motion of Mr. WISE, the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SPEIGHT in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill entitled "An act to establish the northern boundary of the State of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union, upon the conditions therein expressed."

Mr. TAYLOR moved to amend the bill by a provision in relation to the boundary, as follows:

"Insert the word 'east,' after the word 'drawn,' in line 4th of the first section. Strike out after the word 'Michigan,' line 5th, all that follows, to the word 'bay,' in line 8th, and insert, 'to the centre of the Maumee (Miami) river, after that line so drawn shall intersect the eastern boundary line of the State of Indiana, and from the said line, in the centre of the said Maumee river, down the middle of the same to its mouth, and from thence'—"

Mr. TAYLOR said it was neither his habit nor inclination to occupy much of the time and attention of the House; and if he was so inclined, considerations of public duty would at this late period of the session restrain him from any extended remarks. But from the best examination and reflection which he had been able to give this subject, he had not been able to satisfy himself of either the justice or the expediency of the boundary between Michigan and Ohio, as described in this bill, and that he had felt it a duty to the people of Michigan, to the cause of justice, and to his honest and deep convictions upon this question, to offer the amendment which he had sent to the table. He said he was fully persuaded and convinced that if the bill passed without amendment, it would be in violation of the rights and the interests of the people of Michigan, secured by the sanctions of compact and of law, and will do them great injustice. From memorials which have been presented to this House from the people of Michigan, since they have been made acquainted with the report of the committee, it is evident that great dissatisfaction exists among them; and from the same documents we may infer that the compromise proposed by the amendment would be acceptable to them. He said that it appeared to him that the strongest objection which the State of Ohio had had to the boundary as claimed by Michigan will be removed, and that she will or ought to be satisfied with it. Mr. T. said as the question has been long before this House and the public, has been so agitating to both Michigan and Ohio as to threaten the most serious consequences, and so exciting as to command the attention of all, he presumed every gentleman upon this floor had made up his mind, and was as ready to vote now as he would be after a protracted debate. He therefore preferred, without entering into a protracted discussion, to submit the amendment, hoping that the vote may be taken without much delay in the passage of the bill; and he had only to say at present, that if the amendment shall not pass, he should feel compelled to vote for the bill as it is, not feeling at liberty to vote against the admission of Michigan into the Union; and then if Michigan accepts the terms of her admission, in conformity to a provision of the bill, he should be content, having discharged his duty; her boundary will then be altered with her own consent. But he said he would add, as his opinion, if Michigan accepts the terms of her admission into the Union, as provided by this bill, it will be found a compulsory acceptance rather than a voluntary choice.

Mr. VINTON submitted the following amendment, to come in at the end of the second section:

"And provided, also, and it is hereby further expressly declared, that if the convention provided for in the third section of this act shall not give the assent therein required, the boundaries of the States of Ohio and Indiana shall nevertheless be, and forever remain, fixed and established between them and Michigan, as the same are in this act above specified and described."

Mr. HANNEGAN hoped the gentleman would strike out the name of Indiana from his amendment, as the boundary of that State was long and permanently settled, and stood upon higher ground than the bill providing for the admission of Michigan into the Union could place it.

Mr. VINTON explained that he had inserted Indiana because it should not be said that he had taken care of the interests of his own State alone.

Mr. McCARTY saw no objection to the name of Indiana being retained in the amendment.

Mr. HANNEGAN, after a few remarks, moved to strike out the word "Indiana" from the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was then further debated by Messrs. LANE, HANNEGAN, McCARTY, VINTON, MASON of Ohio, GALBRAITH, HARDIN, THOMAS, and EVERETT, who moved that the committee rise, but withdrew it at the request of Mr. UNDERWOOD, who suggested an amendment which, he said, he would move at a subsequent stage.

Mr. ROBERTSON then obtained the floor, and gave notice of certain amendments he should hereafter move, having reference to securing the interests of the United States in the public lands in Michigan.

Mr. THOMAS said a few words in explanation, and renewed the motion (as requested) that the committee rise; which prevailed: Yeas 74, nays 54.

The committee accordingly rose and reported.

The Speaker having resumed the chair,

On motion of Mr. SEVIER, the supplementary bill from the Senate, in relation to the admission of Arkansas into the Union, was included in the special order on the other bills.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved that the House again go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the Michigan and Arkansas bills, and asked for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. EVANS then rose and moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. HANNEGAN asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 84, nays 74.

So the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, JUNE 9.

MICHIGAN AND ARKANSAS.

The House, in further execution of the special order, went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SPEIGHT in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill to establish the northern boundary of Ohio, and for the admission of Michigan into the Union.

The following amendment, offered by Mr. VINTON, being under consideration:

"And provided, also, and it is hereby further expressly declared, that if the convention provided for in the 3d section of this act shall not give the assent therein required, the boundaries of the States of Ohio and Indiana shall nevertheless be, and forever remain, fixed and established between them and Michigan, as the same are in this act above specified and described"—

Mr. EVERETT made his acknowledgments to the committee for according to him last evening a delay till this morning. He had then been in his seat during a session of eight hours, and was too much exhausted to proceed: he acknowledged it as a personal favor, and in return would endeavor to consume as little of their time as possible. He said that one object which he had in addressing the House was, to exclude conclusions that might be drawn from the report of the committees of both Houses, which asserted, or took it for granted, that Congress had no power to form more than two States north of the lake line. For one, he claimed the power for Congress to form in that territory as many States as the convenience of its inhabitants might require.

Mr. E. said he would place the committee in possession of an analysis of the opinions he had formed, to enable them more easily to accompany him as he proceeded.

The objections to the bill for the admission of Michigan into the Union arise from its assumed boundaries, and from its constitution, and from the provisions of the bill.

I. From its assumed boundaries.

1. That, under the ordinance of 1787, Congress is restricted to the line drawn due east through the southerly bend of Lake Michigan, (the lake line,) as the south line and boundary of the one or two States that it was authorized to form in the territory north of that line.

This will be examined as a question of construction, and also of intention.

He should then examine the questions arising under the ordinance.

1. Has Michigan a right to demand admission into the Union until formed into a State by Congress, according to the power reserved in the ordinance?

2. Was an act of Congress necessary to authorize Michigan to form a constitution, preliminary to her admission into the Union?

3. Has Congress a right to demand of Michigan a relinquishment of her ordinance boundary as a condition of her admission?

It will then be insisted—

1. That the United States do not hold the sovereignty

H. or R.]

Michigan and Arkansas.

[JUNE 9, 1836.]

of that Territory directly under the cessions of the original States, but under the cessions of the three States formed by the 5th article of the ordinance; under which Congress has the power to form States at pleasure, with such boundaries as shall be deemed proper, independent of all the restrictions (of boundaries) of the ordinance.

2. That it is, therefore, improper to ask the assent of Michigan to any boundary that Congress may think proper to prescribe.

II. Objections to the constitution of Michigan.

1. It was formed by a convention elected, in part, by foreigners.

2. It naturalizes foreigners.

III. Objections to the bill.

1. It authorizes a convention, to be elected under the constitution of Michigan, to ratify its boundaries.

2. It provides that the Representative and Senators already elected under their constitution shall be entitled to seats in Congress.

I. In relation to the question of boundary.

I contend that, under the ordinance, Congress had no power to make any line other than the lake line the boundary between the three States formed, and the one or two States that might be formed under the fifth article.

The fifth article is as follows:

"Art. 5. There shall be formed, in the said territory, not less than three nor more than five States; and the boundaries of the States, as soon as Virginia shall alter her act of cession, and consent to the same, shall become fixed and established as follows, to wit: the western State in the said territory shall be bounded by the Mississippi, the Ohio, and Wabash rivers; a direct line drawn from the Wabash and Post Vincents, due north, to the territorial line between the United States and Canada; and, by the said territorial line, to the Lake of the Woods and Mississippi. The middle State shall be bounded by the said direct line, the Wabash, from Post Vincents to the Ohio, by the Ohio, by a direct line drawn due north from the mouth of the Great Miami to the said territorial line, and by the said territorial line. The eastern State shall be bounded by the last-mentioned direct line, the Ohio, Pennsylvania, and the said territorial line: provided, however, and it is further understood and declared, that the boundaries of these three States shall be subject so far to be altered that, if Congress shall hereafter find it expedient, they shall have authority to form one or two States in that part of the said territory which lies north of an east and west line drawn through the southerly bend of Lake Michigan. And whenever any of the said States shall have sixty thousand free inhabitants therein, such State shall be admitted, by its delegates, into the Congress of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever; and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State government: provided the constitution and government so to be formed shall be republican, and in conformity to the principles contained in these articles; and, so far as it can be consistent with the general interest of the confederacy, such admission shall be allowed at an earlier period, and when there may be a less number of free inhabitants in a State than sixty thousand."

As a question of construction—

The ordinance establishes the entire boundaries of three States. No general power was reserved to Congress to alter these boundaries. The only power reserved was that Congress might alter them by doing a certain act prescribed in the ordinance, viz: by forming one or two States in the territory north of the lake line. It thus defines the line by which the boundary of the three States might be altered, and the act by which alone it could be done.

It is manifest that the object was not that the line should be fixed with the view to the extent of territory, but with a view to certainty. Had extent of territory been the object, it would have been easily effected by adopting a line of latitude as the boundary, as it will be seen was adopted in the prior ordinance.

For the purpose, then, of making the division line certain, the lake line was adopted as one that could, in all time, be rendered certain.

An argument has been attempted to be drawn from a criticism on the word "in," as used in the 5th article. It is proper, however, to say that it was not relied on in the report of the committee of the House. It has been said elsewhere that "The territory of Ohio was within the eastern State. Congress then had power to extend Ohio to the territorial or Canada line; nay, the ordinance provided that it should be so extended, unless Congress should find it expedient to alter this provision. Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio, were all thus laid out by the ordinance as States to extend to the territorial line; but it was also provided that Congress might lay out one or two States 'in (not, as the ordinance has sometimes been misquoted, out of)' that part of the territory north of the east and west line referred to.

"A power to form one 'or two States in a territory' is not to be restricted, without the grossest violence to all the rules of construction, to a mere power to form one or two States out of that territory. The latter is a power only to divide the whole territory into two States, or form one of it all; the former is a power to select any portion of that territory for the purpose of forming one or two States, and then of either assigning the whole so selected to one State, or dividing it between two. The power here given to assign all the country north of the east and west line to three States primarily designated in the ordinance, embraces the power to assign any part of it to them, and it is evident that Congress has always so understood it."

Unfortunately for this argument, it is refuted by the terms of the article itself, as well as by the general object of the article.

The fifth article commences with these words:

"There shall be formed in the said territory not less than three nor more than five States." Would it have been a fair execution of this provision to have formed the five States "out of" one half of the territory? What would be the condition of the country excluded?

The object of the ordinance was to make disposal of the whole territory. It is entitled "An ordinance for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio." Its provisions extended to the whole territory. The preamble to the five articles of compact is as follows:

"And for extending the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty, &c.; to fix and establish those principles as the basis of all laws, constitutions, and governments, which forever hereafter shall be formed in the said territory; to provide also for the establishment of States, and permanent government therein, and for their admission to a share in the federal bounties on an equal footing with the original States, at as early periods as may be consistent with the general interest:

"It is hereby ordained and declared, by the authority aforesaid, that the following articles shall be considered as articles of compact between the original States and the people and States in the said territory, and forever remain unalterable, unless by common consent."

There is, then, no foundation for the construction that would limit the term in to a part, either in relation to the whole territory or to the part north of the east and west dividing line.

As a question of intention—

This question relates to the intention of the parties to the cession of Virginia, and as between them it may be proper to have reference to the intention of the parties as a fact.

To ascertain the fact of intention, it will be necessary to have reference to the previous acts of the parties, from which it will be evident that it was the fixed purpose of Virginia to make the boundaries of the States certain, and that that purpose was adhered to, except as to the line that should divide from each other the two States that might be formed north of the lake line; and that if only one State was formed north of that line, then its boundaries were rendered certain. Why make any division, if not certain?

It should be borne in mind, during this investigation, that the object of the parties was simply to divide the territory of the United States into States. Neither party had the acquisition of territory in view.

On referring to the journals and documents of the Congress of the confederation, but little doubt will remain that the intention of the parties will be found to agree with the construction of the ordinance.

At the close of the war of the Revolution, the territory northwest of the Ohio was claimed principally by New York and Virginia: other western lands were claimed by other States. The other States insisted that it was acquired by the blood and treasure of all the States, and ought to be disposed of for the benefit of all.

On the 6th September, 1780, Congress passed a resolve recommending to the several States that had claims to such lands, to cede them to the United States.

Congress, by a resolution of the 10th October, 1780, resolved that the lands so to be ceded should be disposed of for the common benefit of the United States, formed into republican States, and which should become members of the Federal Union; that the extent of each should not be less than one hundred, nor more than one hundred and fifty miles square, or as near thereto as circumstances would admit.

On the 2d January, 1781, Virginia passed an act to cede the western territory to the United States, on the condition that it should be laid out and formed into States, according to the terms of the resolution of 10th October, 1780. Other conditions were also annexed.

On the 3d November, 1781, a committee of Congress reported against accepting the cession of Virginia.

A similar report was made on the 10th April, 1782; in consequence of which, the cession of Virginia was not accepted, and thus this cession was rendered ineffectual. (See appendix.) *

On the 13th September, 1783, Congress passed an act stipulating the terms on which the cessions would be accepted, embracing, among others, the terms of the resolve of 1780 as the basis for the subsequent division of the ceded territory into States.

On the 20th October, 1783, Virginia, by an act, authorized her delegates in Congress to execute a cession of the western territory on the terms stipulated in the act of 13th September, 1783.

On the —, 1784, the subject of the division of the western territory into States, according to the resolve of 1780 and the act of 1783, was committed to a committee consisting of Messrs. Jefferson of Virginia, Chase of Maryland, and Howell of Rhode Island.

On the 1st March, 1784, Mr. Jefferson, from the committee, reported a resolution to lay out the western territory into two ranges of States, divided by the meridian of the foot of the rapids of the Ohio, (84 deg. 45 min.) and bounded west by the Mississippi, and east by the meridian of the mouth of the Great Kanawha, (81 deg.) and each State, commencing from the completion of lat. 31 deg. and going from south to north, to contain 2 deg. of lat.; providing, however, that all north of 47 deg. should belong to the State next below it; and that the States between the parallels of 45 deg. and 43 deg. should be divided by Lake Michigan; and that the eastern State should include the whole peninsula north of 31 deg.; and, also, that the territory east of the east meridian, and between Lake Erie, the Pennsylvania line, and the Ohio river, should constitute a State; thus laying out ten States (to which names were given) north of lat. 37 deg., including, however, in the ninth State, the point of land at the confluence of the Ohio with the Mississippi river, below 37 deg.

Contemporaneous with this report, on the same 1st March, 1784, the delegates of Virginia, in pursuance of the authority given by the act of their State of 20th October, 1783, executed to the United States a cession of the western territory.

On the 23d April, 1784, Congress passed an ordinance, laying out and dividing the western territory into States, on the general basis of the report of the committee, with this alteration: that all above 43 deg. was to constitute two States, to be divided by the dividing meridian of the falls of the Ohio; and that where the Ohio river nearly coincided with lat. 39 deg., it should be the boundary instead of that latitude. This ordinance received the votes of the delegation of Virginia, was contemporaneous with her act of cession, and is to be considered as an execution of the condition of the cession of Virginia.

By the terms of this ordinance it was subject to alteration at any time before sales of some part of the lands had been made.

Thus far, it appears to have been the intention of Congress and of Virginia, that the boundaries of the States should be fixed and certain, regardless of all other considerations.

It is also worthy of note that all parties were in favor of creating a large number of States. Under the confederation, the large States seemed to be jealous of creating rivals. When the formation of the constitution was in prospect, fears were entertained from another source.

The next was moved in 1786. At this time, however, no sales had been made, and it was, therefore, competent for the original parties to the cession to change its conditions, and, until sales were made, for Congress to repeal the ordinance.

On the 7th July, 1786, a resolution was moved in Congress recommending to the Legislature of Virginia to revise the act of cession, so far as to empower Congress to divide the territory into not more than five nor less than three States. The power proposed to be asked was general, without any restriction as to extent or boundaries.

The delegates from Virginia moved, as a substitute, to recommend to Virginia and Massachusetts so to alter their acts of cession as that the States in the western territory might be bounded as follows: There should be three States between the Ohio and a line running due east from the Mississippi to the eastern boundary of the United States, so as to touch the most southern part of Lake Michigan, and two States north of that line; the States south were to be divided by the same division lines that were afterwards adopted in the ordinance of 1797; and the States north were to be divided by Lake Michigan. This left no discretion or power in Congress

* Though Virginia may have had no right to the territory northwest of the Ohio, yet we accepted her grant, with certain conditions, and which were subsequently recognised by Congress as binding.

The resolution of 1786 states that unless Virginia assented, the States must be restricted as to their extent by the condition of the resolution of 1780.

The ordinance of 1787 recognises the assent of Virginia as necessary.

Michigan and Arkansas.

[JUNE 9, 1836.]

as to extent or boundaries. The boundaries were to be fixed and certain.

The substitute was rejected, and the original resolution adopted, with some immaterial amendments.

The report of the committee of the House, (No. 380,) after stating the object of the substitute, contains the following admission, which it seems to me is a surrender of the argument:

"Here, then, we have displayed, distinctly, the wishes of the representatives of one of the parties to the ordinance. If they had been acceded to by the other party to that compact, the east and west line, drawn through the southerly bend of Lake Michigan, would have been made a permanent and immoveable boundary of the three States on the Ohio; and the same line, with Lakes Michigan, Huron, and the Straits of Michilimackinac, would have been fixed boundaries for a State to be formed in the peninsula which they surround."

The admission is, that if the substitute had been accepted—that is, if the ordinance had established the five States, with boundaries therein mentioned, and, in addition thereto, had said that the centre of Lake Michigan should be the dividing line between the two northern States—then the lake line would have been the immoveable boundary of the three States on the Ohio.

The assent of Virginia not having been given to the resolution of 7th July, 1786, Congress, on the 13th July, 1787, submitted another proposition, based on a compromise between the resolution and the substitute, viz: the 5th article of the ordinance of 1787. The resolution proposed the alternative of three or five States: the substitute proposed five as the fixed number. The resolution asked for a discretionary power to fix the boundaries; the substitute established the boundaries of all the States: first, by a line dividing the three southern from the two northern States, and then by dividing lines between those of the south and between those of the north. The ordinance of 1787 provides first for the boundaries of the three States, subject to alteration if Congress should deem it expedient; extending them each from the Ohio to our northern boundary, and dividing them by the lines of longitude named in the substitute, leaving no discretionary power in Congress. If there should be five States, the ordinance provides that the three southern States should be divided from the two northern States by the same east and west line that is mentioned in the substitute, leaving no discretion in Congress as to this dividing line. The only discretion given in the substitute was as to the dividing line between the two northern States. The substitute made Lake Michigan the dividing line; but the ordinance, while it left it to the discretion of Congress to make one or two States, and if two, to settle the dividing line between them, yet gave no discretion as to the lake line. Both the substitute and the ordinance establish the lake line as the line that should divide the three States from the one or two States that might be formed north of it.

If the power had been to form only one State north of the east line, then the admission of the committee would, in terms, admit the immutability of the lake line. This one State would have been as distinctly bounded as the three southern States; and now, out of that territory thus definitively bounded, two States are to be formed, and the immutability of the lake line changed by the discretion given to Congress to fix the boundary between the two States north of it.

The report asks—

"If it had been the purpose of the Congress of 1787 to make an east and west line, drawn through the southern extreme of Lake Michigan, a fixed northern boundary for the three States which were to be formed on the Ohio, and to form another State in the peninsula of Michigan, is it to be believed that they would not have adopted the language of Mr. Grayson's resolution, which was before them, on those points, as they had borrowed the language of the same resolution in describing the boundaries of the three States, whose eastern, southern, and western boundaries it was their intention to make immutable?"

It is not the declared purpose of the ordinance of 1787 to form a State in the peninsula of Michigan, but to form one or two States in the territory north of the lake line; and if two States, it was left to Congress to fix the dividing line; if but one State, the boundaries were already given. It would have been, therefore, manifestly improper to have used Mr. Grayson's language as to the dividing line between the two northern States, when it was to be left to Congress to fix the line.

An argument is attempted to be drawn from the reasons which induced the passage of the resolution of 1786.

It is thus stated in the report:

"Many of the members of the Congress of '87 had been members of the Congress of '86. It is fair to presume they knew well the reasons which had influenced Mr. Grayson to make his motion, and the considerations which had induced its rejection. Fortunately, we are not dependent, entirely, on conjecture to learn some of the motives which, on that occasion, guided the counsels of Congress. They are to be found recorded on its journal. In the preamble to the resolution of July, 1786, it is declared that, 'in fixing the limits and dimensions of the new States, due attention ought to be paid to natural boundaries, and a variety of circumstances, which will be pointed out by a more perfect knowledge of the country, so as to provide for the future growth and prosperity of each State.' Now, there is no evidence to show that additional information had been obtained by Congress, after this preamble was adopted, prior to the passage of the ordinance. Indeed, we are well apprized that, long after the latter period, no map of the northwest territory, more accurate than Mitchell's, had been published. Lewis's map, dated in 1815, and Vance's map, in 1818, each exhibit the errors which are so conspicuous in the face of the map first mentioned. The lights of science and civilization had not broken through the clouds of dark uncertainty which then overshadowed the far West. The latitude even of the southern extreme of Lake Michigan had not been clearly ascertained. Neither had the resources and extent of the territory lying north of an east and west line, drawn through that point, been explored. Congress, under such circumstances, would have acted unwisely, if they had fixed, irrevocably, any one of the boundary lines of a State, or States, to be formed in a country which had never been traversed by civilized man. They ought to have adhered, and it is believed they did adhere, to their original purpose. They fixed the east, west, and south boundary lines of three States, and postponed a decision as to the limits, dimensions, or even numbers, of those to be formed, until a variety of circumstances, which a more perfect knowledge of the country would point out, would enable them, or their successors, to provide for the future growth of each State, as well as the accommodation and security of the first adventurers. Hence they adopted the language of Mr. Grayson's resolution, in part, and rejected it in part. They knew the extent of the country on the Ohio, and could, therefore, accede to his proposal so far as to establish the south, east, and west boundaries of three States, to be organized on the Ohio border. But they refused to make, as he had expressly proposed, a line drawn due east from the Mississippi, so as to touch the southern extreme of Lake Michigan, a limitation beyond which these States should not extend. And Congress refused, also, to form the Michigan peninsula into a State, as Mr. Grayson had proposed, to be admitted into the Union whenever there should be sixty thousand free inhabitants therein. Instead of this, they adopted the fifth article of the ordinance, which declares that the three States on the Ohio shall extend north to the territorial line between the United States and Canada: Provided, however, and it is further understood and declared, that the boundaries of these three States shall be subject so far to be altered, that if Congress shall hereafter find it to be expedient, they shall have authority to form one or two States in that part of the said territory which lies north of an east and west line drawn through the southern bend or extreme of Lake Michigan."

Michigan and Arkansas.

[H. OF R.]

The question is as to the construction of the cession of Virginia, as modified by her assent to the fifth article of the ordinance. Her assent was not given to the resolution of 1786, but to the new proposition contained in the ordinance of 1787. It is not perceived how the resolution, or any which led to it, could vary the construction of a new proposition, made because the former one was not acceptable. The report, however, assumes that, because the substitute of Mr. Grayson was rejected, and that substitute established the line dividing the northern from the southern States, the same was not established by the ordinance; the same argument would apply to all the other lines; and, in fine, it is assuming that, because Congress, in 1786, rejected a proposition which established all the lines of all the States, it could not adopt a proposition in 1787 which gave a discretionary power as to one line, without unsettling all the rest. Yet such is the argument.

But there is a point of view in which the principal fact stated, the want of an accurate survey, is entitled to consideration.

It is stated, and may be taken for granted, that Mitchell's map was the only evidence of the location of Lake Michigan before Congress in 1787, when the ordinance was made, and before the Legislature of Virginia when she assented to the 5th article.

On referring to that map, an east and west line drawn through the south bend of the lake is a latitude line of 42 deg., 20 min. and which would include a much greater extent of line than is claimed by Ohio.

It then becomes question of intention—of fact—which line did the parties intend—the line due east through the south bend of the lake, or the latitude line indicated by that found on Mitchell's map? There is no ground for taking any intermediate line.

Connected with the principal fact above stated, was also the fact that, in 1787-'8, it was well known that Mitchell's map was not founded on an actual survey, but was conjectural as to the location of lakes and rivers. Though made on the best authorities then to be obtained, yet no one relied on it as an accurate delineation of the location of the lakes and rivers of the north.

It is material to consider what were the objects of the contracting parties. It was not a contest between independent nations, in which the object on either side was the acquisition of territory, but simply to divide the territory of the United States into future States, that were to become members of the Union. It was not, therefore, a question of a little more or a little less on either side. On the one side, Congress desired an unlimited discretion as to all boundaries; on the other, Virginia contended that Congress should have no discretion whatever; but the boundaries of all the States should be established, as a condition to its cession. The first question then to settle was, whether the lines should be floating or fixed, when it was determined that they should be fixed; the question was not so much where, as that they should be certain, and a point was taken that could be rendered certain.

On these grounds, I have come to the conclusion that, both on the principle of construction and the fact of intention, the line drawn east and west through the southerly bend of Lake Michigan was immovably fixed by the ordinance of 1787, as the dividing line between the three States on the south and the one or two States that might thereafter be formed on the north of it; that the lines of the three States, as bounded in the 5th article, were subject to be altered by Congress only in the event of its determining it to be expedient to form one or two States north of that line; and that the only act by which Congress could alter such boundaries was the formation of such State or States; and, as a consequence—the formation of the territory north of that line into one or two States—the limits of the three States would be reduced to that line as their northern boundary; and that Michigan, if admitted under the power given to Congress by the ordinance, is entitled to that line as her southern boundary. This boundary Michigan has assumed and claims as her right under the ordinance.

I will now proceed to examine the questions arising under the ordinance:

1. Has Michigan a right to demand admission into the Union until formed into a State by Congress?

The three States formed by the fifth article, and each of them, according to their extent, had the right to apply for admission; unless Congress, by the exercise of the special power reserved in the ordinance, had restricted their limits to the lake line, they had the right to claim the whole of the northwest territory. The forming the one or two States north of that line was a subject of expediency—of discretion—and no portion of that territory had a right to demand that Congress should exercise that discretion that Congress should form it into a State, much less by its own act form it into a State. The territory north of the east and west line has therefore no right to demand admission into the Union until it has been formed into a State by the act of Congress.

The case of Tennessee is not in point. In that case, the cession of North Carolina was on the condition that the territory (Tennessee) ceded should be formed into one or two States, and, as one or two States, it was entitled to admission into the Union. Congress was bound to admit it at all events into the Union, and as one State, unless it should think proper to form it into two States. But under the Union Michigan was entitled to become a part of the Union, as a part of the States to which it belonged under the fifth article; it had no claim to be divided into a separate State. In the case of Tennessee, Congress neglected to form it into two States, and the inhabitants petitioned to be admitted as one State. It had the requisite number of inhabitants, and Congress could refuse it admission only on the ground that it was expedient to divide it into two States, and by thus dividing it.

To entitle Michigan, then, to an admission into the Union, under the ordinance, Congress must, by some act, have formed the territory into a State; not a political community, but have designated the boundaries as a State, according to the provisions of the ordinance, viz: by forming the territory north of the east and west line into two States, of which the Territory of Michigan is one. This has not been done, though Congress has passed acts from which it may be inferred that it intended, in some aftertime, to form it into one or two States, or at least that the right should be reserved.

The power reserved to Congress by the fifth article to alter the limits of the three States was necessarily limited in time. It must have been executed prior to the admission of either of the three States with their entire extent of territory, the admission of a State necessarily carrying with it a relinquishment of all right of sovereignty in the United States.

The act for the admission of the State of Ohio, in 1803, restricts the northern boundary to the lake line; so far, it looked to the future execution of the power. It reserved the right to restore Ohio to its original boundaries; so far, it looked to the contingency of its future determination on the expediency of exercising that power; so that, in no view, can this act of the admission of Ohio be regarded as an execution of the power.

The act of 1805, establishing the Michigan Territory by certain boundaries, probably looked to the same contingencies, but in itself had no necessary relation to the execution of the power. In itself it was in no sense an execution of the power. The result, then, is, that by no act, express or implied, has Michigan been formed into a State, or the power reserved to Congress been in any way executed.

2. The next question is, whether any act of Congress, other than an act constituting one or two States, &c., is necessary as preliminary to the demand of a State to admission to the Union, under the ordinance. The condition on which States under the ordinance are entitled to admission, is the following clause, which is applicable as well to the one or two States that might be formed, as to the three States which were formed by the 5th article: "And whenever any one of the said States shall have 60,000 free inhabitants therein, such State shall be admitted, by its delegates, into the Congress of the United States, on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever; and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State government: provided the constitution and government so to be formed shall be republican, and in conformity to the principles contained in those articles."

The only conditions required are, that the State shall have 60,000 inhabitants, and should have adopted a constitution conformable to the ordinance. No preliminary act of Congress is required to enable the State to form a constitution. The ordinance of 1784 provided for the establishment of temporary governments in the several States formed by it, and required acts of Congress preliminary to their forming constitutions, under which their conventions were to be called for that purpose. The ordinance of 1787 did not provide for the establishment of temporary government in any of the States formed or to be formed under it. Provision was made for a territorial government, not having any reference to States, but to the whole territory. Whenever the fact of a State having 60,000 inhabitants existed, those inhabitants were entitled to move in such manner as they should think proper, to the end to form a constitution, and demand admission into the Union.

But taking it, however, for granted that the act of 1805 was an execution of the reserved power, then it is admitted that Michigan is entitled to admission on the same principles that would have been applicable to the admission of either of the three States. That, being a State, the only condition was, that she should have 60,000 inhabitants, and have formed a republican constitution, and to the formation of which no preliminary act of Congress was required.

3. Congress has no [right to] insist on her assent to an alteration of her ordinance boundary as a condition of admission.

It could, not as a condition, have demanded it of either of the three States; they were entitled to admission by their entire boundaries, unless Congress should choose to alter them by forming one or two States north of the lake line.

The result, then, is, that Michigan, in relation to the question of boundary, is not entitled to demand admission into the Union under the ordinance, because Congress has not formed her into a State under that ordinance; and the consequence follows, that the original lines of the three States, extending from the Ohio river to the northern boundary of the United States, have not been altered by any act of Congress authorized by the ordinance; and that the whole territory now belongs to those three States, unless it has been relinquished by them to the United States.

It is now insisted that the portion of the northwestern territory, not within the limits of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, has been relinquished by those States to the United States. And under this title it has been competent for Congress to divide it into as many States as it shall deem proper, with such boundaries as shall be deemed expedient, under the clauses in the constitution giving to Congress the power "to dispose of and make all needful rules respecting the territory belonging to the United States, and to admit new States into the Union."

The ordinance of 1784 was a compact, unalterable, (after a sale of any part of the land,) unless by the joint consent of Congress and of the State within which the alteration proposed was to be made.

The ordinance of 1787 was a compact between the United States and the people and States in said territory—unalterable unless by common consent—by the consent of the parties to the compact—"the United States and the people and States in said territory." The State of Virginia was not a party to the compact. It was therefore competent for Congress and the States to alter the provisions of any of the articles of the compact, so far as the interests of the States were concerned. The right of soil was vested in the United States by the cession. The right of sovereignty alone remained to the States, and this right was reserved to each State. It was therefore competent for each State to relinquish to the United States its right of sovereignty to any portion of its territory; and even independent of this power, each State had the same right of relinquishment. The United States, by accepting such relinquishment, would hold the sovereignty of the territory relinquished, subject to the powers granted by the third section of the fourth article of the constitution. Congress would have the power to make all needful rules and regulations for the government of the territory, for its division into States, and for their admission into the Union.

The cession of Virginia looked only to the primary division of the territory into States. When admitted into the Union, they were to be admitted on an equal footing with the other States. It would be competent for Congress, with the assent of any one of these States, to divide it into two States, and each of these new States had the same power to cede any part of her territory to the United States that Virginia had to make her cession.

The three States formed by the ordinance, at the request of Congress, have severally, by the highest act of sovereignty—the act that is now required of Michigan—relinquished to the United States their right of sovereignty to all the territory north of their northern boundaries.

The State of Ohio accepted the lake line as her northern boundary, and, as a consequence, relinquished her right of sovereignty to the territory north of it. It was accepted, however, subject to two provisions. The first was contained in the act of 1802, authorizing Ohio to form a constitution, as follows:

"Provided, That Congress shall be at liberty, at any time hereafter, either to attach all the territory lying east of the line to be drawn due north from the mouth of the Miami aforesaid, to the territorial line, and north of an east and west line drawn through the southerly extreme of Lake Michigan, running east as aforesaid to Lake Erie, to the aforesaid State, or dispose of it otherwise, in conformity to the fifth article of compact between the original States and the people and States to be formed in the territory northwest of the river Ohio."

Congress at this time had not determined the question of the expediency of forming the one or the two States north of the lake line, and by this provision reserved the power of determining it thereafter.

The other provision is contained in the constitution of Ohio of 1803, as follows:

"Provided always, and it is hereby fully understood and declared by this Convention, That if the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan should extend so far south that a line drawn due east from it should not intersect Lake Erie, or if it should intersect the said Lake Erie east of the mouth of the Miami river of the lake, then, and in that case, with the assent of the Congress of the United States, the northern boundary of this State shall be established by, and extended to, a direct line running from the southern extremity of Lake Michigan to the most northerly cape of the Miami bay, after intersecting the due north line from the mouth of the Great Miami river as aforesaid; thence, northeast, to the territorial line, and by the said territorial line to the Pennsylvania line."

Thus reserving to Congress the right, on the contingency specified, of granting to Ohio the extension of her northern boundary to its original limit.

The first provision was in perfect accordance with the ordinance; it bound Congress either to restore the territory to Ohio, or to execute the ordinance, by forming one or two States north of the lake line.

The second provision was in direct conflict with the ordinance, and could not be executed until Congress had determined not to form the new State or States north of the lake line; and the validity of its execution would not depend on the special power reserved to Congress by the ordinance; it would not derive its force from the act of Congress alone, but from the joint action of Congress and the State of Ohio.

It may be repeated that the power given to Congress by the ordinance to alter the boundaries of the three States was absolute, but it was also definite. It might be executed without the assent of the States, but it could be executed only in the manner prescribed. On the admission of Ohio into the Union, all power necessary to the execution of the ordinance was reserved; but it will be found that, on the admission of Indiana and Illinois, no such power was reserved, and that, in consequence of the terms on which they were admitted, it became impossible for Congress to execute the power reserved in the ordinance.

On the 7th of May, 1800, the Territory of Indiana was established, and comprised all the territory included within the boundaries of the two western States, by the ordinance of 1787.

On the 11th of January, 1805, the Territory of Michigan was established, and included all that part of the Northwestern Territory lying north of the lake line and east of a line drawn from the southerly bend of Lake Michigan, through the middle of the lake, to its northerly extremity, and thence due north to the northern boundary of the United States; thus including in Michigan, and excluding from Indiana, a part of the territory of the middle State of the ordinance of 1787.

On the 3d of February, 1809, the Territory of Illinois was established, consisting of all the territory of the western State of said ordinance.

The act of 19th April, 1816, authorized the inhabitants of the Territory of Indiana to form a constitution.

By the 2d section of the act, the northern boundary of the State was proposed to be limited to a latitude line ten miles north of the lake line, to which that State was invited to assent, by the following proviso:

"Provided, That the convention hereinafter provided for, when formed, shall ratify the boundaries aforesaid; otherwise they shall be and remain as now prescribed by the ordinance for the government of the Territory northwest of the river Ohio."

Thus expressly declaring that, if the convention did not agree to the restricted boundary, their boundaries should remain as prescribed by the ordinance; that is, extending northerly to the northern boundary of the United States, and, prior to the admission of Indiana, subject to be altered by the act of Congress alone, according to the provisions of that ordinance.

The restricted boundary was ratified by the convention, and from this change of boundary, deriving its validity from the joint act and assent of Congress and the State of Indiana, Congress had deprived itself of the power of executing the power reserved in the ordinance, of forming one or two States of the territory north of the lake line.

The Territory of Illinois, as before stated, was formed of the whole territory that constituted the western State, under the ordinance of 1789.

By the act of the 18th April, 1818, the inhabitants of that Territory were authorized to form a constitution.

By the 2d section of the act it was proposed to limit the northern boundary of the State to latitude 42 deg. 30 min., and the assent of Illinois was invited, by a similar proviso to that in the act relating to Indiana.

The convention ratified the restricted boundary, and thereby relinquished its right of sovereignty to the territory north of it.

Thus, by the relinquishment by the three original States of their sovereignty to the territory north of their respective restricted limits, the United States acquired the sovereignty of the same, and, under the constitution, have the power to make all needful rules and regulations for its government, for the formation of States, and for their admission into the Union; and this not in opposition to the ordinance, but in perfect accordance with the provision authorizing the alteration of the compact by common consent.

This relinquishment it was competent for the States to make, as sovereign States, without looking to the ordinance for authority. Had Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, been admitted into the Union with the boundaries given to the three States by the ordinance, can it be doubted that each would have had power to have relinquished any portion of its territory to the United States? By that power were the original cessions made.

The right of sovereignty being thus vested in the United States, it is competent for Congress to grant to Ohio, or confirm to Michigan, as it shall deem expedient, the territory in controversy.

It is, then, to decide in what manner any portion of its territory shall be admitted into the Union; to establish the boundaries, and to prescribe the manner in which it shall proceed to form a constitution. No portion of its territory has the right to demand admission by its own act, until Congress shall have, by law, determined these preliminaries.

2. Congress, then, having the power to define the boundaries of new States, it is improper to ask Michigan to give her assent to the boundary.

If, after Congress shall have prescribed the boundaries, the Territory should decline forming a constitution, the only consequence would be, they would remain a Territory until Congress should propose new boundaries.

Though no new State has the right to claim admission into the Union until Congress shall have determined its boundaries, and directed the manner in which it shall proceed to form its constitution, yet it is competent for Congress to assent to the admission of a State without these preliminary acts. If a portion of territory shall have, on its own motion, done those acts which Congress would have directed; if it shall have assumed such boundaries as Congress would have given her, and formed a constitution in the manner Congress would have directed, it is competent for Congress to ratify the same, and at once to admit such State into the Union.

It is now, therefore, competent for Congress to admit the State of Michigan into the Union, if satisfied with her boundaries, with the manner in which her constitution has been made, and with its provisions.

It may be here remarked that the acts of the three States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, have no other effect than to alter the ordinance in relation to the number of the States and the boundaries of the three States. The right of soil remains to be disposed of, according to the conditions of the original cessions; the compact, in every other respect, remains in force. The cession of the three States affects the political right of sovereignty only.

The boundaries assumed by Michigan are the same as given to the Territory by the act of 1805. Though that act, on the face of it, is merely an execution of the general power granted in the ordinance of 1787, to divide the territory into one or two districts—a power which formed no part of the compact, a power at all times repealable, and a power which was superseded by the third section of the fourth article of the constitution—yet it can scarcely be doubted that it was intended as the basis of a State, in relation to its boundaries, to be admitted into the Union. And good faith requires that those boundaries should still be accorded to her, unless there are substantial objections.

In relation to the point in controversy with Ohio, such objections, in my opinion, formed on the evidence present, do exist; arising, first, from the public works of Ohio, to which the mouth of the Maumee river is necessary, is essential to Ohio; and, secondly, from the danger to the peace of the country, from the acerbity of the controversy. On these grounds, and on these alone, I am in favor of granting the disputed territory to the State of Ohio.

Objections also exist as to the western boundary, if more than two States are to be formed of the territory north of the States of Ohio and Michigan. In that case I should not be willing to extend Michigan beyond the peninsula.

II. The objections arising under its constitution, on which I oppose it, are, to the manner in which it has been formed, and to one of its provisions.

1. It was formed on the votes of aliens.
2. It naturalizes aliens.

The revolution did not commence in anarchy, in which all who were inhabitants of the country would derive equal rights from its success. It was the secession of organized States, in which, during its whole progress, the disabilities of alienage were recognised. As between the colonies and the mother country, the principle was anomalous; but as to persons foreign to both, the disability was fully recognised.

Under the confederation, the power of removing the disability by naturalization belonged exclusively to the States. On the cession of territory to the United States, Congress had the same power in relation to the territories of the United States that was possessed by the States within their territories, and under that power a question arises whether Congress authorized foreigners to vote in territorial elections.

The ordinance of 1784 authorized the States formed under it to adopt the constitution of any of the old States, which, when adopted, would have given the power of naturalization prescribed in it.

On the 10th May, 1786, a committee of Congress (consisting of Messrs. Monroe, Johnson, Pinkney, King, McKean, and Henry) reported an ordinance for the temporary government of the new States, in which was the following provision relating to the qualification of electors:

"Provided, also, That a freehold or life estate in fifty acres of land, if a citizen of any of the United States, and one year's residence if a foreigner, shall be necessary to qualify a man as an elector for said representative" (in the General Assembly.)

September 19, 1786.—The same was again reported by Messrs. Johnson, Pinkney, Smith, Dane, and Henry.

This was considered from time to time, and was assigned for a third reading for May 10, 1787, and the above provision amended by striking out one and inserting two, so as to read, "and two years' residence if a foreigner." On the 9th July, 1787, this report was referred to Messrs. Carrington, Dane, Lee, McKean, and Smith, who reported the ordinance of 1787.

In the ordinance of July 13, 1787, the proviso was altered so as to read—

"Provided, also, That a freehold of fifty acres of land in the district, having been a citizen of one of the States, and being resident in the district, or the like freehold and two years' residence in the district, shall be necessary to qualify a man as an elector of a representative."

It will be asked, why was this alteration made? Why was the word foreigner stricken out, and general words inserted, unless it were to exclude foreigners from voting? And, on the other side, it may be asked, what persons can be intended by those general words, if foreigners are not? Without expressing any opinion on this question, I shall, for the sake of the argument, take it for granted that the ordinance did authorize foreigners to vote.

This part of the ordinance was not a part of the compact, and was therefore liable to be modified or repealed by Congress, and consequently conferred no absolute right of citizenship. Though, under the confederation, the citizens of one State were entitled to the privileges of citizens in the other States, yet it carried with it but little political importance. The vote of an elector could not have any effect on the political power of any State other than that in which it was given. It was therefore left to each State to adopt its own rules of naturalization. When, however, a form of government was about to be adopted, in which the vote of an elector in one State might affect the political power of every State in the Union, when his vote might consequently elect a President of the United States, it became of the first importance that the rule of naturalization should be uniform. There was also the highest reason for its uniformity, from the adoption of the principle that citizens of one State should be entitled to the privileges of citizens in the other States. On these grounds the fourth clause of the eighth section of the first article was adopted, giving Congress power "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization."

On the adoption of the constitution, all who were citizens of any of the United States became citizens of the United States, entitled to equal political rights; but when Congress executed the power, and established a uniform rule of naturalization, no foreigner could claim in any State political rights without being naturalized according to that rule. The principle, however, has not been considered as extending to the Territories. Political rights granted to persons in Territories confer no rights of citizenship which they can claim in a State; and the votes given in a Territory, so long as they refer only to the local legislation of the Territory, cannot affect the political power of any State.

The privilege of extending to foreigners the right of voting for representatives of the Territorial Legislature has been extended to the election of delegates of the conventions for forming State constitutions.

In the act of 1802, for the formation of the constitution of Ohio, the persons entitled to vote were "all male citizens of the United States, of full age, resident within the Territory for one year, having paid a territorial or county tax, and all persons having in other respects the legal qualifications to vote for representatives in the General Assembly of the Territory." The latter clause must refer to the provisions in the ordinance of 1787, before stated.

The acts of 3d March, 1811, and 20th May, 1812, extend the right of suffrage in Indiana and Illinois to every free white male person of the age of twenty-one, who shall have paid a county or territorial tax, and resided one year in the Territory. The acts of 19th April, 1816, and 18th April, 1818, authorizing the elections of conventions to form constitutions in those States, authorize every free white male citizen of the United States, &c., and all persons having in other respects the legal qualifications to vote for representative, to vote for delegates of the convention.

Thus aliens have been permitted to vote for delegates to the conventions for forming the constitutions of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. But would Congress, in the case of Michigan, have allowed aliens to vote?

The act of 1805, establishing the Territory of Michigan, secured to the inhabitants the same rights (of voting) that were granted by the ordinance of 1785.

The act of 16th February, 1819, authorizing that Territory to send a delegate to Congress, conferred the right of suffrage to free white male citizens of the Territory, who had resided one year therein next preceding the election, and had paid a county or territorial tax.

The act of 3d March, 1823, which virtually repealed all prior acts relating to the rights of suffrage, provides "that all citizens of the United States having the qualifications presented by the act" of 16th February, 1819, "shall be entitled to vote at any public election in said Territory, and shall be eligible to any office therein," virtually repealing all former acts.

Thus, at the time of calling the convention for the formation of the constitution of Michigan, it was the fundamental law of that Territory that none but citizens of the United States, who had resided in the Territory one year next preceding the election, and had paid a county or territorial tax, should be entitled to vote.

There were several reasons for this law, as applied to Michigan, which did not apply to either of the three States. The Territory of Michigan, on its whole settled frontier, was contiguous to a foreign thickly settled country, and where that was not the case with either of the other States; and it was necessary to change the law so as to prevent such foreign population, usually transported across the line, from voting at our elections. Yet, in the face of this law of the land, the Territorial Legislature has authorized foreigners to vote, and who had resided in the Territory only twenty-two days previous to the passage of the act. The act was passed on the 26th day of January, 1835. In the second section the qualification of voters is prescribed:

"Sec. 2. That the free white male inhabitants of the said Territory above the age of twenty-one years, who shall reside therein three months immediately preceding Saturday, the 4th day of April next, in the year one thousand eight hundred and thirty-five, be, and they are hereby, authorized to choose delegates to form a convention, who shall be elected in the several districts as follows, to wit."

Would Congress have passed an act of this description? If not, will they sanction it? The act is a fraud on the rights of the citizens of the United States in that Territory. Why was the 4th of January fixed as the last day? I shall not answer the question.

The constitution, then, is the result of foreign votes, and accounts for that objectionable clause in it which naturalizes those foreigners who thus secured the victory.

The constitution of Michigan was signed on the 24th June, 1835, and contains the following article:

"ARTICLE II.—Electors.—1. In all elections, every white male citizen above the age of twenty-one years, having resided in the State six months next preceding any election, shall be entitled to vote at such election; and every white male inhabitant of the age aforesaid, who may be a resident of this State at the time of the signing of this constitution, shall have the right of voting as aforesaid."

Thus every foreigner of the age of 21, who resided in the Territory on the 24th day of December, is naturalized by this article of the constitution, and clothed, in express terms, with the highest political privilege of a citizen of the United States.

Under a constitution thus formed, and containing this unconstitutional article, I cannot consent to admit Michigan into the Union.

III. Objection to the bill.

The next position is, that it is not competent for the convention, as proposed to be called, to ratify the boundaries named in this bill.

1. It supposes the constitution, under authority of which it is to be called, to be valid. Foreigners will be entitled to vote for members of the convention, and they will naturalize themselves even in an additional section of territory.

2. It calls on a portion of territory which is to be excluded from the State to vote on a fundamental law of the State, not only in excluding themselves from the State, but also in excluding others: they may have a casting vote.

3. It permits a convention, called by a defined territory, to make a constitution for a territory not represented in the convention that formed it. Should all the territory west of Michigan lake (that is proposed to be added) vote against being added, still the major vote of the peninsula may carry the question, and force them to become part of a State, and under a constitution in the formation of which they had no vote.

2d. The last position is, that Congress cannot, by an act of legislation, admit Senators and Representatives to seats in Congress. It belongs to each House separately to determine questions concerning the election of its members; and in the present case the Representative was not elected under any law. He derives his election from the ratification of the constitution, under the authority of this bill.

What is to be gained by this precipitate admission of Michigan? If the act passes, it cannot be represented during the present session. There is ample time to pass an act for forming a constitution, and authorizing an election of a Representative under it; for forming a constitution and electing Senators and a Representative in season to take a seat at an early day next session.

do, in behalf of the United States, accept the cession made by the State of New York, as contained in the instrument of writing executed for that purpose by the agents of New York, dated — day of — last past, and now upon the files of Congress; and that the President do take the proper measures to have the same legally authenticated and registered in the public records in the State of New York.

The reasons that induced your committee to recommend the acceptance of this cession are—

1st. It appeared to the committee that all the lands belonging to the Six Nations, or their tributaries, have been, in due form, put under the protection of England by the said Six Nations, as appendant to the late Government of New York, so far as respects jurisdiction only. (Vide Minutes of Council of New York, 1686 to 1760, and paper annexed, No. 2.)

2d. That the citizens of the said colony of New York have borne the burden, both as to blood and treasure, of protecting and supporting the said Six Nations and their tributaries for upwards of a hundred years last past, as the dependents and allies of the said Government; that the Crown of England has always considered and treated the country of the said Six Nations and their tributaries, inhabitants, as far as the 45th degree of north latitude, appendant to the Government of New York.

3d. That the neighboring colonies of Massachusetts, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Virginia, have also, from time to time, by their public acts, recognised and admitted the said Six Nations and their tributaries to be appendant to the Government of New York.

4th. That by Congress accepting this cession, the jurisdiction of the whole western territory, belonging to the Six Nations and their tributaries, will be vested in the United States, greatly to the advantage of the Union.

Resolved, That Congress do earnestly recommend to the States of Massachusetts and Connecticut, that they do, without delay, release to the United States in Congress assembled their claims, and pretensions of claims, to the said western territory, without any conditions or restrictions whatever.

Resolved, That Congress cannot, consistent with the interest of the United States, the duty they owe to their constituents, or the rights necessarily vested in them as the sovereign power of the United States, accept of the cession proposed to be made by the State of Virginia, or guaranty the tract of country claimed by them in their act of cession referred to your committee.

Reasons.

1st. It appeared to your committee, from the vouchers laid before them, that all the lands ceded or pretended to be ceded to the United States by the State of Virginia, are within the claims of the States of Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New York, being part of the lands belonging to the said Six Nations of Indians and their tributaries.

2d. It appeared that a great part of the lands claimed by the State of Virginia, and requested to be guarantied to them by Congress, is also within the claim of the State of New York, being also part of the country of the said Six Nations and their tributaries.

3d. It also appeared that a large part of the lands first aforesaid are to the westward of the western boundary line of the late colony of Virginia, established by the King of Great Britain in council, previous to the present Revolution.

4th. It appeared that a large tract of the said lands hath been legally and equitably sold and conveyed away under the Government of Great Britain, before the declaration of independence, by persons claiming the absolute property thereof.

5th. It appeared that in the year 176—, a very large part thereof was separated and appointed for a distinct Government and colony by the King of Great Britain, with the knowledge and approbation of the Government of Virginia.

6th. The conditions annexed to the said cession are incompatible with the honor, interests, and peace of the United States, and therefore, in the opinion of your committee, altogether inadmissible.

Resolved, That it be earnestly recommended to the State of Virginia, as they value the peace, welfare, and increase of the United States, that they reconsider their said act of cession, and, by a proper act for that purpose, cede to the United States all claims and pretensions of claims to the lands and country beyond a reasonable western boundary, consistent with their former acts while a colony under the power of Great Britain, and agreeably to their just rights of soil and jurisdiction at the commencement of the present war, and that free from any conditions and restrictions whatever.

When Mr. EVERETT had concluded,

Mr. HOWARD followed at some length.

Mr. BOND spoke at some length, in reply to the gentleman from Maryland.

[Pending this discussion, the committee temporarily rose, and the House considered and concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the Indian appropriation and annuity bill.]

The debate was continued by Messrs. HARPER, LOVE, and SPANGLER.

Mr. ADAMS took the floor, and spoke at length in opposition to the boundary as proposed in the bill.

Mr. CORWIN followed in reply.

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY spoke in support of the amendment.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, addressed the committee in opposition to that part of the bill which establishes the boundary.

Mr. VINTON followed in support of the amendment offered by him.

Mr. HAMER then rose and addressed the Chair as follows.

Mr. Chairman: I had hoped to avoid the necessity of engaging in the discussion upon the subjects now before the House; but I cannot, in justice to the State which I have the honor in part to represent, any longer remain a silent listener to the debates which are progressing around me. These questions have been so long pending before us, that it might well be supposed every gentleman was prepared to vote without further investigation; and at this late period of the session, with such a mass of unfinished business upon our tables, votes are much more important to the public interest than long speeches. Indeed, there is so much speaking here, and so little business done, that I often refrain from addressing the House, when I would otherwise do so, and when, like others, I am inclined to think I have something to offer that would be either interesting to the House, or calculated to throw light upon the subject before us. Upon the present occasion, however, the argument has taken a turn that requires of me an expression of my views, though it is not my design to enter into an elaborate examination of all the topics which have been ingrafted upon this debate.

It must be manifest to all who have witnessed the several movements in regard to this dispute between Ohio and the Federal Government, (for we do not recognise Michigan as a party to the controversy,) that there is somewhat of party politics mingled with it, both here and at home, among the people of Ohio. An overwhelming majority of the citizens of our State are for the boundary claimed by us, and they have no disposition to let party have any connexion with this claim; but the politicians have not taken exactly the same view of it, and some of them, it is very clear, have endeavored to turn it to account in the political struggles which now agitate the country.

The effect is visible here. Our delegation are unanimous for the claim of Ohio. We all go for the boundary; yet in arriving at the object of our hopes and wishes, we disagree materially upon various incidental questions. It is this disagreement which is the occasion in part of my now obtruding myself upon the attention of the House. I desire to be fully understood in my position; and then all, who have a right to know my sentiments, will be able to approve or disapprove of the course I have adopted.

It is not necessary for me to meddle with the difficulties between some of my colleagues and their quondam friend [Mr. ADAMS] from Massachusetts. I leave him in their hands. They are fully competent to take care of him, and to vindicate themselves from aspersions or misrepresentations which may come from that, or from any other quarter. My business is with other branches of the controversy.

There are three bills before the committee; the first, a bill merely to settle the boundary; the second, a bill to settle the boundary and to admit Michigan into the Union; and the third, a bill to admit Arkansas into the Union. The first one we have laid on the table, to remain there until the other two are disposed of. The whole delegation from Ohio, except one, voted against laying that bill on the table; but they were overruled by a majority of the House. With the motives of my colleague, who differed with us, I have nothing to do; nor shall I attempt to assign reasons for his vote. No doubt his motives were pure and his reasons satisfactory to himself; and he is very competent to defend his own course, either here or elsewhere. But of the vote of my colleagues, friends of the administration and myself, who voted against the motion to lay on the table, I have something to say. It is due to ourselves that our reasons should be known.

It is a good general rule in legislation, that each measure should stand upon its own merits, unconnected with every thing else. If good, let it prevail; if bad, let it be defeated. We applied that rule to the boundary bill. We were of opinion that a large majority of the House were in favor of the boundary claimed by Ohio, and that if this proposition stood alone, it would pass without much difficulty. But when it is connected with the admission of Michigan into the Union, we are by no means so certain of its success. There is a strong party in this House apparently determined to keep Michigan out of the Union during the present session. If they succeed, and our boundary question is connected with Michigan, it must necessarily share the same fate. This would be disastrous to Ohio. Her public works are suspended for a settlement of this question. Her interests, pride, and feeling, are deeply involved in it. Her people are impatient to see it terminated. A border war is lowering upon our northern frontier; and the moment Congress shall adjourn, without adjusting this dispute, it will break out with a train of outrages and bloodshed, that must be profoundly deplored by every man who loves his country. Myself, and those with whom I act, thought it imprudent, under these circumstances, to risk the fate of our boundary, by voluntarily attaching it to another question—the admission of a new State into the Union. We preferred having our bill first acted upon, and after that we were entirely willing to see the State admitted. We do not oppose her. The people of Ohio do not oppose her. We only object to her coming into the Union, and bringing a part of the territory of Ohio along with her, claiming it as parcel of the new State. This we oppose, and ever shall, whilst we have the sagacity to comprehend our rights, and the spirit to maintain them.

I come to the bill which is more immediately before us. It is a bill of several sections. The first section declares, expressly, that the boundary of Ohio shall be by a direct line running from the most southerly extreme of Lake Michigan to the most northerly cape of the Miami bay; being the line always claimed by Ohio, and the one named in her constitution. The subsequent sections prescribe the limits of the new State of Michigan, and require her to meet in convention, and agree to the limits so prescribed, before she shall be admitted into the Union; and, on her giving her assent, the President, by proclamation, is to declare her one of the independent States of this confederacy, entitled to all the privileges of the Union under the federal constitution. My colleague [Mr. VINTON] proposes to amend this bill, by adding a proviso, declaring that if Michigan should not assent to these new boundaries, still the northern line of Ohio shall be and remain as described in this bill. I am constrained to vote against this amendment. The reasons that influence me in doing so shall be briefly given.

It was with great difficulty this bill passed through the Senate. No opposition was manifested to that part of it which fixed our boundary, but there was violent resistance shown to the admission of the State. If the bill were now in that body, it is extremely doubtful whether it could be got through. We all know these things; the newspapers have informed us of their existence, in addition to the other sources of information which we possess. If we amend the bill in the slightest degree, it must go back to the Senate for their concurrence. Suppose they refuse to concur, or that they refuse to act on the bill this session, and let it remain on their files among the unfinished business, what will be our condition? How shall we avoid the alarming evils which are now impending over us, or meet the storm of public indignation that will burst forth against Congress for this unjustifiable procedure? I, for one, am not willing to meet it, nor am I willing to share any portion of the responsibility. I cannot, therefore, vote for any amendment to this bill, thereby creating the necessity to send it back to the Senate, and risking its final passage, unless that amendment be absolutely necessary to its validity. Such is not the case with this amendment; and I will now proceed to show that its adoption can be of no advantage to Ohio, in any respect whatsoever.

In the first section it is declared, in the most unqualified terms, that the northern line of Ohio shall be as we claim it. In the subsequent sections it is provided that Michigan may come into the Union upon her assenting to this line, and to the boundaries assigned to her by this bill. If the bill passes, and receives the sanction of the President, it will be a law, in all its parts. Whether Michigan shall comply with the condition or not, upon which she is allowed to come into the Union, is a matter of perfect indifference, so far as the validity of the law is concerned. If she complies, she will come in; if not, she will remain out; but, in either event, the law still stands in full force. Her failure to comply with its conditions cannot annul the law, or affect a single provision it contains. All that can be said is, that the law contains a provision with which the State has not complied; and the only consequence that follows is, that she remains out of the Union. The law itself remains wholly unimpaired.

But the conditions of this law are not in the first section; nor have they any necessary connexion with it. The subsequent sections may all be annulled, and still the first one will remain in full force. It is the first one alone in which we have any peculiar interest. It settles our boundary permanently, without condition or limitation. No subsequent section, nor any proceedings of Michigan under it, can affect our rights which are thus secured. To make this plain, I will illustrate my views by one or two cases. Suppose a law passed at the present session, giving to the State of Connecticut one hundred thousand dollars, in full for all her claims upon the General Government for revolutionary services, debts paid, men furnished, &c., during our struggle for independence. Attached to this law is a section providing that Massachusetts shall also receive one hundred thousand dollars from the Treasury of the United States, upon condition that her Legislature will pass an act relinquishing all other claims, and receiving this sum in full satisfaction of all her demands against the General Government. It is an easy matter to combine two such subjects in the same law; and it is not unfrequently done. Suppose, then, Massachusetts should refuse to pass the act required, or to accept the money in satisfaction of her claim, would that prevent Connecticut from getting her money out of the Treasury? We all know it would not. Her claim would be safe. No act of another State could affect it. She would send an authorized officer to receive it, and the funds would be delivered to him without asking, or caring, what had been done by Massachusetts in reference to her claims.

Again: we have now a proposition before this House, to recharter the several banks in this District. If we were to pass a law containing several sections, and in the first section should renew the charter of the Metropolis Bank, without any condition or limitation, simply declaring that it is rechartered for the term of fifteen years; and in the subsequent sections should renew the other charters, upon condition that a certain bonus, say fifty thousand dollars each, should be paid into the Treasury by the 1st day of September next—and if not paid then, the charters should expire—how could this condition affect the Metropolis Bank? It would be rechartered, and would proceed to transact business without regard to the course the other banks might think proper to pursue. Whether they should accept or reject the conditions imposed on them by Congress would be a question of no interest to the Bank of the Metropolis. The whole law would be valid and binding. So much of it as was conditional would be just as much a law as any other part of it. Those for whom the condition was intended could avail themselves of it or not, at their own pleasure. The law must remain, with its conditions, in full force—an expression of the sovereign will, and obligatory upon the citizens of the republic. The approbation or disapprobation of those who are allowed to benefit themselves by its provisions can derogate nothing from its authority or supremacy.

How can the present case be distinguished from those I have stated? Here is a bill of several sections, and the first one establishes our boundary in the strongest language that can be employed in legislation. No condition, no qualification, is attached to it. Subsequent sections declare that a new State may be admitted into the Union upon certain specified conditions. Now, whether these conditions are acceded to or not, whether the State shall come in or not, is a totally separate and distinct question from the one settled in the first section of the bill. Our line is permanently and unchangeably established, and no future movement of either Michigan, Congress, or any other power, can shake or invalidate its location.

With this view of the subject, I cannot vote for my colleague's amendment. It will endanger the passage of the bill, by sending it back to the Senate; and it is unnecessary, because the bill already contains all that Ohio wants. In attempting to obtain more, we may lose what is already offered, and is within our reach. Let us adhere to the bill as it is, and arrive at a final arrangement of this delicate and vexed question, which has already agitated our whole country to an alarming extent, and threatened at one time to involve our frontier citizens in a border war, in which many valuable lives must have been lost, and a stain inflicted upon the character of our free institutions which time could not have effaced.

Before any thing is said of the merits of our claim, it is proper that I should notice an argument presented by the gentleman from Rhode Island, [Mr. PEARCE.] He took it upon himself, in a very cool and self-complacent manner, to denounce our pretensions as utterly groundless, and hoped Congress would not act so unjustly towards others as to concede to Ohio what we believe to be her right, according to every known principle of equity and justice. He seemed highly delighted with one idea upon this subject, which he pressed upon our consideration with some ability and a great deal of earnestness. He asked, with an air of triumph, "If Ohio believes her cause to be just, why does she not allow Michigan to come into the Union, and then submit the question to be tried and decided by the Supreme Court of the United States?" Is it possible that such doctrine is to be urged here, in the House of Representatives, in such a discussion, and in the present advanced stage of political science? Are the old doctrines of judicial supremacy about to be revived? Is this all-grasping and dangerous department, which has done more than any other department of the Government to fritter away the rights of the States, about now to be vested with authority to decide upon the political rights of sovereign communities? Is the jurisdiction of a State to be held subject to the order of a federal judge, and the highest attributes of sovereignty to be controlled by a decree in chancery? Is this democracy? It may be so in Rhode Island, but I can assure the gentleman it is not so in the West. Ohio acknowledges no right in the Supreme Court to try such questions; she will never submit to such a mode of determination. It is a legislative question, and not a judicial one. Here is the place to determine it. Congress has only to relinquish the claim of the Federal Government to the country in dispute, and there is an end of all controversy. If the court had authority to try the cause, how unwise and impolitic would it be for us to send it there! Why not put a quietus to it at once, instead of having a long and tedious lawsuit about it. When a word can place the parties where they ought to be, shall we endeavor to shift the responsibility from our own shoulders, and throw it upon the court? There it may remain for years; and, in the mean time, our public works are unfinished; property sinks to half price; improvements are retarded; there are conflicting laws and jurisdictions over the inhabitants, and perpetual quarrels among the citizens along the border. Why voluntarily produce this state of things, when it is so easily avoided?

But there is a much more serious consideration still, which ought not to be overlooked by a wise statesman. No case of this kind has ever been decided by the Supreme Court. In the case of New York and New Jersey they agreed to exercise jurisdiction, so far as to require the defendant to appear, and to progress with the cause; but they expressly left the question open to the last, whether they could finally decide such a case between two States or not. The cause was settled by the parties, and never decided by the court. Since that time another case has arisen, in which the court has in the same manner assumed jurisdiction, and the case is now pending. Let them proceed in this way without objection, and in a few years this power, so dangerous to the States, will ripen into perfect maturity. For one, I desire to enter my solemn protest against it. Suppose, however, that the court should go on to a final hearing of the cause, and when this action of ejectment, or bill in chancery between two sovereign States, is determined, one or both should refuse to abide by the decision; what would be done? How would your court enforce its decree? By what means would it turn one party out of possession, and put the other in? Every man who hears me knows it could not be done. Process may be issued against an individual, or a number of individuals, and obedience to the mandates of a court enforced; but no such proceeding can be tolerated against a State. Where would the marshal find a posse sufficient to compel any of the States, especially one of the larger class, to yield possession of her territory, and have it transferred to a neighbor? If she chose to submit to it, very well; but if she did not, there is no way to compel her but by arms. You must fight her. Are you prepared to do this? Are we ignorant of the political axiom, that our Government is held together by moral influences alone? It is not a Government of physical powers. In monarchies and aristocracies, armed men sustain the Government. It is not so here. Moral power, public opinion, mutual concessions and compromises, hold our confederacy together. Abandon these and resort to force, and your boasted Union, the proudest, loftiest, and purest temple of civil liberty that ever existed, will be crushed in an instant, and its scattered fragments be swept away, like straws upon the surface of a torrent.

What man here desires to see our institutions subjected to such a test? Who wishes to aid in trying such an experiment upon their stability? If the decrees of your court are once successfully resisted, what regard will ever be paid to them afterwards? Away, then, with all such doctrines and schemes to break down the Judiciary, or to shift responsibility from ourselves. Let us come up like men; examine the question, and dispose of it according to the best of our information and the dictates of an impartial judgment. We have been implored for many years to adjust this difficulty. Here, then, let it be done. Our decisions command confidence and esteem, and they carry a moral influence with them that is almost irresistible. It is seldom that any community will attempt to resist them; when they do, all must be conscious that they assume a most fearful responsibility.

The grounds of our claim have been so often stated to this House, and they are so fully and ably set forth in the lucid report of the honorable gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. THOMAS,] that it is scarcely necessary to detain the committee at this time by a labored argument upon the subject. But our rights have been so much misunderstood, and so much misrepresented, that I will briefly remind gentlemen of some points upon which we rely. It should be distinctly understood that we are not mendicants petitioning Congress to grant us a donation, but we are demanding what is ours by compact; we ask a recognition of our claim on the part of Congress, so that their tenants or wards may no longer disturb our possession. We allege that a contingency has occurred that entitles us to the line we claim, and we ask Congress to acknowledge the existence of that contingency, and to relinquish all demand on their part to the territory within the new line. We ask the Federal Government to declare expressly what they have already declared impliedly. When we came into the Union, it was agreed and understood, that if a due east line from the southerly bend of Lake Michigan would not give us Maumee bay, then we should have a line running from the southerly bend of the lake to the most northerly cape of Maumee bay; so that the bay was to be ours at all events. Now, we know that the due east line first mentioned will not give us the bay. Congress knows it also, for their officer has so reported. We say it is plain that, according to the original understanding when we came into the Union, we are entitled to the other line, which gives us the bay. Congress is asked to admit this, in so many words: that we may have peaceable possession of the country, and be no longer harassed by other authorities, pretending to claim under Congress, and to be clothed with power to punish our people and drive away our public officers

Is this unreasonable? Is this asking a gift from you? It is asking you to be honest, and to do what every good citizen would do voluntarily. A bad one would be compelled to do it by the civil authorities. It remains to be seen whether the Federal Government will follow the example of a good citizen, and honestly fulfil its contracts; or disgrace itself in the eyes of the civilized world, by refusing a simple act of justice to one of the States of this Union.

Every gentleman, either in or out of Congress, who has attempted to argue the question in behalf of Michigan, has gone back to the ordinance of Congress adopted in 1787. They seem to rely upon this document as the foundation of their claims, and thus go behind the compact between Ohio and the General Government, formed in 1803, of which I have just been speaking. It is supposed that Michigan derives her rights from that ordinance; and, consequently, no act of Congress in 1802 or 1803, or of any subsequent period to 1817, could at all affect her interests. A more radical or material error could not well have been adopted. Michigan is not known in the ordinance of 1787. She has no vested rights under it; nor is she one of the States named in it, which is entitled to come into the Union whenever there are sixty thousand inhabitants within her limits. This assertion of right has been repeated so often in her behalf, by persons who have either never read the ordinance, or had not sense enough to understand it when they did read it, that hundreds now believe it, and will not be persuaded to the contrary. Yet it is not true; she never had any such right; and Congress can now, under the ordinance, cut up Michigan, and divide her between Ohio and Indiana, and never admit her into the Union. We do not desire any such thing; we believe she ought to come into the Union; but we cannot admit that she has any vested rights upon the subject. A careful examination of the ordinance will prove that we are correct in our opinions.

It is not necessary to explore all the ancient charters granted by the British Crown, to ascertain who among the several States of the old thirteen had the best title to the country northwest of the Ohio river, or whether any of them possessed a right to it, other than the common title which they all gained by conquest, and which was recognised by the treaty of peace with Great Britain in 1783. Whether the Federal Government derived its title from this treaty, or from the cessions of Virginia and other States, who made deeds to it for their respective claims, is a matter of perfect indifference. They had become the exclusive owners of both soil and jurisdiction at the time of passing this ordinance. I do not speak of the Indian claims, nor of small tracts of the country owned by others, because they have no connexion with the point now under consideration.

By the ordinance of 1787, the whole country northwest of the Ohio is divided into three States, running from the Ohio river on the south to the great chain of lakes on the north. Each of these States was to be entitled to admission into the Union whenever it should have sixty thousand inhabitants, or sooner, if circumstances would allow. The right, however, to come into the Union, upon having that number of inhabitants, was a vested right, of which they could not justly be deprived. These three States, now known by the names of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, covered the whole country, including the present Territories of Michigan and Wisconsin. Had there been no other provisions in the ordinance in regard to a subdivision of States, or no further legislation by Congress in reference to such divisions, we should have been spared the present difficulty. Ohio and Indiana would now cover the whole of Michigan, whilst Indiana and Illinois would possess the entire Territory of Wisconsin.

H. OF R.]

Michigan and Arkansas.

But the ordinance provided, further, that the boundaries of those three States should be subject so far to be altered, that if Congress should thereafter find it expedient, they should have authority to form one or two States in that part of said territory which lay north of an east and west line drawn through the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan. Here is no creation of additional States; but there is authority given to Congress to create one or two more, if they should ever think it expedient. If they should not think it expedient, then the three States remain as they were marked out and bounded by the ordinance, and will necessarily run clear through to the Canada line. The case is easily understood. No one can mistake its true position.

Not only every lawyer, but every man of common sense, will perceive there are but two ways in which the boundaries of these three States can be changed. One is by compact or agreement with Congress; and the other is by an act of Congress under the ordinance, creating one or two new States in that part of the country lying north of an east and west line drawn through the southerly bend of Lake Michigan. In one of these two modes, only, could their lines and corners be changed. Their rights were secured by the ordinance; but they might consent to an alteration, or Congress might make a change without their consent, by making new States, but in no other way whatsoever. I defy any gentleman to devise any other means of changing a single line or corner, besides the two I have named. It is important that we should keep this proposition distinctly before us during the present investigation. We shall see, presently, how the frail tenements of some gentlemen will tumble down about their heads. It is well for them that their superstructures are of light materials, or the fall might be followed by very serious consequences.

It will not be pretended by any one, that Congress has ever created a State in the country lying north of the east and west line named in the ordinance. Territories are not States. Will a member of this House contend that the erection of a Territory is the creation of a State, within the meaning of the proviso? To such a gentleman I have no arguments to address. All attempts to convince him would be useless; and I shall not trouble myself to assail him in his stronghold. If no State has been established by which the boundaries of Ohio have been changed, then she still extends to the Canada line, unless her limits have been altered by compact. These, it must be remembered, are the only modes in which a change can take place. What are the facts in reference to this question?

In 1802, when Congress passed a law authorizing Ohio to form a constitution, preparatory to her admission into the Union, the Federal Government proposed by that act a change of boundaries for Ohio; binding her on the north by a line due east from the southerly bend of Lake Michigan. It was entirely optional with Ohio to accept or reject this proposition. Suppose she had rejected it, what would have been the consequence? Nothing in the world except that she might have been kept out of the Union until she had 60,000 free inhabitants, and then they would have been compelled to admit her. She would have come in, too, with her boundaries running through to the Canada line, unless Congress had made a new State to prevent it. A Territory would not have answered the purpose.

Ohio could not only accept or reject this proposition, absolutely, but she might accept it with modifications or conditions. She did the latter. When her convention met, they agreed to accept the boundary proposed to them by Congress, provided, when the east line should be run, it would give them the Maumee bay; but if it did not, then they declared that line should not be accepted as their boundary, nor binding upon the State as such; but their line should run from the southerly bend of Lake Michigan to the most northerly cape of Maumee bay. Here was a proposition made by Congress to change the line; the State accepted it upon condition, and returned this acceptance to Congress with her constitution; Congress made no objection to the conditional acceptance, but ratified the constitution, and admitted the State into the Union. Who can misunderstand the rights of the parties under such circumstances? They are too palpable to be misconceived for a moment. The State yields all her claim to the country north of a line drawn from the southerly bend of Lake Michigan to the north cape of Maumee bay, and she yields nothing more. She agrees, however, that if a due east line from the southerly bend of the lake will give her the bay, then she will yield all the country north of that line. The line which is to be her true boundary is not fixed, and cannot be, till the survey is made; but one or the other is to be her limit, according as the bay shall be included, or excluded, by the due east line.

The fatal error which pervades all the reasoning of the friends of Michigan is, that they look upon Congress as having the right to prescribe limits to Ohio, in the act of 1802. It is no such thing. Congress did not attempt to assign to Ohio any boundary, other than the one fixed in the ordinance, except by her own consent. Congress had no such power. The equitable and legal title were both vested in Ohio, to all the country through to the British line. There is no parallel between the case of Ohio and that of a State carved out of lands acquired west of the Mississippi. In the latter case, Congress lays out a State to suit its own views of propriety; but northwest of the Ohio the title was in the States, and not in the Federal Government. Hence, all that has been said about the equitable title to this disputed region being in Ohio, and the legal title in Michigan, or in the General Government, is wholly erroneous. It is an error springing from the supposition that the legal title was in Congress at the time Ohio came into the Union; whereas, since the ordinance of 1787, the legal title had never been in the Federal Government, but had remained in the State. She agreed to relinquish it upon a contingency; or rather she agreed to part with it, unless a contingency did happen; and then she would retain it. Very well: the contingency has happened. The line you proposed does not give us the bay, and we hold on to the cape line.

It may be asked, if we have never fully conveyed our title to the disputed jurisdiction; if both the legal and equitable title are in the State, why we ask Congress for any action upon the subject? I reply, that you have embarrassed our title and encumbered our possession. Believing that the east line would give us all we wanted, you have hastily legislated upon the subject; assumed jurisdiction, and allowed others, under color of your laws, to claim possession; and we ask you to set these things right, by withdrawing from it yourselves, and removing your tenants. We ask nothing more. This we have a right to expect, for it is but the dictate of common justice.

I do not wish to be understood here as giving sanction to the opinion, that in a question of jurisdiction like this, between two Governments, there is any distinction between legal and equitable rights. That is a distinction for courts, to be made and maintained among individuals. States and nations have nothing to do with it. Who ever heard of legal and equitable rights, arising out of a treaty or compact between France and England, or between any other independent nations? If no such distinction exists there, neither can it here; for except so far as powers have been granted by the federal constitution, the States of this Union are just as independent of each other, and of the Federal Government, as they are of any nation in Europe, or as the nations of Europe are of each other.

They have a right to enter into compacts and agreements, except such as are forbidden by the constitution; and unless that instrument has provided an arbiter to settle disputes arising from such compacts, then each party must judge for itself of the true construction to be given to the agreement; and if they differ, it can only be settled by compromise, as all the serious difficulties in our Government always have been and always will be settled. As to legal and equitable rights in such cases, in a dispute between the General Government and a State, where the constitution does not allow a suit to be brought, it is idle to talk about it. No action of trespass or ejectment, no bill in equity or writ of injunction, can be instituted or obtained by one of these parties against the other. It is a question between two sovereignties, with regard to the force, construction, and bearing of a solemn agreement, executed more than thirty years ago. Although the sovereignty of the States and of the General Government is strictly a limited sovereignty, yet, so far as this affair is concerned, there is no limitation; for it is a pact made which was literally within the scope of the powers respectively guarantied to them; and in all such matters they are supreme and sovereign. As to Michigan, she was no party to the original agreement; she has no vested rights under the ordinance, for she is not known in it, and she has never been laid off as a State under the authority reserved to Congress in 1787. Consequently, she is no party to this controversy; and the attempt to thrust her forward as a party, and then let the General Government in as a judge, to decide between us, is all a trick, which is too shallow to impose upon any sensible man's understanding. The Federal Government is an interested party, just as much so as Ohio; and it has no more or better right to decide this question than Ohio. True, it is stronger; and if power gives right, then it has it; but not otherwise.

No one has been so wild yet as to contend that Congress can alter the lines of one of the States of this Union. The territorial jurisdiction of each State is as far removed from the control of Congress as the regulation of her State revenue, or the modification of her poor laws. If Congress could at pleasure dismember a State; could cut off a few counties from one, and add them to another; then our liberties would indeed be held by a frail tenure.

Apply this principle to the case under consideration. In 1787, Congress, having a complete and perfect title, both to soil and jurisdiction, divided the country into three States, securing to them certain rights, and, among others, the right to come into the Union whenever either of them should have 60,000 inhabitants, and sooner, if convenient. Authority was reserved, at the same time, to alter their boundaries, by making one or two new States next to the Canada line, if Congress should at some future period think it expedient. In 1802, Ohio asked permission to come into the Union, and Congress granted it, approved of her constitution, and received her among the other States, upon terms of equality with the old thirteen. This was done, too, without Congress having cut off any part of Ohio for a new State; consequently, she came into the Union with all the territory given her by the ordinance, unless she consented to some alteration. To what did she consent? Why, Congress proposed to her a new limit for her northern boundary, instead of the Canada line, which was to be an east line from the southern bend of Lake Michigan. To this she never did assent, and of course it never was her true line. But she did agree to take it, provided, upon actual survey, it should give her the bay; and if not, then the line should be varied to the north from the starting place, so as to give her Maumee bay. Which of these two lines was to be her boundary, no one knew at the time she came into the Union. The due east one was the temporary line until a survey should be made; and Congress supposed, as did the people of Ohio generally, that this line would give us the bay. Hence, Congress made that the southern line of Michigan, surveyed public lands up to that line, and acted, in all respects, as if it were the settled boundary of the State. Hence, too, for several years, Ohio, as a State, took no particular interest in the matter, believing that the east line would give us all we wanted; but she never, for a moment, relinquished or abandoned her claim; and if gentlemen will look into the legislative action of Ohio upon this subject, they will find that it is no new question, nor has any new ground been assumed by the State. Instead of believing that it is a Van Buren and Harrison contest, or that we are taking advantage of Michigan just at the moment when she is coming into the Union, or that it is a case of the strong against the weak, they will find that we have been trying for thirty years to get this question adjusted; that nineteen twentieths of the people of Ohio entertain the same opinions with regard to our rights; that it is a case of the strong against the weak, for it is the General Government withholding from Ohio what is her just right; and that we are pressing our claim the more earnestly now, because, after this long delay, instead of granting us our claim, you tell us that we have none, and that the country belongs to Michigan. It is high time for us to be up and doing, under such circumstances.

There were further provisions in the compact between Ohio and the Federal Government in 1802-'3, when we came into the Union. Congress can no more add to, than it can take from, the territory of a State, without its consent. At the same time that they proposed this change in our northern line, and we accepted it upon condition, they imposed upon us another condition in regard to the country lying between us and the Canada line. Congress was not prepared, at that period, to say whether there ought ever to be one or two States formed in that region, agreeably to the reservation in the ordinance of 1787; and they reserved by law, when we came into the Union, the right to attach that whole country to Ohio, if they should think proper to do so at any future period. Ohio agreed to this, and came into the Union; and, notwithstanding all we have heard here and elsewhere about the vested rights of Michigan, Congress can to-morrow dissolve her Territorial Government, reject all her propositions to become a State, and attach her to the State of Ohio. It would break no compact, infringe upon no agreement, and violate no pledge of public faith, for none has ever been given that she should have a State Government, and be admitted into the Union. All the lamentations, therefore, which have been poured forth over the multiplied wrongs of Michigan, have been supplied by fountains possessing no real existence, and which can only be successfully sought for in the imagination of the mourners.

Congress have never decided, to this day, whether there shall be one or two States in the country along the British line or not. They have admitted the three original States of the ordinance into the Union, and by agreements with each one of them their limits have been curtailed, and the power retained by Congress to still extend them to the Canada frontier, if they think proper, by adding all Michigan and Wisconsin to them. We cannot object to it; nor can the Territories do so. We desire no such arrangement; it will never be made. But, in discussing rights, it is necessary to advert to these things to show how perfectly absurd are the arguments advanced here against Ohio.

The right of Congress to form one or two States in the country north of the line running through the southerly bend of Lake Michigan was perfect and indisputable. They could make one State or two, as they pleased. They could include the whole country north of that line in the State or States so formed; or they could occupy but a part of it, and attach the remainder to the three States bordering on the Ohio river. The States are to be created in the country, and not out of it; they may take the whole, or a part, as best suits the public convenience. Until recently, no one ever supposed that this line was immovable and impassable. Congress never so considered it; for they have run the northeast corner of Ohio thirty or forty miles beyond it; the northern boundary of Indiana is ten miles over it; and Illinois is stretched out north of it for some forty or fifty miles. The impassability of this line is an afterthought—a modern invention to warrant an encroachment upon the States already in the Union. Congress could, originally, before these States were admitted, have extended the fourth or fifth State entirely down to this due east line, because they had the whole country before them, and could form the States of such size and in such shape as they chose; or they might have stopped as far north of the line as seemed expedient, leaving the balance of the country to be attached to the other three States. But this authority no longer exists. By admitting the three States, before they exercised it, these States acquired rights of which Congress cannot deprive them. All attempts, therefore, to cut off a part of their territory, with a view of enlarging Michigan and Wisconsin, and making them in shape, size, and position, what it is supposed the Congress of 1787 intended they should be, are as unconstitutional and unwarrantable as it would be to separate a range of counties along the Ohio river, and attach them to Kentucky. The title of every State to all she brought into the Union, whether absolute or conditional, is as perfect upon her northern as upon her southern frontier, and the rights which Congress either waived or relinquished, at the time of admission, can never be resumed by a subsequent act of legislation.

I waive the examination of the equity of our claim, as it has been called, by insisting upon the understanding and expectation of all parties at the time of our admission, and the hopes encouraged by Congress that Ohio should have the bay. Neither will I attempt to prove that the one we claim is the natural boundary of our State, and that without it our public works and those of Indiana must terminate in another State, allowing them to levy tribute upon us forever, and building up a great city for them by our commerce, industry, and enterprise. I will not advert to maps then in existence, to prove that, at the time we came into the Union, according to all the most approved maps in the country, a line drawn due east from the southern bend of Lake Michigan would have given us the Maumee bay and a large scope of country farther north; so that we are not claim-in as much, by many miles, as we might ask for upon well-known principles of justice and equity. I pass by all these and many other considerations that might be urged upon the attention of the House, and plant my standard upon the compact. I rely upon the ordinance; upon the agreement at the time we entered the Union, and the survey, which proves that the east line does not give us the bay. These three constitute a title that all the sophists and declaimers in the world cannot shake. The ordinance gives us all the country to Canada; by the agreement we relinquish all of it down to the Maumee bay, retaining that within our limits; and by the survey we prove that the east line does not include the bay, thereby establishing our right to the cape line. Gentlemen may cavil as they please upon this question. The advocates of Michigan may seek to obscure it by arguments and sophistry; but the strong, bold, and prominent features of the case must strike every man with conviction, who will examine the facts and the laws for himself, instead of depending upon newspaper articles for information, or listening to the statements of those who are interested or prejudiced against the State of Ohio.

For my own part, I have studied this question carefully and attentively for years; and I do most conscientiously declare, in the sight of Heaven, that if this were a controversy between two individuals, and the one occupying the relation of the Federal Government were to refuse the other an act of justice such as that now demanded by Ohio, he would subject himself to the scorn and indignation of every honest man and good citizen in the whole community. It remains to be seen whether Congress will place itself in an attitude that would be disgraceful to a private citizen. If they come to that determination, they will, of course, make up their minds beforehand to assume the responsibility, and meet all the consequences of such an unjust and unfortunate decision.

I will detain the House no longer upon this branch of the subject, but pass on to some objections that have been offered to other parts of the bill. It is a great mistake to suppose that the people of Ohio are against the admission of Michigan, or Arkansas either, into this Union. Such is not the public sentiment of our State. We are anxious to have the boundary question settled, and settled correctly, before Michigan comes in; and our State has instructed us to oppose her admission until the difficulty is removed. But beyond that we have no wish to embarrass her; nor do we entertain a single unkind feeling towards her people, however we may disapprove the conduct of some of her public officers. I am for this bill, therefore, throughout. The State ought to be admitted. Not, to be sure, because she has a vested right to come in, but because they are our fellow-citizens, occupying a large, fertile, and valuable tract of country, already containing one hundred thousand inhabitants, and daily filling up with a free, industrious, enterprising, and respectable population, who ought to enjoy all the privileges that are granted to other American citizens. This they cannot do unless you give them a State government and admit them into the Union.

One of the principal objections urged against their admission at this time is, that their proceedings have been lawless and revolutionary; and that, for the example's sake, if for no other reason, we should reject their application, and force them to go back and do all their work over again. I cannot assent to this proposition.

Two ways are open to every Territory that desires to emerge from its dependent condition and become a State. It may either petition Congress for leave to form a State constitution, and, when that permission is given, proceed to form it, and present the new State constitution for our approbation; or they may meet, in the first instance, form the constitution, and offer it for our approval. There is no impropriety in either mode. It is optional with Congress, at last, to admit the State or not, as may be thought expedient. If they wish to admit her, they can do it by two acts of Congress; one to authorize the formation of a constitution, and the other to approve of it when made; or by one act, allowing the prayer of the petitioners to become a State, and approving of their constitution at the same time. This latter course is the one adopted in the present case. There is nothing disrespectful in it. Indeed, there is much to justify the Territory in its proceeding. Year after year they petitioned for leave to form a constitution, and it was refused, or their application was treated with neglect. Wearied with repeated instances of this treatment, they have formed a constitution, brought it to us, and asked us to sanction it, and admit them into the Union. We have the authority to do this; and if their constitution is republican, we ought to do it. There is no weight in this objection, and I will dismiss it without further remark.

It is said they have fixed the boundaries of the new State, making them a part of their constitution; and as this bill establishes different boundaries, there will be an incongruity in the proceedings, and all that part of our act will either be null and void, or it will be an alteration of a State constitution by law of Congress. It is supposed, too, that by their admission into the Union we sanction the constitution, and that it will become valid by relation back from the date of its existence; and the subsequent legislation of Congress will have no influence upon it. This is a subtle, lawyerlike objection, and seems to have some weight; but I will show that it is entitled to no consideration.

In the first place, they have fixed no boundaries for the State. Ohio, and most if not all of the new States, have described their boundaries expressly in their constitutions; but no such thing is attempted here. They say, "We, the people of the Territory of Michigan, do form ourselves into an independent State." It is the people living within that Territory who form themselves into a distinct political community; but the precise limits within which this new State or community is to exercise jurisdiction remains undefined, and to be settled thereafter. No boundaries being given, therefore, by the constitution, it is the province as well as the duty of Congress to prescribe them.

Will they be obligatory upon the people when they are prescribed? How can it be doubted? The bill before us requires the people of Michigan to elect delegates to a convention; who, upon meeting together, shall express and declare the assent of the people to these boundaries, and then they may be admitted into the Union, and not until then. How can there be any difficulty on the score of boundaries, if a new convention shall meet and assent to the alterations now made?

Let us look at the other objection, namely, that, by admitting the State, we sanction the constitution, and make it valid from the day of its date; and if so, our legislation will be inoperative. The first weak point in the objection is this: the law which we pass gives validity to the constitution, and yet, the moment life is infused into it, we are to suppose that it receives power to destroy the provisions of the law which called it into existence! This cannot be. Its life is derived from the law, and yet it destroys the law which imparts that life. Can the stream rise higher than its fountain? Can the creature overpower and destroy its creator, and still live and enjoy its faculties and powers unimpaired? Can an agent disobey his principal, violate his instructions, and rise above all his commands, and still bind him by his agreements, and claim to be acting under his authority? These things involve an absurdity too monstrous to admit of discussion. The constitution derives its authority, so far as the other States and Federal Government are concerned, entirely from the law of Congress. It is subject to such restrictions and modifications as the law may impose. It is now a dead letter, and must continue so forever, until it receives our sanction; and it will date its validity, as against all but its own citizens, from the time when that sanction is complete. Previous to that period, it is no more to Congress, to Ohio, or to any other State in the Union, than a piece of white paper. It is an instrument drawn up according to all the forms of law, lying upon the table, waiting for the parties to sign and seal it. Although it may be dated upon the 1st of January, yet if it be not executed till March, it takes effect only from the date of its execution.

Another objection is, that aliens have aided in making this constitution, and are allowed the right of suffrage in all elections by the provisions it contains. As to the first point, it is sufficient to say that all the new States northwest of the Ohio formed their constitutions precisely in the same way. The ordinance of 1787 does not require sixty thousand citizens of the United States to be resident within the limits of a new State, in order to authorize a constitution and admission into the Union.

It requires that number of "free inhabitants;" and the alien who resides there, if he be a "free inhabitant," is entitled to vote in the election of delegates to the convention; and afterwards in deciding whether the people will accept the constitution formed by their convention. Such has been the construction and practice in all the country north of the Ohio; and as the last census shows that there are but a few hundreds of aliens in Michigan, it would be hard to set aside their constitution, because some of these may have participated in its formation. It would be unjust to do so, if we had the power; but we have no authority to do it; for if we regard the ordinance as of any validity, it allows all "free inhabitants" to vote in framing the State governments which are to be created within the sphere of its influence. We will now turn to the remaining point in this objection, and we shall see that it has no more force in it than the other.

The constitution allows all white male citizens over twenty-one years of age, having resided six months in Michigan, to vote at all elections; and every white male inhabitant residing in the State at the time of signing the constitution is allowed the same privilege. These provisions undoubtedly confer on aliens the right of suffrage; and it is contended that they are in violation of the constitution of the United States. That instrument declares that "new States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union;" that "the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government;" and that "the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." The ordinance of 1787 provides that the constitution to be formed northwest of the Ohio "shall be republican."

It is an error not very uncommon to suppose that the right of suffrage is inseparably connected with the privilege of citizenship. A slight investigation of the subject will prove that this is not so. The privileges are totally distinct. A State cannot make an American citizen who, under the constitution of the United States, shall be entitled to the rights of citizenship throughout the Union. The power belongs to the Federal Government. We pass all the naturalization laws, by which aliens are transformed into citizens. We do so under the constitution of the United States, conceding to us this authority. But, on the other hand, we have no control over the right of suffrage in the different States. That belongs exclusively to State legislation and State authority. It varies in almost all the States; and yet who ever supposed that Congress could interfere to change the rules adopted by the people in regard to it? No one, I presume. Why then attempt to control it here? Other States have adopted the same provisions. Look at the constitutions of Ohio and other new States, and you will find that they require residence only, and not citizenship, to enable a man to vote. Each State can confer this right upon all persons within her limits. It gives them no rights beyond the limits of the State. It cannot make them citizens, for that would violate the naturalization laws; or, rather, it would render them nugatory. It cannot give them a right to vote in any other State, for that would infringe upon the authority of such State to regulate its own affairs. It simply confers the right of aiding in the choice of public officers whilst the alien remains in the State; it does not make him a citizen; nor is it of the slightest advantage to him beyond the boundaries of Michigan.

But it is said aliens may elect a member to this House; or elect members of the Legislature, who will elect Senators to the other House of Congress. True, they may do so; and how are we to prevent it? The federal constitution makes no provision upon this subject, except to declare that Representatives to this House shall be elected by "people," (not citizens,) who "have the

Michigan and Arkansas.

qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature." But the qualifications requisite to vote for the House of Representatives, or House of Commons, in each State, is left entirely to State regulation. If aliens are allowed to vote for members of this House, and the election shall be contested, it will be time enough then for us to enter at large into the question whether such votes shall be retained or rejected. For the present, it is enough for our purpose that there is nothing upon the face of this constitution that conflicts with that of the United States. Similar observations will apply to the case of a United States Senator. Who would think of contesting his seat, because a member of the State Legislature voted for him, who had himself been elected in part by aliens? No one, I apprehend, would carry his refinements upon principles of government quite that far; but if he should, the Senate will determine the contest when it is brought before them. We have nothing to do with it upon the present occasion. If this constitution does not set up a rule plainly at variance with the federal constitution, we are bound to receive it. All we can do is, to inquire if it be a republican constitution, and not inconsistent with the paramount law of the Union? The objection to this instrument seems to be that it is too republican; it extends the right of suffrage entirely too far to suit the views of certain gentlemen. It is seldom, nowadays, that we meet with an instrument of this solemn character, to which such an objection will apply. Most of them run to the opposite extreme, and instead of carrying out, practically, the great principle that man is capable of self-government, and can be safely intrusted with the management of his own affairs, their framers seem to have been solicitous to guard the people against themselves, and to curtail their powers and privileges as much as possible. I am glad to see a liberal spirit prevailing in Michigan. Their constitution is worthy of the age in which we live, and it would be well for some of the older members of the confederacy if they would follow the example which has been set by our younger sister.

One answer, however, may be given to all these objections to the constitution, which is conclusive. Suppose we refuse to admit the State until they meet and alter the constitution to please our tastes, or gratify our peculiar notions upon the subject, and we then admit them into the Union; what is there to hinder them, the next week after they are admitted, from calling a convention and changing the constitution back to the very same thing it is at present? Who can prevent it? Does not every State in the Union possess and exercise the right to alter her constitution when she pleases, and as she pleases; so that it still remains a republican form of government? All attempts at restriction upon these new States must be futile, so long as they, too, have this power to alter and amend. We cannot force them to any thing; and, if we intend to give advice, we had much better advise some of the old States to extend the right of suffrage, than to ask the people of Michigan to curtail it within her borders.

I will notice another objection I have heard urged to the bill. It declares that, upon the admission of the State, the Senators and Representative who have been elected by said State shall be entitled to take their seats here, without further delay. No persons are named; but the objectors take it for granted that Messrs. Lyon and Norvell, the two Senators, and Mr. Crary, the Representative, who are now here, are the individuals intended by this provision; and it is said that we are legislating them into their seats. If so, we are doing wrong; for the constitution of the United States guaranties to each House the right to judge of the elections and qualifications of its own members. Neither House has a right to say who shall take a seat in the other; and, consequently, no such question can be settled by a law, which is the act of both Houses, sanctioned by the President of the United States. All such laws would be palpable violations of the constitution.

If the phraseology of the bill is consulted, it will be perceived that it neither names any individuals who shall take seats in Congress, nor does it apply to persons who may be now claiming a right to take seats here, or to those who may have been heretofore elected by the people or Legislature of Michigan. It speaks of a state of things which is hereafter to exist, and not of the present time. When this bill is passed, and the convention of Michigan have approved of the boundaries given to the State, the President is to issue a proclamation declaring that she is admitted into the Union; and then the persons who shall present themselves here, claiming seats, if they have been elected, duly elected, will be entitled to take their places as members of the two Houses. But each House will judge for itself, whether they have been elected or not. No matter whether the gentlemen now here, under their present certificates of election, or under new ones, or some other individuals, sent here by the State, shall claim the seats; each House will examine their claims to membership, and receive or reject them, according to the dictates of their own understandings, without reference to this bill, or to any other that Congress could pass on the subject. Laws will have no influence upon the pretensions of any individual. They only confer a right upon the State to send members here. But the fact of the person who comes being constitutionally and properly sent, will be tried and decided by each House for itself. This is the only fair construction to be placed upon the language used in the bill. It might have been made more explicit. But when a law is even susceptible, fairly, of two constructions, that one should be given that is consistent with sound sense and with the constitution. If we adhere to this rule, there can be no possible difficulty in regard to the provision now under consideration.

There is no other objection which has been raised against this measure that I think it necessary to combat. I will say a word, in passing, with regard to Arkansas. She is equally entitled to admission with the other. Is her constitution republican? Who doubts it? Is this a time or place to discuss abstractions? If her constitution is not republican, then the constitutions of one half the States in the Union are not. Are we prepared to fan a flame that already burns with a strength and an ardor calculated to startle every patriot in the land? I am sure that a large majority of this House will frown down all attempts to produce an excitement that can do no possible good, and may be attended by evils of the most alarming character. You have given her a Territorial Government, and ingrafted institutions upon it by your own laws. She is on the southern side of the line drawn by the "compromise" of the "Missouri question." She has asked you repeatedly for leave to form a State Government, and you have neglected her, as you did Michigan. She has at length acted, and framed a constitution, which she respectfully asks you to accept and ratify, and allow her to come into the Union. How can she be refused? She has the requisite number of inhabitants. They are our friends and fellow-citizens, and are entitled to a full participation in all the benefits of the Union.

With regard to objections to their constitution, the same remarks may be made that were applied to the other State. Compel them to change it; admit them; and perhaps the next week they will call a convention and amend it, so as to restore the same features to which you raised the objection. The people of these new communities deserve kindness at our hands. They are under our protection and guardianship; and now, when they are about to set up for themselves, we ought to manifest the affection of a parent, and the solicitude of a friend, for their future welfare. By this means we shall secure their gratitude and esteem, and rivet their attachment to a Union which, in its practical operation, dispenses so large an amount of individual and general happiness to the citizens of this great republic.

I shall vote, then, against the amendment now proposed, because it is unnecessary, and its adoption may cause the bill to be lost in the Senate. I shall vote against all amendments that may be offered, for the same reasons. As the bill now stands, it gives to Ohio all she asks, and it provides amply for Michigan. There is no necessity for an alteration or amendment; and no one who is a friend to the principal features of the bill should risk its final defeat by voting to change its details. Let us adhere to it, as it came from the Senate. We have the whole subject now under our own control. We can put an end to a most distracting contest, that has agitated our country from Maine to Georgia, and from the Atlantic to the most remote settlement upon her frontier. There was a time when the most painful anxiety pervaded the whole nation; and whilst each one waited with feverish impatience for further intelligence from the disputed territory, he trembled lest the ensuing mail should bear the disastrous tidings of a civil strife in which brother had fallen by the hand of brother, and the soil of freedom had been stained by the blood of her own sons. But the storm has passed. The usual good fortune of the American people has prevailed. The land heaves in view, and a haven, with its wide-spread arms, invites us to enter. After so long an exposure to the fury of a tempest that was apparently gathering in our political horizon, let us seize the first opportunity to steer the ship into a safe harbor, far beyond the reach of that elemental war that threatened her security in the open sea. Let us pass this bill. It does justice to all. It conciliates all. Its provisions will carry peace and harmony to those who are now agitated by strife, and disquieted by tumults and disorders. By this just, humane, and beneficent policy, we shall consolidate our liberties, and make this Government what Mr. Jefferson, more than thirty years ago, declared it to be, "the strongest Government on earth; the only one where every man, at the call of the law, will fly to the standard of the law, and meet invasions of the public order as his own personal concern." With this policy on the part of the Government, and the spirit of patriotism that now animates our citizens in full vigor, united America may bid defiance to a world in arms; and should Providence continue to smile upon our country, we may confidently anticipate that the freedom, the happiness, and the prosperity, which we now enjoy, will be as perpetual as the lofty mountains that crown our continent, or the noble rivers that fertilize our plains.

When Mr. HAMER sat down,

Mr. KINNARD rose and said:

Mr. Chairman: Such is the lateness of the hour and the impatience of the committee, I shall ask their indulgence for a few moments only. The frequent allusions to the State which sent me here seem to require that I should say something on this subject.

It is true, sir, I have differed from two of my friends and colleagues with regard to the boundary bill which was laid on the table yesterday. It has seldom happened that I have differed in opinion with those gentlemen; and when I do differ with them, particularly in relation to matters that are supposed to concern Indiana, it is always with a regret as sincere on my part as I know is their devotion to the prosperity and honor of that State and of the country.

I did not conceive that any very important consequences were involved, one way or the other, in the vote by which the boundary bill was laid on the table. I thought at the time, and do still think, that if that bill had been passed, there would have been adopted the most plain and direct mode of settling the boundary question; and in our legislation we should then have avoided the necessity of blending it with the provisions and propositions upon which the State of Michigan is to be admitted into the Union.

I am not prepared to agree with those who regard this question and the ensuing presidential election as having any connexion or dependence upon each other. Whatever may be the feelings of some gentlemen, these two concerns seem to me to be very wide apart; at least, they ought to be, so far as the action of the House is concerned. I do not know of any one opposed to the admission of Michigan, after the passage of any bill to settle the boundary. Whether that requisition be indispensable, I will not now undertake to decide; but it surely presents the only ground for resisting her application. As to other considerations, connected with the presidential question, I feel incapable of being actuated by them; and the opinions which I am known to entertain, with respect to that election, forbid the idea that I could have been governed, in the vote which I gave, by any other than a desire to discharge my duty in this House. My obligation to sustain the constitutional rights of my own State, or of any other, is paramount to all other considerations; it is infinitely above any wish to promote the political elevation of any man living, or the triumph of any party in this country.

The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VINTON] is one which may become the more necessary, since the other bill which provides for the same object has not been passed; and, in my opinion, that necessity will be greater or less, according to the course which Michigan may pursue, and the construction which that State and Congress may hereafter give to the provisions and force of the bill now pending. I shall vote for it, however, with the view of putting the whole matter beyond dispute and misconception hereafter, as far as the constitutional power of this Congress will enable us to do at this time. Hereafter, or when Michigan is admitted, Congress will have no right to insist upon any stipulation which would subvert any provision with regard to boundaries, or any thing else which may be contained in the constitution with which she may be brought into the confederacy. This is, therefore, the only time when we can with propriety or justice refuse what she demands, or restrict the rights and privileges which she claims at our hands. If we fail to do it now, we cannot be umpires in the dispute between Ohio and Michigan, after the latter has become a member of the Union, and is placed upon an equal footing with the other States. I shall vote, from the necessity of the case, and from a very natural and anxious hope that the result of our proceedings with regard to this subject will give repose to all the parties concerned, by placing them all as completely as we now can in possession of their respective rights. Nothing is further from my heart than to vote any unnecessary restriction upon the new State of Michigan. I can conceive of no reason why I should not feel for her interests and rights, as far as they are admissible, every degree of solicitude. Indiana and Michigan are the nearest neighbors; their general permanent interests are the same, and the citizens of each are certainly disposed to cultivate the most harmonious and friendly feeling; and I do therefore regret the existence of a dire necessity which neither Michigan nor Congress can escape.

We must settle this dispute by choosing the most plausible and rightful of the alternatives which are presented to us. If we do not, we shall behold increased excitement growing out of the present state of things. As fast as time progresses, the evil will grow in magnitude, and it will be still further beyond our reach to apply any satisfactory, proper, and peaceful remedy. Sir, as an American, as a man who has been reared in the West, I have always felt the strongest aversion to the restrictions which are imposed by this Government upon the new States as fast as they come into the Union. I have witnessed their effects upon the prosperity of those States. I have always been bold to declare the opinion, that not one of those States has been in fact admitted to that equal condition with the old States which this Government promised, and which Virginia undertook to guaranty when she ceded the Northwest Territory to the United States. While I am anxious to modify your policy towards the West, I know that we cannot throw off the burdens which, by a sort of compact, the new States have taken upon themselves one after another. The other States that are to succeed must advance in the same road, bearing the same restrictions upon their sovereignty, which their predecessors are still laboring under.

I must here take occasion to correct a misapprehension into which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VINTON] has fallen, and at the same time thank him for the compliment which he paid to Indiana, in expressing his opinion of the ability of the argument adopted by her General Assembly in reference to this subject. But in the proceedings alluded to Indiana did not, as the honorable gentleman seems to think, urge Congress to reconfirm her northern boundary. As she denies that you have constitutional authority to impair the permanence of the boundaries laid down in her constitution, so she has not called upon you to reaffirm them. She contends that her constitutional limits are not subject to the control of Congress or to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. That is the ground on which she has at once placed herself, with a promptitude and unanimity honorable to her public councils; and in coming to that decision, her General Assembly has enacted the proudest page of her legislative history. To adhere to it, is the high duty she has to perform, for which the fortitude and patriotism of her people will, I trust, be ample security.

The debate was continued by Messrs. STORER, HANNEGAN, WISE, HUNTSMAN, and McKEON.

The question was then taken on the amendment offered by Mr. VINTON; which was rejected.

Several amendments, offered by Messrs. LOVE and ROBERTSON, were also rejected.

Mr. ADAMS said that he wanted to offer an amendment, which he had not had time to prepare, and he wished a further opportunity. His desire was to admit the State of Michigan by a bill for that purpose alone, separated from all questions of boundary. He believed the people of Michigan had a right to admission, but he wanted the question of disputed boundary to be left for future adjustment.

Mr. THOMAS suggested that it would be better to let the bill be reported, and offer it in the House.

Mr. ADAMS said he would if the screws would not be applied.

Mr. THOMAS said he could make no pledges for the House; but it could make no difference to the question.

Mr. ADAMS said it would make a difference; for in committee he could argue the propriety of the amendment, without being cut off by the previous question. He moved that the committee rise.

Mr. RUSSELL moved to amend the bill, so as to provide that none but free white male citizens should be voters.

In offering this motion, Mr. R. addressed the Chair as follows:

It is with reluctance, Mr. Chairman, that I rise at this late hour of the night to propose several amendments to the bill under consideration; the period, and the circumstances which have accompanied the bill in its progress thus far, admonish me that the time allotted to the consideration of it is brief indeed, and that no proposition to alter, change, or amend it, is to be received or sanctioned by this committee. Yet, sir, I cannot but invoke the spirit of patriotism, which even now lingers in this hall, to come forth to the rescue of our institutions from the fatal consequences which the passage of this bill will have upon the peace and tranquillity of our citizens, and may have upon the permanency of our institutions. Sir, to avert calamities like these, is my apology for soliciting the attention of the committee, even at this unseasonable hour. It is my desire, sir, to prohibit aliens from voting at elections to be holden in the Territory or State of Michigan; and the amendments proposed will, if adopted, secure that object, and thus remove one of the objectionable features of the bill.

Sir, while I assure you the bill, in its present form, cannot receive the sanction of my vote, I desire to be understood as entertaining no hostility to the admission of Michigan as a State into the Union; but, on the contrary, I look forward with peculiar satisfaction to the period when Michigan will stand forth with her sister States of the North, and exhibit the proud pre-eminence which their domestic policy secures to them. The unauthorized position assumed by her, in violation of the spirit of our institutions; the ostentatious and dictatorial manner of her approach, demanding as a right that which she should solicit as matter of favor; disregarding, too, the usual formalities attending the admission of new States into the Union; the revolutionary position which she has assumed, and even now occupies; the deliberation with which she has thrown off the guardianship of the General Government, and organized a State sovereignty; and, sir, not the least objectionable, the temper with which she approaches you, as evidenced by the correspondence with the officers of this Government, accompanying this ostentatious demand of admission into the Union—all these considerations present subjects worthy of grave and solemn deliberation, and should subject her to a merited rebuke at the hands of this Government. But, sir, there are considerations of more importance urged upon you, as you advance with this investigation—considerations involving questions of constitutional power, and which should invoke the wisdom and dispassionate deliberation of this committee. Two questions arise, sir, out of this bill, for the consideration of this committee: 1st. Do the State Governments or the Legislative Councils of the Territories possess the power of conferring the right of suffrage upon aliens? and, 2d. If they have the power, is it expedient to confer the right universally and indiscriminately upon that class of our population, without subjecting them to the ordeal of our naturalization laws?

Sir, I insist that no such right exists, and that the exercise of it by the Territorial Council and Convention in Michigan was without authority, and in direct violation of the constitution of the United States.

From the documents upon your table, Mr. Chairman, it appears that an act was passed by the Legislative Council of the Territory of Michigan, in January, 1835, entitled "An act to enable the people of Michigan to form a constitution and State Government." By the first section of this act "the free inhabitants" of the said Territory were authorized to assemble and "choose delegates to a convention to form for themselves a constitution and State Government;" and the election of delegates to the convention was to be holden on the 4th day of April, 1835.

By the 2d section it was enacted "that the free white male inhabitants of the said Territory, above the age of twenty-one years, who shall reside therein three months immediately preceding Saturday the 4th day of April, 1835, be, and are hereby, authorized to choose delegates to form a constitution," &c.

The 3d section directs the time when the election for delegates shall be holden, "and that whenever any person shall present his vote or ballot at such election for delegates, if he shall be challenged, the said inspector shall cause to be read to him so much of the 2d section as relates to the qualification of voters, and shall then tender and administer to him the prescribed oath;" and, upon its being taken, the inspectors are then required to receive said ballot.

It will be perceived that all white male inhabitants, of the age of twenty-one years, who shall have resided in said Territory for the period of three months immediately preceding the day of election, were entitled to vote for delegates to the convention to form the constitution now presented to us, and which constitution, by this bill, we are to "ratify and confirm."

This act calling the convention extended the privilege of voting for delegates to the convention to aliens as well as citizens, and the constitution which this convention adopted contained a provision in the following words: "In all elections, every white male citizen above the age of twenty-one years, having resided in the State six months next preceding any election, shall be entitled to vote at such election; and every white male inhabitant of the age aforesaid, who may be a resident of the State at the time of the signing of this constitution shall have the right of voting as aforesaid."

Living as we do under a Government of laws enacted under the authority of, and controlled by, a written constitution of express and limited powers, and jealous as we are of the exercise of unauthorized power, it well becomes us to examine this latter provision in the constitution of Michigan, and determine whether it does not directly impinge the federal constitution. I, sir, maintain that it does; it places aliens who may not have arrived in Michigan one hour before the adoption of that constitution upon an equality with citizens in the exercise of the important right of suffrage—the most important right of citizenship—in total disregard of the provisions of the constitution of the United States, the laws of Congress, and the fact of naturalization. Sir, I intend no imputation upon the virtuous and industrious foreigners who reside in Michigan, and who have identified themselves with our own native population, and been subjected to the process of naturalization, whereby they have become entitled to the privileges of native citizens. Many of them, sir, are entitled to the highest commendation; but, sir, my objection is to that idle, vicious, destitute, and turbulent class of foreigners, whose habits and propensities render them burdensome to any country, and who have been transported hither to diminish the burden of pauperism at home, and many of whom, soon after their arrival in our country, become inmates of our poor-houses and penitentiaries. This, sir, is the class from which I would admonish you to withhold the native born citizen's birthright. But, sir, the question presented is not one of mere expediency, but of constitutional power; yet, sir, if there is any one evil more to be deprecated by our citizens than another, it is that which by our laws converts with unexampled celerity aliens into citizens. Regardless, however, of the daily admonitions of past experience, as well as the warning voice of other republics, this bill adopts and confirms the constitution of Michigan, which gives to all aliens the right of suffrage who were in the Territory when the constitution was "signed," of whatever country, character, or condition.

That at this day a change is necessary in our naturalization laws, few will deny; but that result, so desirable to all who prefer peace and tranquillity, can be effected only by an act of Congress. By the constitution of the United States, the power of naturalization is exclusively vested in Congress, and that power has been continually exercised since the adoption of the federal constitution; and by the laws of the United States, as they now exist, to entitle an alien to naturalization, a previous residence of five years is required. And the question is now presented, whether the act of the Legislative Council of Michigan, and the provision in the constitution of Michigan founded upon it, which allows aliens to vote, are not inconsistent with, repugnant to, and in violation of, the constitution of the United States. Before the adoption of the constitution, the power of naturalization was exercised by the several States; and it was the want of uniformity in the exercise of that power which caused the present provision to be incorporated into the constitution. It is therefore evident that, if the proceedings of the Michigan convention are proper, and shall be sustained, the object of the provision in the constitution of the United States is not secured. In all the States of the Union except Michigan, (if that Territory may be called a State,) five years' previous residence is required to entitle an alien to naturalization; but in Michigan no previous residence is required. She seeks to break up the uniformity of the rule prescribed by the constitution, and disregards, too, the evidence which the laws of the United States require, of "previous good character" of the person applying for naturalization, and admits all male aliens, provided they be white, and over twenty-one years of age, to exercise this most important privilege of citizens. Mr. Chairman, does not this then present, clearly and singly, the question of constitutional power? Was that Legislative Council, acting, as it must have been, under the power and authority derived from this Government, or the convention which it created, competent to confer this important right on aliens who resided in the Territory at the time the constitution was signed? If they possessed the power, have they not an equal power to confer the right of suffrage on aliens who shall emigrate there at any subsequent period? And if the Legislative Council of Michigan possessed this power, has not every State in the Union the same power? And if they have, they also possess the right of altering their constitutions already formed, and each State adopt for itself a rule of naturalization. And, in such an event, it must be obvious to all that there would be no very great degree of uniformity in the naturalization laws. Does not this, then, present to the plain practical common sense of all an unquestionable violation of the constitution of the United States?

For more than forty years Congress has been in the full exercise of this power conferred upon it by the constitution, and laws have from time to time been passed securing entire uniformity in the practice of naturalization throughout the United States; and, if you had the power of departing from this uniform rule of naturalization, (which I insist you have not,) is it not desirable that it should still be preserved?

And yet, sir, it cannot be preserved, if the right is concurrent in the States individually, and in Congress. Under the old confederation, previous to the adoption of our federal constitution, the power of naturalization was not conferred on Congress; consequently, upon the principle that powers not delegated (see 9th and 10th articles of the amendments to the constitution of the United States) were reserved to, and remained in, the State Governments. But, upon the adoption of our present constitution, (see art. 1, sec. 8,) this power was transferred to Congress, and has been exercised, and in uniform operation, hitherto. Sir, the rights of citizenship can only be acquired in one of two modes—by birth or naturalization. In one of these two modes a person must be capacitated to exercise political power in any of the States; if it is not so, the representatives of aliens, as in the case of Michigan, and, indeed, aliens themselves, may assemble in a given Territory, within the limits of the Union, and form a constitution, and demand admission as a State into the Union. If the principle of this bill is conceded, it renders that provision in the federal constitution which authorizes Congress "to establish uniform rules of naturalization" wholly inoperative. The framers of the constitution looked forward to the time when the great influx of foreigners into our country might jeopard the peace and security of our citizens, and disturb the organization of political power among the several States, through the representative principle, upon the ratio of population: to guard against such an evil, this provision was incorporated. New York is well situated with a view to the ingress of foreigners; and if she should desire to increase her political power, sanction the principle of this bill, and, in a population more liable to temptation than New York, this consideration might form an inducement to invite even an unwholesome population. But, sir, I hold that all political power must be derived from the people—the true source, in our country, of all power; and that the exercise of the right of suffrage is a political right, which none but citizens can rightfully enjoy; and that the right of determining what foreigner may exercise that power has been delegated to Congress by the people, through that provision in the federal constitution which authorizes Congress "to establish a uniform rule of naturalization." Here, then, is the source of power from which the right of suffrage is derived by such as are not native-born citizens. The right of suffrage in England is a franchise, or peculiar privilege, conferred by the King; but it is not so in the United States. It is here, since the Revolution, the birthright of our people; and though the exercise of it may be regulated by law, and subject to various qualifications, yet the qualification of citizenship must always be one. By our Revolution, that royal prerogative was wrested from the Crown and vested in the people, who co-operated in establishing our independence; and by that people the power to admit others, not native born, to a participation of it, has been conferred exclusively on Congress. The "people" of the United States are to elect their representatives. Who, sir, are the "people" to make this choice, but those "citizens" of each State "who are entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States?" (See sec. 2 of art. 4, of Con. U. S.) Now, sir, no one, I presume, will insist that these new-born citizens of Michigan are "entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States;" and yet they are allowed, by a proceeding which this bill sanctions, to exercise the most important political right which a citizen can enjoy. An alien, direct from Ireland, or any other foreign country, who arrived in Michigan on the 23d of June, 1835, by the provision under consideration is authorized to vote at any election to be holden there, upon an equal footing with the native citizens; and that right, by this bill, we are called upon to "ratify and confirm." Now, if this same alien had emigrated to the State of New York, or any other State in this Union, on the same day, he could not have exercised the right of suffrage there short of five years' actual residence, and of having submitted to the process of naturalization; but in Michigan, one day's residence is deemed sufficient to qualify him intelligently to exercise this important privilege. Can this, sir, be carrying out the provision in your constitution which requires a uniform rule of naturalization throughout the United States?

But, sir, were the measures which this bill seeks to establish to be submitted to the test of expediency alone, would you be willing to adopt them as the settled policy of your country? No, sir; evils too complicated and great would be the issue of such a policy, to be acceptable to the American people. Sir, if the time shall ever come when, by law, you shall authorize aliens who have not undergone the scrutinizing and sifting process of naturalization to exercise the right of suffrage, from that period the future historian, in recording the destiny of this republic, will date the period of its having been betrayed to the keeping of its enemies. Sir, a sentiment full of instruction to the American people, uttered by an American statesman and soldier, demands at this crisis a response from the people of the United States. Sir, it is this: That "the people of the United States, to preserve their liberties, must do their own voting and their own fighting." Sir, it is a sentiment worthy of its distinguished author—of an American soldier, an American statesman and patriot. Will this bill, if enacted into a law, give to that sentiment the response desired by the American people? Without hesitation, and unqualifiedly, sir, I answer no! No, sir, no! Our fathers, sir, were not unmindful of the importance of submitting our institutions to the guardianship of native American statesmen. By the provisions of the federal constitution, the President and Vice President of the United States are required to be native-born citizens; and the President is required to cause the laws of the Union to be executed. These high places of power, it was then thought, could not, with safety to the American people, be occupied by any but natural-born citizens. The rise, the progress, and the final destiny of the republics of other times were full of instruction to the framers of the constitution; and against the fatal effects of a degraded mercenary foreign influence, as well as the ambitious designs of rival foreign Powers, this provision was deemed effectual. Sir, let the spirit of that ordinance be observed and carried out in practice by the constituted authorities of your Government and your citizens, and its perpetuity will remain an enduring monument of the wisdom of its authors. Sir, this Territory of Michigan is a frontier country, skirted upon the north by the British province of Upper Canada, where thousands of the pauper population of the mother country, for her relief, have been transported; and, at the time the constitution of the State of Michigan was "signed," there were in the Territory 4,000 aliens, included in a population of at least 60,000. Sir, sanction that constitution which gives to aliens the privilege of voting upon an equal footing with your citizens, and the struggle for the emancipation of your country will have been made in vain. No prophetic vision will be required to proclaim the result of this last effort of man to govern his race by equal and just laws. Sir, if a design were entertained by a foreign Government against the liberties of the American people, could a better mode have been devised to accomplish such an object? This bill, sir, sanctions principles of vast, if not controlling, magnitude to the American people, which, in my estimation, require only to be known to be condemned. Sir, that you may have some idea of the population to which you are extending the right of suffrage, I solicit your attention and that of the committee to the following table,* which has been kindly furnished by a friend.

From this, sir, it appears that the British Government transported three hundred and twenty paupers, at an expense of £2,473. If it is so desirable for that Government to disencumber itself of such a number of paupers, at such an expense, is the danger apprehended there, by those who have a knowledge of the character and condition of that population, to be disregarded by the American people? We are now, sir, a virtuous, prosperous, and a happy people; our yeomanry, the physical power of the nation, and its most secure defence, are undisturbed in their peaceful avocations by these turbulent, vicious, and idle vagrants from abroad, and are not emulous to mingle with them in their devotion to the free institutions of our country; and, sir, is it not desirable to continue this tranquillity? And can you indulge a hope of accomplishing such an object, if you throw open the ballot-box to the indiscriminate approach of this alien population? I will not affirm that the aliens in Michigan compose any part of this vagrant population; but, sir, it is a well-authenticated fact, that, within the last five years, many thousands of that description have been transported direct from the poor-houses of Europe to the continent of America, at an expense of several millions of dollars to the British Government.

Sir, while I will indulge no morbid apprehension for the future, yet, if you adopt the principles of this bill, I cannot but anticipate the most disastrous consequences to our country. Sir, from the appalling disclosures which each day develops, it remains for this people to determine whether it will be wise, just, or even safe, to open the floodgate of vice and corruption, of indolence and crime, which, in its demoralizing effects, may corrupt the common fountain from which flow the multiplied blessings which our country now enjoys.

This class of persons, sir, while they labor under the disqualification of alienism, are subject to few civil duties, (if they had the capacity to discharge them;) and, by international laws, as expounded by the British Government, they cannot expatriate themselves, nor can you compel them to the performance of military service; and if, in a war between this and their native country, they are found in arms against it, they are liable to condemnation, and to the punishment of death, as traitors to their native land. Sir, to show the sense of the British Government on this subject, and the right, as claimed by them, to require the return to their native country of this population, and all others, in times of peril, the King of England, on the 16th day of October, 1807, issued his proclamation, reclaiming from foreign service his native subjects, in which he declared "that the kingdom was menaced and in danger;" and he recalled from foreign service all seamen and seafaring men, who were natural-born subjects, and ordered them to withdraw themselves and return home, on pain of being proceeded against, &c. Here, sir, you have a recognition of the power and the exercise of the right of the King to call home his native-born subjects, wherever they may be, and whenever they may have departed. And now, sir, you are solicited by this bill to give to aliens, who are liable to be recalled at the pleasure of their King, the important privilege of voting for all the officers of your Government. Sir, if these aliens shall act in concert, as they hitherto have done, and I have no doubt will continue to do, will they not control the whole civil and military operations of the American people, within a very limited period? Their habits of life disqualify them from mingling with our citizens, or appreciating or enjoying the free institutions of our country; and, by conferring on them prematurely privileges to which they have not been accustomed, and the benefits of which they do not appreciate, will you not at least hazard the permanency of our Government? Sir, in the past experience of the world, has it ever been known that an intelligent people, emerging from a state of dependency, in forming for themselves and their posterity a constitution and form of government which should control in all future time their legislative action, have called to their aid foreigners, aliens, persons owing allegiance to other, and perhaps rival, nations? Sir, this new principle which we are now called upon to establish is no less dangerous than novel. At this particular crisis, it is known to all that, in some of the European States, there is a redundant population, particularly in England and Ireland, which disturb the tranquillity, and threaten with violence the sacred rights of peaceful subjects; and the relief there deemed most effectual is transportation to America. With a view to an object so desirable to them, but which is becoming so burdensome to us, thousands are transported to America each year, at the expense of the British Government, and here cast upon the charity of our people. In 1831, '33, '35, there were upwards of one hundred and thirty-nine thousand foreigners landed in the city of New York, many of whom were of the most ignorant, vicious, and degraded class, depending upon charity alone for their daily subsistence. And, sir, during four successive days in May last, one thousand nine hundred and seventy-three foreign emigrants arrived in the same city; and in the month of May last, there were fifteen thousand eight hundred and twenty-five arrived at the New York quarantine ground. Now, sir, carry out the provisions of this bill by similar provisions in all the State constitutions, and upon their arrival extend to these aliens indiscriminately the right of suffrage, and who is so dull of vision as not to foresee the fatal effects of such a measure upon our civil and religious institutions? Upon this subject, sir, we are not left to conjecture alone; the design has been openly avowed, as will appear from the following handbill, which was liberally circulated in the city of New York at the late charter election. It is in these words:

"Irishmen, to your posts, or you will lose America. By perseverance you may become its rulers; by negligence you will become its slaves. Your own country was lost by submitting to ambitious men. This beautiful country you may gain by being firm and united. Your religion may here have the ascendancy, and here predominate. By your perseverance, this may become a Catholic country. Vote the ticket—Alexander Stewart, alderman, and Edward Flanagan for assessor—both true Irishmen."

Here, sir, you have the objects avowed—the subversion of your Government—a revolution contemplated! Mark the language of this appeal, and remember that it is made to Irishmen in the city of New York, at an election for officers of the city government, within which there are probably more than one hundred thousand foreigners. Note the expression: "Irishmen, to your posts, or you will lose America. By perseverance you may become its rulers." Yes, sir, Irishmen are invoked to come forth and rule America, and secure to the Catholic religion an ascendancy. They are told: "Your religion may here have the ascendancy, and here predominate." You have, then, the direct avowal that the free exercise of religious opinions is to be assailed, and your country converted into a Catholic country. Are this people prepared for this great change? Whether the Catholic religion is to be deprecated or not, is not now the question; but it is, are we prepared to abandon the free exercise of our religious opinions, (whatever they may be,) which has been secured to us by the constitution of our country? And how, sir, is this great work of subversion to be accomplished? This handbill too clearly furnishes the answer to leave in doubt the manner of its accomplishment. And is it, sir, with a view to such an object that this extraordinary privilege, at this time, is to be conferred upon this alien population? It is believed that during the present summer there will have arrived in the city of New York alone at least seventy-five thousand foreigners, vast numbers of whom are miserably poor, and destitute of the necessaries of life. Go, sir, to the alms-houses and penitentiaries, and you will there discover the relief which the policy of the British Government has effected by the transportation of their pauper population, and the burden which that policy has cast upon our country. In some instances, more than two thirds of their inmates are slavery, I should be recreant to the trust they have reposed in me, if I suffered the bill for the admission of Arkansas to pass without a word of protestation. The extraordinary circumstances under which I rise to address the committee impel me to brevity and succinctness; but they would afford me no justification for a passive acquiescence in the admission of Arkansas into the Union, with all the sins of its constitution upon its head.

The constitution of Arkansas, as communicated to Congress in the memorial of the people of that Territory, praying to be admitted into the Union, contains the following clause:

"The General Assembly shall have no power to pass laws for the emancipation of slaves without the consent of the owners. They shall have no power to prevent emigrants to this State from bringing with them such persons as are deemed slaves by the laws of any one of the United States."

This provision of the constitution of Arkansas is condemned by those whom I represent on this occasion as anti-republican, as wrong on general principles of civil polity, and as unjust to the inhabitants of the non-slaveholding States. They object to it as being, in effect, a provision to render slavery perpetual in the new State of Arkansas.

I concur in reprobating such a clause. The Legislature of Arkansas is forbidden to emancipate the slaves within its jurisdiction, even though it should be ready to indemnify fully their owners. It is forbidden to exclude slaves from being imported into the State. I cannot, by any vote of mine, ratify or sanction a constitution of government which undertakes in this way to foreclose in advance the progress of civilization and of liberty forever.

In order to do justice to the unchangeable opinions of the North, without, in any respect, invading the rights, real or supposed, of the South, my colleague, [Mr. ADAMS,] the vigilant eye of whose unsleeping mind there is nothing which escapes, has moved an amendment of the bill for the admission of Arkansas into the Union, so that, if the amendment be adopted, the bill would read as follows:

"The State of Arkansas is admitted into the Union upon the express condition that the people of the said State shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the public lands within the said State, nor shall they levy a tax on any of the lands of the United States within the said State; and nothing in this act shall be construed as an assent by Congress [to the article in the constitution of the said State relating to slavery and to the emancipation of the slaves, or] to all or to any of the propositions contained in the ordinance of the said convention of the people of Arkansas, nor to deprive the said State of Arkansas of the same grants, subject to the same restrictions, which were made to the State of Missouri."

This amendment is, according to my judgment, reasonable and proper in itself, and the very least that any member from the North can propose in vindication of the opinions and principles of himself and his constituents.

It is opposed, however, by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE,] with his accustomed vigor and ability. He alleges considerations adverse to the motion. He interrogates the friends of the proposed amendment in regard to its force, effect, and purposes, in terms which seem to challenge response; or which, at any rate, if not distinctly and promptly met, would leave the objections which those interrogatories impliedly convey, to be taken as confessed and admitted by our significant silence.

What may be the opinions of Martin Van Buren as to this particular bill, what his conduct formerly in reference to a similar case, is a point concerning which I can have no controversy with the gentleman from Virginia.

I look only to the merits of the question before the committee. There is involved in it a principle which I regard as immeasurably more important than the opinion of any individual in this nation, however high his present situation or his possible destiny—the great principle of constitutional freedom.

The gentleman from Virginia, who, I cheerfully admit, is always frank and honorable in his course upon this floor, has just declared that, as a Southern man, he had felt it to be his duty to come forward and take a stand in behalf of an institution of the South. That institution is slavery. In like manner, I feel it to be my duty, as a Northern man, to take a counter stand in conservation of one among the dearest of the institutions of the North. This institution is liberty. It is not to assail slavery, but to defend liberty, that I speak.

It is demanded of us, Do you seek to impose restrictions on Arkansas, in violation of the compromise under which Missouri entered the Union?

I might content myself with replying that the State of Massachusetts was not a party to that compromise. She never directly or indirectly assented to it. Most of her Representatives in Congress voted against it. Those of her Representatives who, regarding that compromise in the light of an act of conciliation important to the general interests of the Union, voted for it, were disavowed and denounced at home, and were stigmatized even here, by a Southern member, as over-compliant towards the exactingness of the South.

Let me add in passing, as a kindred fact, which the train of association brings to mind, that it is this very exigence of gentlemen from the South which compels those of the North to act and speak more decidedly than they might be disposed to do of their own mere volition. We come here, generally, imbued with much reluctance to debate the subject of slavery; but whenever it is touched, we hear language addressed to us which necessarily produces a revulsion of feeling, a reaction on our part: our position is changed from that of assailants to the assailed, silence wears the aspect of fear, and concession is converted into pusillanimity. No choice remains to us but to maintain temperately, yet firmly, the rights and the principles of the North.

But, continues the gentleman from Virginia, you had no power to impose restrictions upon Missouri; you have no power to impose restrictions upon Arkansas; that was the doctrine of the South then, as the debates of that day abundantly show, and it is now the doctrine of the South.

Sir, I also have looked into the debates and the legislation which preceded the admission of Missouri. Was it without restrictions? The act which authorized the people of the Territory of Missouri to form a constitution and State Government imposed various restrictions upon the powers of the future State, conditional to its admission into the Union, such as the demarcation of its limits, the regulation of public lands within it, and the free navigation of its rivers. The very clause of that statute in which the celebrated compromise consists—the provision "that in all that territory ceded by France to the United States under the name of Louisiana, which lies north of thirty-six degrees and thirty minutes north latitude, not included within the limits of the State contemplated by this act, slavery and involuntary servitude, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes, whereof the parties shall have been duly convicted, shall be, and is hereby, forever prohibited"—this enactment is, in itself an exercise of the right of restriction, both as it regards Missouri and Arkansas, or any other State which may be formed out of the colony of Louisiana. If Congress had a right to prescribe such a restriction for the region north of that parallel of latitude, it had the same right to prescribe it for the region south of that parallel; although, for reasons satisfactory to itself, it abstained from the exercise of the right in the latter case. Nay, the resolution of the 2d of March, 1821, for the admission of Missouri into the Union, which is now on the table before me, provides that she shall be admitted only "upon the fundamental condition" that a particular clause of her constitution, relating to colored persons, should never take effect; and upon her solemn assent to that condition, and not before, Missouri entered into the Union.

Did not the acts for the admission of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, impose conditions upon each of those States? Unquestionably. Does not the bill now before us for the admission of Michigan? Ay, and the most onerous one of the relinquishment of a territory which she claims and desires, and the acceptance of another in lieu of it, which she neither claims nor desires.

But these examples, it may be said, are not precisely in point, since they are drawn from that sacro-sanct soil which was dedicated to freedom by Nathan Dane's ordinance. Arkansas stands upon a peculiar footing. It is neither a part of the territory northwest of the Ohio, nor of that southwest of the Ohio. It belongs to the territory ceded to us by France. May we exact conditions of the people of that territory, when they ask admission into the Union?

That we did so in the case of Missouri, I have already shown. So did we, to a far greater extent, in that of Louisiana. Nay, does not the bill for the admission of Arkansas, as presented to us by its friends, impose restrictions? This very amendment, now under debate, if adopted, will only be one of a series of restrictions. It will not be a solitary condition, standing alone, as if in exception to analogy and to rule.

But the gentleman from Virginia would not be satisfied, nor should I, to deal with this important point as a mere question of precedent. It might suffice at the bar; it will not answer in this House. How stands the case, then, as one of general principle or constitutional right? This depends upon the terms either of the constitution of the United States, or those of the convention with France, by which we acquired Louisiana.

The constitution says:

"New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction of any other State, nor any State be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned, as well as of the Congress."

Here are certain cases in which the constitution imposes restrictions on the power of Congress to admit new States into the Union. In all others we may or may not act at our discretion. So far as the terms of the constitution go, we are not bound to act. Suppose the people of Cuba should ask to be admitted into the Union? Must we consent? Clearly not. And if we do consent? Then we may stipulate for all such conditions in our own favor as we see fit. We may say—You shall pay a price in money or lands, you shall emancipate your slaves, you shall deport your free blacks. The constitution confers on us the discretion to admit new States at will; it limits, in certain respects, our power to act affirmatively, and in so doing it excludes that kind of limitation in all other respects; but it does not limit, in any respect, our discretion on the negative side of a refusal to admit new States.

Our obligation to admit Arkansas into the Union is not created, then, by the terms of the constitution. It is founded on the provisions of the treaty with France of 1803, commonly called the Louisiana convention. The French republic, in ceding Louisiana to the United States, made a stipulation in behalf of the people transferred to us, to the following effect:

"ART. 3. The inhabitants of the ceded territories shall be incorporated into the Union of the United States, and admitted, as soon as it shall be possible, according to the principles of the federal constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities, of the citizens of the United States; and in the mean time they shall be maintained and protected in the enjoyment of their liberties, property, and the religions which they profess."

What might be the rights of the people of the colony of Louisiana, or any part of that colony, under the latter clause of this article, it is not very important in this connexion to inquire. Congress, it may be remarked, would have a general jurisdiction, extending even to the question of slavery, unless that be excluded by the language of the treaty. That it is not so excluded is plainly apparent, from the consideration that the liberties and property, described in the treaty, can be nothing more than the liberties and properties which the people of Louisiana held, under existing laws, as a French colony. Slave property was subject to regulation or annihilation in the colony of Louisiana, just as it was then, and is now, in the other dependencies of France.

The word "liberties," in the second clause of the article, does not refer to the rights possessed by citizens of the United States, and which the people of Louisiana might thereafter acquire under the first clause. Rights of this kind were among the restrictions imposed on Louisiana on her admission into the Union. The act for the admission of the State of Louisiana provides not only that her constitution shall be "republican, and consistent with that of the United States," but also that "it shall contain the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty; that it shall secure to the citizens the trial by jury in all criminal cases, and the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus." These are restrictions on the admission of a State of the right character, and precisely in point, being restrictions in favor of the extension of liberty. If Congress might impose on the people of the colony of Louisiana the trial by jury, the writ of habeas corpus, and the fundamental principles of civil liberty, generally, surely it might consider whether it would sanction the extension or legal perpetuation of personal servitude.

Nor did the people of the colony of Louisiana acquire any privilege, under the first clause of the article, to exclude Congress from imposing upon them restrictions in favor of liberty, on their applying for admission into the Union. It exercised such a power in various important particulars in the case of the State of Louisiana. It exercised it in the case of Missouri. It exercised it, at the same time, in regard to all the rest of the colony, except Arkansas.

"All the rights, advantages, and immunities, of citizens of the United States," refers to things of federal, not of municipal resort. So does the expression on "equal footing with the original States," applied in the statute book to the admission of new States. Otherwise, it would be sheer nonsense. There are no two States in the Union in which municipal "rights, advantages, and immunities," are precisely the same. It is, therefore, an impossibility to admit a new State to an equality, in this respect, with each and all of the original States. The citizens of each State are entitled, by the constitution, to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the United States. But it is the enjoyment of those privileges which is equalised, the privileges themselves remaining locally diverse. A citizen of New York, who removes to Pennsylvania, does not carry the laws of New York with him, but is admitted to the benefit of those of Pennsylvania, just as if he had originally resided in the latter State.

[H. OF R.]

And, if it were otherwise, it might be a subject of very grave question, whether "inhabitants of the ceded territories" meant only a certain class or color, and also which of the two, whether the exclusion of liberty or the exclusion of slavery be the more distinctive "enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities, of citizens of the United States."

Whatever view, therefore, I take of the subject, I cannot yield my assent to the doctrines of the gentleman from Virginia.

At the same time, the proposition of my colleague steers altogether clear of the compromise implied in the act for the admission of Missouri.

That compromise, so far as expressed in the act, is to this effect: Missouri shall be admitted into the Union without a prohibition of slavery, in consideration of which, slavery is prohibited in all that part of the colony of Louisiana north of thirty-six degrees thirty minutes of latitude, and not included in Missouri. This is the substance of the compromise. In spirit no more can be made of it than to say that Arkansas, lying south of the parallel of thirty-six degrees thirty-nine minutes, shall be admitted on the same conditions with Missouri. This amendment leaves untouched as well the letter as the spirit of the compromise. It does not propose to exclude Arkansas from the Union. It does not require of her to abolish slavery as the condition of her admission into the Union.

If the proposed amendment had gone this length, there would be doubt in my mind whether I could consistently give it my support. I voted, some short time since, in favor of the resolution adopted by this House, to the effect that Congress has no constitutional power to interfere with the institution of slavery within the States. This resolution was not very logically conceived, nor accurately worded. It is not true, literally, that Congress cannot "interfere, in any way," with slavery in the States. To abolish the foreign slave trade, and still more the domestic slave trade, is to act, indirectly, upon slavery; and there is one way in which Congress is expressly commanded to interfere with slavery in the States; namely, for its maintenance in the case of insurrection or invasion. I voted for the resolution in the sense which I believed it was intended to convey, as a declaration that Congress cannot exercise legislative jurisdiction, of any sort, over the institution of slavery within the States.

I desire on this, as on every other occasion, to act up to the true intent and spirit of that declaration; but, in so acting, I do not consent to the surrender of any one of the rights of opinion, of the press, or of debate, which belong to me as a man, a citizen, or a member of Congress. I do not persuade myself that liberty is an evil, or slavery a blessing. When called upon to accord my official sanction to a frame of government, which not merely permits but expressly perpetuates slavery, I should be false to all the opinions and principles of my life if I did not promptly return a peremptory and emphatic no.

This question, I repeat, is a totally different one from that presented and decided in the case of Missouri. There the question was, whether Congress would act prohibitively for the abolition of slavery in Missouri. Here the question is, whether Congress will act confirmatorily for the perpetuation of slavery in Arkansas.

Is there a gentleman in this House, not connected personally with the institution of slavery, who can suffer himself to hesitate on such a point?

If Arkansas had been silent on this subject, there might be some plausible pretext for asking us to be silent. But Arkansas having put this noxious matter in her constitution, and having brought it here for our approbation, it is the duty of the members of this House at least to say: we wash our hands of the unclean thing.

We are engaged in the creation of infant empires. What we shall now do is to act upon generations yet unborn, to the end of time. There is no appreciation of the consequences which lie enveloped, like the minute germe of the springing seed, in the work of this hour. And at such a time, shall we, with the accents of liberty perpetually on our lips; shall we, whose very institutions are established on the fundamental doctrine of human right; shall we, the representatives of the free people of the United States, be brutishly dumb, when it is sought, through us, to render slavery irredeemably perpetual in a new State soliciting admission into the Union?

I claim it as the right of my constituents, it is my own right, to withhold assent from this exceptionable clause in the constitution of Arkansas. If the question had arisen at a more propitious hour, if the committee were not predetermined to abridge debate by such means as they have the power to exert, I should have argued affirmatively the inexpediency and injustice of that clause, upon general principles of reason. Wholly abstaining to enter this pertinent field of remark, I have endeavored to confine myself to a brief and simple defence of the amendment before us, in reply to the observations of the gentleman from Virginia.

There is one thing more, to which I feel bound, in conclusion, to advert.

On the first introduction of this subject to the notice of the House, the gentleman from Virginia made a declaration, which I particularly noticed at the time, for the purpose of having the tenor of the declaration distinctly understood by the House and by the country. The gentleman gave it to be known that, if members from the North held themselves not engaged by the terms of the compromise under which Missouri entered into the Union, neither would members from the South hold themselves engaged thereby; and that, if we sought to impose restrictions affecting slave property on the one hand, they might be impelled, on the other hand, to introduce slavery into the heart of the North. I heard the suggestion with the feelings natural to one born and bred in a land of equality and freedom. I took occasion to protest, in the surprised impulse of the moment, against the idea of putting restrictions on liberty in one quarter of the Union, in retaliation of the attempt to limit the spread of slavery in another quarter. I held up to view the inconsistency and inconsequence of uttering the warmest eulogiums on freedom one day, of pouring out aspirations that the spirit of liberty might pervade the universe, and at another time threatening the North with the establishment of slavery within its borders, if a Northern member should deprecate the legal perpetuation of slavery in a proposed new State of the West. It did not fall within the rules of pertinent debate to pursue the subject at that time; and I have but a single idea to present now, in addition to what I then observed.

It is not possible for me to judge whether the gentleman from Virginia, and any of his friends or fellow-citizens at the South, deliberately and soberly cherish the extraordinary purpose which his language implied. I trust it was but a hasty thought, struck out in the ardor of debate. To introduce slavery into the heart of the North? Vain idea! Invasion, pestilence, civil war, may conspire to exterminate the eight millions of free spirits who now dwell there. This, in the long lapse of ages incalculable, is possible to happen. You may raze to the earth the thronged cities, the industrious villages, the peaceful hamlets of the North. You may lay waste its fertile valleys and verdant hill-sides. You may plant its very soil with salt, and consign it to everlasting desolation. You may transform its beautiful fields into a desert as bare as the blank face of the sands of Sahara. You may reach the realization of the infernal boast with which Attila the Hun marched his barbaric hosts into

Italy, demolishing whatever there is of civilization or prosperity in the happy dwellings of the North, and reducing their very substance to powder, so that a squadron of cavalry shall gallop over the site of populous cities, unimpeded as the wild steeds on the savannas of the West. All this you may do: it is within the bounds of physical possibility. But I solemnly assure every gentleman within the sound of my voice, I proclaim to the country and to the world, that, until all this be fully accomplished to the uttermost extremity of the letter, you cannot, you shall not, introduce slavery into the heart of the North.

Mr. HARD rose to oppose the bill and advocate the amendment; but said, as the committee had been in session twenty hours, and every member must feel seriously the fatigue of this long session, and as the bill had been taken up for consideration since twelve o'clock at night, he hoped the committee would rise, to enable those who wished to give their views of the measure an opportunity to examine more carefully the bill and other papers and documents connected with it.

The committee refusing to rise, by a large majority, Mr. HARR proceeded. I am unable to perceive any good reason why this important measure should be thus recklessly pushed through amidst darkness, fatigue, and confusion, or why gentlemen should be summoned from their beds at this unseasonable hour, and compelled to give their votes upon the bill without time or opportunity for examination or reflection. Is it matter of no moment to us or the American people that we are about to add one more State to this Union? Does it afford no rebuke to inconsiderate haste that this bill adds one star more to the constellation of our confederated republic? Do not the safety of the constitution, the defence of civil liberty, and the cause of humanity itself, require reflection and consideration, before we pass this bill?

I have had no opportunity until since the bill was taken up in committee of examining this case. But by the little acquaintance I have obtained with the various matters connected with it, and the few hours' reflection I have bestowed upon the constitution of Arkansas, I am solemnly impressed with the momentous character of the bill, as a measure vitally connected with the peace of the Union and the harmony and political interests of the nation.

Sir, the decision we make upon this bill will carry with it the interesting result of conferring liberty or perpetuating slavery to millions of human beings yet unborn. Yes, sir, the decision we make this morning, with sleepless eyes and debilitated bodies, will proclaim through your journals to the world and posterity whether the representatives of the people of this far-famed republic, the collected guardians of civil liberty and the rights of man, have the virtue and patriotism to defend and carry out the sound maxims that form the true basis of this excellent form of government; or whether, for the sake of advancing the interest of a miserable partisan policy, they will sacrifice both the honor and liberty of their country, by entailing upon the freemen of a sovereign State the interminable institution of slavery.

Sir, we are about to adopt a legislative ordinance which, when sanctioned by the proper authorities, will pass from under our jurisdiction. We can never reclaim it; the faith of the nation will stand pledged to abide by it; and however odious and dangerous it may prove to the harmony of the Union, we can never amend or repeal it. So far as the faith and integrity, if not the power, of Congress are concerned, it will be, like the laws of the Medes and Persians, irrevocably confirmed and established. Is there any circumstance connected with the business of the House to justify for a moment such rashness in legislation? For one, I am not prepared to admit the State of Arkansas on an equal footing with other States, without an effort at least to restrict her to a form of government that shall harmonize with the principles of the constitution. I cannot consent to be driven to sustain a measure fraught with such infinite peril to the cause of personal liberty, without one effort to resist it. I had reason to expect that the committee would have exercised its courtesy in allowing us one day for deliberation. But as it has just refused to rise, and has more than intimated its determination, by frequent vociferations of question! question! to push the bill to a passage at this sitting, or at least to place it where they can stop debate by the previous question, I trust I shall be pardoned for detaining it a few moments with a statement of some of the reasons that shall dictate my vote on the bill.

In touching the subject of slavery, or the right claimed by any State to sustain it, I feel all the delicacy and embarrassment any one can feel, who labors, as I do, under a solemn conviction that they are subjects connected with the highest interest, and I may add domestic safety, of the citizens of the South and Southwestern States of this Union. And I feel the more painful embarrassment from the fresh recollection of the fearful excitement that pervaded all sections of the country, and the consternation it spread among the slaveholding community, at a period immediately preceding this present session of Congress. I would rather have remained silent than provoked anew those discordant feelings, which, at the early period of our deliberations, had marred the harmony of legislation, and which, though half smothered, still smoulders within these walls. I would have refrained from adding one word, but from the impulse of a strong sense of paramount duty which I owe to my station, my constituents, and the cause of humanity. Happy would it have been for the country if these subjects could have been deferred until the recent excitement was fully allayed; an excitement which not only threatened a revolution and a separation of the Union, but was fearfully portentous of a servile war, that must have deluged the fairest portion of this country in the blood of our brethren and kindred—a war that would have proved more relentless and implacable to the cries of defenceless innocence than the most terrific wars of the tomahawk and scalping-knife.

In submitting my brief remarks, I beg to assure gentlemen of the slaveholding States, that while I am opposed to this bill, I hold as sacred and inviolable as any one in this House the rights secured to all those States who were parties to the original compact. I would as readily engage in a crusade against the Union itself, as touch one word or obliterate one letter of that dear-bought compromise which gave them their rights over their slave property. The views which I entertain of the propriety and constitutional authority of perpetuating human slavery in the new States and Territories belonging to this Government have not the slightest application to the original States of the confederacy. The thirteen United States formed so many parties to the compact, each of which were left free to adopt or reject it, ad libitum. While the compact was in progress of formation, each had an undoubted right to propose articles of stipulation, which, when adopted, formed part and parcel of the whole. The instrument, when legalized, was obligatory in all its parts, or in none of them. It bound all the parties, or none; and whatever may be the disadvantages arising to either or any of the parties, there is no remedy save through the mode prescribed in the instrument itself. However deeply we may deplore the existence of slavery at the South, as the compact has left them free to sustain it or not, we are bound to acquiesce in it. Congress has no power to interfere with it without the consent of the States interested. But, sir, the reasons which impel us to acquiesce in the right to hold human beings in slavery among the original States do by no means authorize Congress to perpetuate it in the new one. There is no compact existing between the General Government and any of the new States or the Territory of Arkansas, whereby it has conceded to them the right to barter in human flesh; and I am determined, while I have the honor of a seat on this floor, never to give my vote for a measure that will sanction or permit such a gloomy practice. I shall, therefore, vote very readily and cheerfully against the passage of this bill, and I shall do so under a conscientious belief that Congress has no power to admit a State into the Union with a constitutional government which authorizes and sustains human slavery.

All will concede that Congress acts under constitutional grants, and that it can take nothing by naked implication; that where the terms of the grant are clear and determinate, the exercise of the power derived under it should conform to the letter of the grant. But where the terms are rendered vague by their generality or want of clearness, such construction should be given them as best comports with the spirit of the constitution.

Congress derives its power to admit new States from the third section of the fourth article of the constitution of the United States, which declares that "new States may be admitted by Congress into this Union." Here the terms of the grant are general, and, unconnected with the fourth section of the same article, would literally imply a power to admit a State without regard to its form of government; and yet I presume that, even under this general grant, no gentleman will contend that Congress would be authorized to admit to federal union and political association a State under the sovereignty of a despot. Should such a State apply for admission, and claim its right under this general grant, Congress would appeal to construction, and urge these grounds as a reason for denying the application, that such admission would be contrary to the spirit of the constitution, as it would destroy the unity, impair the harmony, and change the character of our National Government.

But the fourth section of the fourth article of the constitution comes in aid of that power, and renders clear and determinate what was before, from a too great generality of the terms, left doubtful. By that section it is declared that "the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them from invasion." By taking these two sections in connexion, as they clearly should be, the power of Congress over these subjects would be rendered clear, determinate, and consistent with every other grant. The two clauses, taken together, confer a power that is entire, unique, and indivisible, which is expressed thus: "Congress may admit new States into this Union, and the United States shall guaranty a republican form of government, and protect them from invasion." If Congress, then, in admitting a new State, is bound to guaranty a republican form of government, a duty is created which raises a corresponding right to inquire into the terms of the government founded by the State to be admitted, and a right to dictate the form of its fundamental code or constitution, with a view of rendering it consistent with such a form of government; and this it has a right to do, as a fundamental condition of its admission.

In pursuance of this right, and in the exercise of the power, it is the imperious duty of Congress to examine carefully the constitution of Arkansas now before it; and, before that State be admitted into the Union, Congress should be satisfied that the constitution under which it intends to organize will secure to the citizens of that State a republican form of government. This, sir, may be a startling proposition to such as are bred in the school of strict construction, and who claim for the States all power, and leave to the General Government none. It may seem to them to savor of the heresy of consolidation. But, sir, as odious as it may appear to the modern State-right school men, if it be sustained by the constitution in letter or spirit, it will lose nothing by denunciations from that quarter. I disclaim all devotion to the doctrine of consolidation, as defined by the cant scribblers of the day. While I would be proud to acknowledge myself the humble and loyal subject of federal supremacy, I would still claim to be the faithful and fearless advocate of the rights, the unabridged rights, of State sovereignty; but I can never be so far forgetful of the duty I owe to the one, nor so rashly commit myself to the interests of the other, as to surrender the power the constitution has conferred on me, as a representative of the people, of defending the cause of constitutional liberty wherever it may be assailed in the person of any citizen, let him be a resident of what State he will.

What, let me ask gentlemen, were the motive and end of our federal Union? If we may credit the recorded testimony of the patriots who formed it, as avowed in the preamble to the constitution, it was designed "to establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." These, sir, were among the great and noble motives that induced the brave and the wise of former days to propose and establish a national Union. These were the principles, to secure which they incurred all the horrors of a domestic war, and pledged their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honors; and these are the principles which we, as legislators, are required to maintain and defend, not to transgress, either directly, by open acts of violation, or indirectly, by conniving at the introduction or perpetuation of slavery within the boundaries of any of the territories of this Union.

On examining the ordinance adopted by the convention of Arkansas, I find, as a whole, it exhibits the most singular incongruity of parts. While it professes to protect liberty, it establishes the most degrading species of slavery, and dignifies it with a place in the fundamental charter of the Government. It contains many provisions worthy of a free and enlightened people, and such as would excite the admiration of the patriot and philanthropist, while it embraces others that create disgust. It commences, in the language of the convention, with high professions of attachment to the noble maxims of free government, and adopts, almost verbatim, the language of the declaration of independence. It promises to sustain the personal liberty of the citizen, and recommends as essential to the preservation of a free Government a diffusion of knowledge and intellectual improvement among the people. In the main, this ordinance asserts and adopts the elementary principles of a republican Government; and were it not for the insertion of that odious section in relation to human slavery, that discordant note in the music of its parts, it would have commanded my most cordial approbation.

By the first section of the second clause of the ninth article of this ordinance, it is declared "that the General Assembly shall have no power to pass laws for the emancipation of slaves without the consent of the owner; they shall have no power to prevent emigrants to this State from bringing with them such persons as are deemed slaves by the laws of any one of the United States; they shall have power to pass laws to permit the owners of slaves to emancipate them, saving the rights of the creditors, and preventing them from becoming a public charge; they shall have power to prevent slaves from being brought to this State as merchandise, and oblige owners of slaves to treat them with humanity." These are placed alongside of those lofty and admirable provisions to which I have just alluded, and which, were it not for them, would reflect honor and credit upon the people of Arkansas. With these extraordinary and heretical principles avowed and adopted into their constitution, ought we, have we the power, to admit that Territory into the Union "on an equal footing with the other States?" Were I to vote for its admission, I should feel I had done criminal violence to the oath I had taken "to support the constitution of the United States;" I should feel guilty of having neglected an important duty I owe to my country, as one of its representatives—that of "taking care that the republic receive no harm." I cannot vote for the admission of that Territory as long as that section is in her constitution. That section entirely changes the character of the Government. The amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, though it disavows the assent of Congress to that article, does not remove the evil, nor would it restore to it the republican character; it would still be a Government which tolerated the grossest tyranny. I believe, therefore, such admission to be contrary to the spirit, if not the letter, of the constitution.

That instrument does not secure to the people a republican form of government. It permits the existence of the most degrading and absolute species of domestic slavery, and actually prohibits the legislative branch of the Government from passing laws to remove it. It places the slave further beyond the reach of human laws or any of its remedies than it does the property the citizen may hold in inanimate matter. While the Legislature may pass a law taking from you your personal property without your consent, on returning a fair equivalent, it is forbidden to liberate your slave, without consent, for any compensation. I am aware that an opinion prevails throughout a large portion of the Union, and is honestly entertained by a large, honorable, and intelligent class of citizens, that a Government may be republican in its form, and still permit domestic slavery; and they gravely refer us to the laws and usages of ancient republics to sustain them. The truth of this proposition depends upon the fact whether the constitution recognises slavery, or whether it be a usage which has grown up into a custom by common consent, aside from any constitutional provision or sanction. In the first instance, it becomes a fundamental ordinance, which rises above all law; in the second, it is a custom merely, or a law springing from legislative enactments; in which case it is under the control and regulation of the law-making power. In the first instance, the Government is in fault; in the other, the moral condition of the municipal regulations. The one is or ought to be under the supervision of the General Government, the other under that of the State authorities. In the first instance, the Government cannot be called republican; in the other, it may. But, sir, aside from these distinctions, it may be safely affirmed that a republican Government that recognises slavery in its fundamental code, is a gross political solecism, and it can obtain no sanction from the laws and usages of the ancient States. Politicians of the present age should be aware that a political argument, in relation to our national policy, founded upon a supposed resemblance between the tenor and spirit of our Government and those of ancient republics, affords but a feeble authority in defence of the errors of the latter. The term "republican," as applied to the science of government with us, does not borrow its import from the schools of antiquity. Its legitimate application was ascertained and established by the political philologists of the Revolution. The doctors of those days knew best how to apply terms of government to their appropriate ideas. They affixed names to a set of principles that laid the foundation of our happy and much-admired form of government. By a practical experience in the school of adversity, they became familiarly acquainted with the use of those principles, and were enabled to assign them their appropriate objects in the various departments of human society. They tell us "they hold these truths to be self-evident; that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that, to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." These are the political axioms upon which our beautiful and noble constitution was founded. They compose the elements from which it derived its existence, its spirit, and by which it is sustained; and when it speaks of a republican form of government, it contemplates one that imboodies and supports these axioms—one that combines all, and is repugnant to none of them.

How does the constitution of Arkansas comport with this description? Does it teach that all men are created equal? That they are endowed with the inalienable right of liberty and the pursuit of happiness? Or does it hold in substance that one part of mankind are born the slaves of the other? That they are esteemed in the light of nature as property, and the unwilling victims of avarice and speculation? Let the ninth article of the constitution of Arkansas answer the question. By that article the slaves of Arkansas are sunk a grade below the brute beasts that herd in your plains, or the flocks that feed upon the hills. While it treats the slaves as the personal property of the master, it holds them less protected by the laws of God and man than your beasts of burden. Yes, sir, while the common law of the land so far regards the rights and comforts of the domestic animal that its cruel treatment will subject him who inflicts it to an indictment and punishment at law, this ordinance leaves the protection of the slave a contingent right, depending upon the uncertainty of human legislation. It imposes upon the slave the most rigid exactions to obedience of the laws of the State, while it denies him the right to participate in their enactments. In short, sir, to give a synopsis of the whole parallel which may be fairly drawn between the constitutions of the United States and of Arkansas, the former assumes, upon the principles of our declaration of rights, that all men are born equal, and have an equal voice in the formation of that Government by which they are protected and governed; while the latter denies such natural equality, and holds that some men are born slaves, and have no natural right to participate in the formation of that Government to which they are responsible. These form antagonist theses, and assert principles so ample in their influence upon the science of politics, and yet so opposite in their natures and discordant in their tendency, that they cannot but give rise to respective forms of government, which in their character, result, and moral action, will be the antipodes of each other. If this be so, is there not danger that by the admission of a State, with such a form given to its original and fundamental ordinance, we give to the confederacy such conflicting interests and principles of action as to endanger the peace, the harmony, and the safety, of the Union?

The important and impending question then properly recurs, whether the letter or the spirit of the federal constitution will authorize Congress to admit to the bosom of our national Union the State of Arkansas, while its constitution or fundamental ordinance imboodies political elements hostile to personal liberty and the inalienable rights of its citizens.

I am aware that it will be, as it already has been, contended that, by the Missouri compromise, as it has been preposterously termed, Congress has parted with its right to prohibit the introduction of slavery within any part of the territory of the Louisiana purchase south of thirty-six degrees and thirty minutes of north latitude. There are to my mind two substantial and unanswerable objections to the soundness of that proposition. In the first place, there was no compromise or compact whereby Congress surrendered any power, or yielded any jurisdiction; and, in the second place, if it had done so, it was a mere legislative act, that could not bind their successors; it would be subject to repeal at the will of any succeeding Congress. There was no compromise of surrender on the part of the General Government. In the series of acts and resolutions passed on that occasion, there were a number of reservations of power and right, and some restrictions imposed upon the constitution of Missouri; but in no part of the history of that case can you find a solitary act of relinquishment. By the act of Congress of the 6th of March, 1820, authorizing the people of the Territory of Missouri to form a constitution and State Government, there were two very important restrictions imposed upon the convention in relation to this very subject. By the proviso to the fourth section they were required to form a constitution republican in its form, and not repugnant to that of the United States; and, by the eighth section, slavery and involuntary servitude were forever prohibited in "all that part of the territory ceded by France to the United States lying north of thirty-six degrees and thirty minutes of north latitude, and not included within the limits of that State." Under this act, the people of Missouri, on the 12th of June of the same year, called a convention, and agreed upon a constitution embracing an article in principle precisely like that in the ninth article of the constitution of Arkansas, prohibiting its General Assembly from passing any law emancipating slaves without the consent of the owner. There was another clause in their constitution equally repugnant to civil liberty, which prohibited free negroes and mulattoes from settling in that State under any pretext whatever. This constitution was submitted to Congress at its next session, and gave rise to a discussion which, whether we consider its protracted length, or the thrilling interest it excited throughout the country, has never been surpassed on any other occasion in the annals of our legislation. This fearful war of words, which put in jeopardy the Union itself, resulted in the adoption of a resolution by Congress admitting that State into the Union, upon the fundamental condition that the convention should repeal the fourth clause of the twenty-sixth section of the third article in her constitution, which authorizes her Legislature to pass laws prohibiting "free negroes and mulattoes from settling in that State, under any pretext whatever," and pledge the faith of the State that no such law ever should be passed. The convention of Missouri assented to the restriction imposed by the resolution, and complied with the condition, and, by a subsequent provision of the General Government, she was admitted into the Union without the addition of one word or one syllable in relation to the subject of slavery.

Where, sir, permit me to ask, can you find, in all these, the terms of a compromise, in law or in fact? Surely there is none expressed; and it would be dangerous to admit one by implication. The first act expressly requires her to establish a republican form of government, and positively forbids the introduction of slavery into any part of the territory out of which that State was carved, north of a certain line of latitude. And the subsequent resolution of Congress of 1821 requires of the convention to expunge from the constitution another exceptionable article in relation to free negroes and mulattoes, to which requisition it implicitly complied. But, sir, where will you find an act of concession or surrendry? The clear inference to be drawn from a careful examination of the whole case is, that Congress never did relinquish her prerogative of power or jurisdiction over any part of this subject or territory. The most that can be said of the subsequent act of admission of that new State, with that exceptionable clause in her constitution, will, I apprehend, amount to this: that the General Government slept upon its rights, and suffered the constitution, by its culpable negligence, (which, be it known, received the merited rebuke of the people,) to be violated in one of its most solemn and sacred provisions.

But, sir, if there was a compact or compromise, who were the parties? Now, I suppose, in legislation and diplomacy, as in law, to every compact there must be at least two parties. The Federal Government and the sovereignty of Missouri were the parties litigant, or contracting parties. Concede, for the argument, that this transaction should be dignified with the solemnity of a compromise: what were its terms? Why, that Missouri should come into the Union, bringing with her a fundamental law perpetuating slavery, and that she should relinquish her right to prohibit free negroes and mulattoes from settling in that State. Admit this to be a compact, and the terms just recited the articles of stipulation, what connexion or relation does it bear to the constitution of Arkansas? What right or power had Missouri to make a compact or compromise which should act, prospectively, over a new, uninhabited, and then unsurveyed wilderness, wholly without its boundaries? What right had Missouri to dictate terms of admission to a State not then in existence? Surely, if such compromise had been formed, the people of Arkansas would have been at full liberty to disavow it. It could not bind them, neither could it the General Government. This is not a compromise, not even as it regards Missouri, much less in its operation upon the rights and immunities of the people of Arkansas.

Mr. BRIGGS said: After having sat here twelve hours, he left the House, exhausted, at ten o'clock last evening. At daylight this morning he was notified by one of the messengers of the House that his attendance was again desired. When he entered the hall, he learned that the committee had just taken up the bill for the admission of Arkansas into the Union. His respected colleague across the way [Mr. ADAMS] was upon the floor, having just offered an amendment to the bill. That amendment related to an article in the constitution of Arkansas on the subject of slavery. He knew the committee had dragged out a long, a weary night, and were worn down with their protracted labors; yet such was the magnitude of the subject, he felt himself impelled by an imperious sense of duty to submit a few remarks for the consideration of the committee. He was fully aware that this subject of slavery was one of extreme delicacy, and its discussion in any form was calculated to awaken the sensibilities of gentlemen from the Southern portion of the Union; but he hoped he could speak of it in a manner and with a temper that would not alarm the apprehensions or wound the feelings of any gentleman on this floor. Members from the South had spoken of the institution of slavery, and expressed their opinion upon it with the utmost freedom. Of this he did not complain. The opinions which they held he did not doubt were honestly entertained. They had grown up with them from their infancy, and they had their origin in the deep-rooted institutions and laws in the midst of which they were born. He, and those whom he represented, entertained opinions directly the opposite of those to which he had alluded. They entertained them with as much sincerity, and with as profound a conviction of their truth and correctness, as actuated those who differed from them. He claimed for himself, and those who agreed with him, the same right and privilege, of maintaining their views by fair arguments in this House, as he conceded to those who were opposed to them, and nothing more.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] who preceded him had said that the amendment offered by his colleague was substantially a revival of the Missouri question. He differed from the gentleman upon this point entirely. The proposition embraced in this amendment was altogether unlike that which raised a tempest in this Capitol, and shook this Union to its centre, in the discussion of the Missouri question. He should regret to see the ill blood and fearful agitation of that day again produced. There is nothing in the amendment calculated to lead to such a result. In that controversy there was a direct proposition to impose upon the State of Missouri, as a condition of her admission into the Union, a positive restriction against the right and power to hold slaves within the limits of her territory.

H. of R.]

But what, sir, is proposed by the amendment of my colleague? The people of Arkansas have assembled in convention, and formed a constitution. They have come to this Congress, and presented their claim for admission into the Union as a sovereign State. They present that constitution for our perusal and approval. On looking into it, we find in its ninth article the following clause: "The General Assembly shall have no power to pass laws for the emancipation of slaves, without the consent of their owners."

My colleague proposes to amend the eighth section of the bill "for the admission of Arkansas into the Union," by inserting the following declaration: "And nothing in this act shall be construed as an assent by Congress to the article in the constitution of the said State in relation to slavery and the emancipation of slaves." It must be seen at a glance that this simple, plain declaration contains nothing of the principle which gave rise to the Missouri controversy. In that case a restriction was imposed upon Missouri, which denied to that State certain rights and powers that, under the constitution of the United States, were possessed by other States. The advocates of the State contended that Congress had no authority to enforce that restriction, or limitation, upon her sovereignty. This amendment does not, in the slightest degree, abridge, restrain, or in any manner interfere with, the prerogative or power of Arkansas as an independent State. If adopted, it will not postpone her admission into the Union a single day. It does not question the right of her citizens to any species of property recognised by the constitution or laws of the State. It imposes no restraint upon her political power and sovereignty. It simply denies that, by the act of admitting her into the Union, with this article incorporated into her constitution, Congress gives its assent to the principles of that article. Without this protestation, the act of admission would be, at least, an implied assent to this extraordinary constitutional provision. Whilst such an approbation would be of no use or benefit to that State, it would be in direct violation of the opinion of a large majority of the members of this House, and the known sentiments of the people which they represent. What good reason, then, can be urged why this amendment should not be adopted? Are gentlemen prepared to say, by their votes to reject this most reasonable proposition, that this act shall be construed as an assent by Congress to the article in the constitution of the State in relation to slavery and the emancipation of slaves? Will not such an inference be the natural and necessary result of such a vote? I ask gentlemen, whose opinions I know coincide with my own upon this subject, to consider well before they take a step which cannot be retraced.

Mr. Chairman, the word "slave," or "slavery," is nowhere to be found in the constitution of the United States. Whilst that instrument, by its various provisions, guaranties to the people of the States their rights to property acknowledged by the laws of the several States, its patriotic framers most cautiously avoided the use of terms which would admit that man could be made the property of his fellow-man.

If, in the course of events, the people of every State in this Union shall abolish slavery within their own limits, and the time shall come when there will not be a bondman in all this great and free republic, generations who shall succeed us will find no evidence in this constitution that such an institution as slavery ever had an existence.

The people of Arkansas have used less caution than did the framers of the federal constitution. Though their constitution was to be presented to a Congress, for its approval, composed of members a majority of whom, in both branches, represent constituents opposed to slavery in every form, it contains an article the design and effect of which is to make involuntary servitude perpetual within her limits. This is much to be regretted. If she had pursued a different course, the difficulties which now present themselves would have been avoided, without any prejudice to her rights or wishes. Can it be expected that the Representatives from the free States of this Union will give their assent to this exceptionable article? In justice to those whom they represent, can they do less than to express their dissent from it? It has been shown that this amendment can have no injurious effect upon the rights of the people of Arkansas. Will members on this floor, coming from States whose people are known to be hostile to the principle of this article in the constitution presented for their approval, be faithful to the trust reposed in them, if they fail to declare their disapprobation of it? I call upon gentlemen from the non-slaveholding States truly to reflect the sentiments of their constituents, and support their well-known opinions upon this subject, by voting for the amendment now before us. Can they, with propriety or consistency, approve of a principle universally condemned by their constituents? I appeal to the candor of gentlemen from the slaveholding States, and ask them if, in their opinion, it would be just or reasonable to desire us to do this? Whilst they stand by their constituents, and manfully maintain their rights, and defend their interests, shall we be recreant to our duty and fail to avow and defend the doctrine of those who honor us with their confidence? Sir, I hope not.

Mr. Chairman, to the utmost of my powers, I will, here and elsewhere, support all the rights of all the States of this Union, defined and secured by the constitution of the United States. I regard them all as equally sacred and inviolable. That instrument was the result of a compromise of conflicting opinions and conflicting interests; of mutual concessions and mutual pledges. It is my duty to stand by and maintain it in all its parts. It is the supreme law of the land, and its provisions are alike binding upon all the citizens and all the States of this confederacy. With those rights secured by that binding charter I will never interfere.

But, sir, upon this subject of slavery I cannot go the breadth of a hair beyond the obligations imposed upon me by that instrument. I never can consent, with the views which I now entertain, to give a vote, or do any other act, which shall sanction the principle, or extend the existence of human slavery. In the deep conviction of my own mind and heart, I believe it to be politically and morally wrong.

With all my soul I approve of, and believe in the truth of that great principle avowed and proclaimed to the world in the declaration of independence, "that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." I do not look upon that declaration as the mere publication of a truth, beautiful in theory only, and not capable of a practical application. On the contrary, I believe it may be, and in all free Governments should be, carried out in practice. It is based on the principles of eternal truth and justice, and will abide when all existing Governments and human institutions shall have decayed and passed away. Holding these opinions, sir, how can I give any sanction to that highly exceptionable article in the constitution of Arkansas, presented for our approval; and which, by the bill before us, we do approve of, and assent to, unless we negative that assent by some such amendment as the one under consideration? In doing so, I should violate my own sense of propriety and right, and be treacherous to the freemen who sent me here. In voting for the amendment of my colleague, I shall vindicate my own and the undivided sentiments of my constituents, without impairing any of the guarantees of the constitution, or impairing the rights of any State in this Union.

The gentleman from Virginia challenges a discussion upon the question, whether the constitution of Arkansas is republican in its character. A debate upon that question cannot be necessary to the settlement of the proposition immediately before us. At this untimely hour, and before this committee, wearied out by a continued session of more than twenty hours, I will not stop to discuss the republicanism in that article in the constitution of Arkansas which dooms a large portion of her present and future population to unconditional and interminable slavery. I will only say, sir, that my notions of republican liberty are widely different from the principles of that article.

The debate was further continued by Mr. WISE.

The question was then taken, at about 4 o'clock in the morning, and the amendment negatived by a vote of 98 to 32.

Mr. ADAMS moved that the committee rise. Lost—44 to 93.

Mr. HARLAN moved an amendment, as follows:

“Amend in section 5, line 3, by striking out two thousand and inserting one thousand five hundred. In 4th line, add, after the word his, the words acceptance of the, so as to make the section read as follows: 1

“Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That there shall be allowed to the judge of the said district court the annual compensation of one thousand five hundred dollars, to commence from the date of his acceptance of the appointment, to be paid quarterly yearly at the Treasury of the United States.”

Mr. HARLAN remarked that, in submitting this amendment for consideration, it was not his intention to detain the committee at this early hour in the morning. He asked the indulgence of the committee, however, to make a very brief explanation of his object in offering the amendment.

The bill provides for the appointment of a district judge, at an annual salary of $2,000, to commence from the date of his appointment. The amendment proposed by him reduces the salary to $1,500 per annum, to commence from the date of the acceptance of the office.

There are now three judges in Arkansas, who perform all the business of the Territory at a salary of $1,200 each; but when it becomes a State, nearly the whole of the business will be performed by the State courts. The present judges have very extensive circuits, and necessarily spend much of their time and money in travelling to different parts of the Territory. No complaint has been heard from them of the inadequacy of their compensation.

The compensation proposed by the bill to be given to the district judge exceeds that given to the same officer in many of the States of this Union. The district judge in each of the States of Connecticut, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Delaware, Tennessee, and Kentucky, received an annual compensation of $1,500. In Vermont and Missouri, $1,200; and in New Hampshire, Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, $1,000. It is not pretended that the duties to be performed by the district judge of Arkansas will be more laborious or difficult than in either of the States above mentioned. Why, then, the disproportion in the compensation?

It seems to me (said Mr. H.) that there is a concerted movement by many of the officers of this Government to procure an increase of their salaries. The army of clerks in this city have moved in solid column to effect that object. The honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. C. JOHNSON,] who has heretofore been so generally uniform in his opposition to an increase of salaries, and the extravagant expenditure of the public money, has reported a bill from the Committee of Ways and Means, reducing the number of clerks from 366 to 321; and giving to the latter about eighty thousand dollars annually, more than were paid to the former number. If this be one of the modes of distributing the surplus money in the Treasury, it will not obtain my assent. The offices of the Federal Government at the present salaries are sought after with much avidity; but whenever it is ascertained that the services of persons competent to discharge the duties cannot be obtained at the present salaries, then, and not till then, will be the proper time to increase them.

I object (said Mr. H.) to that part of this bill which provides that the salary of the judge to be appointed shall commence from the date of the appointment. If the amendment which I have had the honor to propose prevails, the salary will commence from the time of the acceptance of the office, instead of from the date of the commission. The presumption is, that a citizen of Arkansas will receive the appointment. Several months will necessarily elapse from the time of signing the commission by the President and the acceptance by the appointee. During that time the judge is to be paid; and for what? He not only will not have rendered any service, but will be wholly ignorant of his appointment. If one who is now in the pay of the Government should be appointed, he will receive his salary to the date of his resignation, and be entitled by this bill to receive the salary of the new office from the date of the commission. It seems to me that the compensation of an officer ought to commence from the time he intimates his readiness to engage in the public service, by accepting an appointment, and not from the time the President decides on the appointment.

The amendment was rejected: Ayes 32, noes not counted.

The Arkansas bill was then laid aside, and the committee took up the “supplementary bill for the admission of Arkansas into the Union, and for other purposes.”

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, moved that the committee rise and report the two Michigan and Arkansas bills to the House.

Considerable confusion arose as to whether the Michigan bill had been ordered to be reported to the House, or merely laid aside, and was still open to amendment.

Mr. MASON withdrew his motion, and

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved an amendment prescribing certain other conditions on which Michigan should be admitted. Lost.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, renewed the motion that the committee rise, and report the bills to the House. [This was about 7 o'clock.]

Mr. SLADE moved to amend the Arkansas bill by inserting therein the following:

“After the words in the first section, ‘that the State of Arkansas shall be one, and is hereby declared to be one, of the United States of America, and admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects,’ add, ‘whenever the people of said State shall, by a convention, duly elected, expunge from its present constitution so much thereof as prohibits the General Assembly from passing laws for the emancipation of slaves without the consent of the owners; and shall also provide in and by said constitution that no negro or mulatto, born in or brought into said State after its admission into the Union, shall be held or transferred as property, or in any way subjected to slavery or involuntary servitude, unless in punishment for crimes committed against the laws of said State, whereof the party accused shall be duly convicted.' "

Mr. CAVE JOHNSON made a question of order. The Arkansas bill having been laid aside, was not open to amendment.

After some conversation and considerable confusion,

Mr. E. WHITTLESEY appealed to the gentleman from Vermont to withdraw the amendment, one of the same tenor having been offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ANAMS,] and rejected.

Mr. SLADE declined, and addressed the House in support of the motion.

Mr. JENIFER rose to reply, and proceeded to make some general remarks on the subject of the abolition movements, when he was called to order by Mr. BYNUM and others, on the ground that his remarks were irrelevant.

After some words between Messrs. JENIFER and BYNUM,

The motion of Mr. SLADE was rejected.

Mr. WISE then rose and addressed the House at length in opposition to the course of the majority, in pressing this question upon a House, sleepy, tired, and drunk. He was opposed to the motion that the committee report the bills, and said he would speak till ten o'clock, when the House would be under the necessity of dropping the subject, as it was not a special order for Friday.

Mr. WISE several times gave way to motions that the committee rise, which were lost, without a count.

At half past nine, Mr. WISE having yielded the floor, Mr. McKENNAN suggested that, as the members were much exhausted, the committee should rise, with the understanding that the House should then adjourn till to-morrow, when the gentleman from Virginia would resume his remarks.

Mr. WISE said that it was true that he was in an unfit condition to continue his remarks; but it was near ten o'clock, and he had it in his power to have his will over this subject, and, so help him God, he would persevere, if he died by it.

Mr. WISE proceeded in his remarks till ten o'clock.

Mr. CHAMBERS, of Kentucky, then rose, Mr. WISE having temporarily yielded the floor, and called upon the Chair to decide whether the committee could continue to sit, it now being ten o'clock, the hour assigned by the rules for the House to meet, and the Speaker to take the chair.

Mr. WISE said he would ask of the Sergeant-at-arms, where now is the Speaker of the House?

"In his room," was answered by some one.

Mr. DENNY called for the reading of the rules of the House respecting the daily adjournment and meeting of the House.

Mr. WHITTLESEY suggested to the Chair, whether, in the case of bills made the order of the day for a particular portion of the day, it had not been the uniform practice, when the limited time expired, for the chairman of the committee to leave the chair, to allow the House to proceed on its other business.

Mr. WISE called for the reading of the resolution by which the bills now before the committee were made the special order of the day.

The resolution was read, "making the bill to establish the northern boundary of Ohio, and the bills for the admission of Michigan and Arkansas into the Union, the special order of the day for Wednesday next, and each day thereafter, Fridays and Saturdays excepted, until the same be disposed of."

Mr. McKENNAN called for the reading of a resolution, passed some weeks ago, (and it was read,) providing that, after a certain day, the daily sittings of the House shall commence at ten o'clock in the morning.

Mr. WHITTLESEY called for the reading of one of the standing rules of the House, and it was read, as follows:

"Touching the duties of the Speaker.—He shall take the chair every day precisely at the hour to which the House shall have adjourned on the preceding day; shall immediately call the members to order; and, on the appearance of a quorum, shall cause the journal of the preceding day to be read."

Mr. LOVE said he would, with permission of the Chair, ask the question whether, if the committee refused to rise, and sat on until to-morrow, the members of this House would be considered as entitled to pay for two days' or for one day's service.

Mr. McKENNAN asked of the Chair, as a question of order, whether it was not the duty of the Speaker to take the chair every day on the arrival of the hour of 10 o'clock?

The CHAIRMAN said that he should not undertake, in his present place, (of chairman of the Committee of the Whole,) to decide any question in reference to the duty of the Speaker of the House.

Mr. McKENNAN then moved that the committee rise, for the purpose of deciding in the House that question.

Mr. PICKENS called for the reading of the 105th and 106th rules of the House; and they were read, as follows:

"The rules of proceedings in the House shall be observed in a Committee of the Whole House, so far as they may be applicable, except the rule limiting the time of speaking; but no member shall speak twice on any question, until every member choosing to speak shall have spoken.

"No standing rule or order of the House shall be rescinded or changed without one day's notice being given of the motion therefor. Nor shall any rule be suspended, except by a vote of at least two thirds of the members present. Nor shall the order of business, as established by the rules of the House, be postponed or changed, except by a vote of at least two thirds of the members present."

Mr. BELL said he did not know, nor was it material to what he rose to say, what object could be accomplished by prolonging the present sitting; but it was, in his opinion, the duty of the committee to rise, in order to decide the question of order now raised. A majority of the committee might indeed oblige the committee to continue in session; but they would do it in defiance of the express rule of the House. There was no alternative in the present case, under the rules, but for the committee to rise. It would be in the power of the majority, when in the House, to direct the continuation of the discussion; to which, for his part, (Mr. B. said,) he should not object. But he begged of gentlemen to respect not the parliamentary law, but the positive written rules of the House.

Mr. GLASCOCK said there had, in the present case, been no adjournment from yesterday's sitting; and that the practice of courts of justice, in similar cases, would be a proper rule for this House, viz: that the day's sitting should be considered to extend to the time of adjournment. The principle contended for by gentlemen could not apply in the present case, because there had been no adjournment.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, suggested, as a mode of freeing the House from its present embarrassment, that the committee should now rise, and let these bills be made the special order for to-day; so that they would come up again as a matter of course, on the House resuming its sitting after an adjournment.

The question was taken on the motion which had been made for the committee to rise, and determined in the negative.

Mr. WISE then resumed the thread of his remarks upon the bill, and having concluded,

Mr. McKENNAN obtained the floor. The members of the House were, he said, evidently all worn out by this protracted sitting; many had not slept, and others had not broken their fast. All had need of repose. We have, said he, fought the bill manfully, and done our best to stave off the decision upon it. My friend from Virginia (especially) has fought it hard and long, and has, in fact, verified the old adage, "a lean dog for a long chase." I hope, sir, the committee will rise, and report the bills, and that we shall adjourn over till to-morrow.

Mr. McK. made a motion to this effect.

The motion was carried. The committee rose, and reported the two bills, and the House then adjourned over to meet on Saturday, at the usual hour, (10 o'clock.)

SATURDAY, JUNE 11.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.

During the reading of the journal this morning, the House was thrown into some confusion by a disturbance between one of the regular reporters for one of the city papers, and another who usually reports in the Senate for a distant paper. The former was taken into custody instantly by the order of the Speaker, and the other was also subsequently ordered into custody, on the adoption of the following order, submitted by Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina: "Ordered, that both persons be taken into custody, to await the order of the House in the premises."

[The following statement made by Mr. GILLET of what passed under his own observation, will sufficiently explain the character of the transaction:]

Mr. GILLET said he rose to state the facts in this matter as far as he saw them. Some part of what passed, which he had observed, had not been mentioned by any member who had addressed the House. He happened to be looking toward that part of the House at the time of the occurrence. When he first saw the parties, the individual now at the desk was sitting in his chair with his pen in his hand, and the person who is now out of the House was standing in front of the desk, and appeared to be holding a conversation with him. The latter individual threw his hat at the person at the desk, and it swept along on the desk, and he thought hit him. The absent individual then sprang up the steps leading to the desk, raised his cane, and struck two or three times at the person now in the desk. This the latter person did not resist, but raised his hands over his head to fend off the blows. This is what passed under Mr. G's own observation, in which he thought he could not be mistaken in the material facts.

Having seen, as he believed, the whole of what passed at the time, he could not vote to take the person at the desk into custody as having committed any offence, on the present occasion, against the order and dignity of the House. He knew not what passed in the conversation alluded to between these individuals, and he did not know but in it the person at the desk had, in language, insulted the other. But of that we have no evidence. This House, he thought, could only act on evidence. He did not even know the names of these individuals, nor for what paper the person, now at the desk, reports, or whether he was a reporter at all. He knew nothing of him in any respect whatever. He might be the best or the worst man living. He could only act on what he saw. The person who had been taken into custody had occupied a chair at the desk during the whole session, he believed, and he knew nothing of him but what was gentlemanly and proper, except the striking on the present occasion. In voting, he should act solely on what he saw himself, unless he had additional evidence, and not on the merits of the controversy between these persons, nor on their merits as individuals, in society. This House certainly has no right to inquire into the personal difficulties of these parties. Whether the one or the other of them is most to blame, is nothing to the House, nor can they inquire into the general good or bad character of either. These matters do not particularly concern us as a legislative body. All that we have to look to and act upon is the breach of order and decorum in the House, whereby our proceedings have been disturbed. Our jurisdiction extends only to cases which disturb the business and order of the House, and not to difficulties between individuals, or matters touching their characters and conduct on other occasions. Offences not committed here must be left for the ordinary tribunals of the country. He could not vote for taking a person into custody, as an offender against the order of the House, until he had evidence that he had really committed an offence which should authorize it.

The reading of the journal was then proceeded with; and a motion made by Mr. ADAMS to amend the journal, by correcting it as to the excuse made by Mr. HAWES, at the last sitting, for his temporary absence from the House, was discussed at some length by Messrs. ADAMS, BOON, MASON of Virginia, WHITTLESEY of Ohio, WILLIAMS of North Carolina, MERCER, and SPEIGHT.

Mr. ADAMS asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. SPEIGHT suggested to the gentleman from New York to withdraw that motion.

Mr. MERCER raised the point of order, if such a motion could be made.

Mr. MANN accordingly withdrew the motion, and

Mr. SPEIGHT moved the previous question; which was seconded by the House, and the main question ordered.

Several members were excused from voting, on the ground that they were not in the House when the occurrence referred to in the entry on the journal took place.

The question was then taken, and decided in the negative: Yeas 32, nays 133.

An amendment was then made to the journal by general consent, on motion of Mr. MERCER.

Mr. ADAMS rose and called the attention of the House to the circumstance of the two individuals then in the custody of the Sergeant-at-arms, for creating a disturbance in the precincts of the hall.

Mr. JUDSON then, on leave, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed, to consist of _____ members, whose duty it shall be to inquire into an assault committed within the hall of the House of Representatives this morning, while the House were in session, for and on account of which two persons are now in custody of the Sergeant-at-arms; and said committee are to make their report to this House, and said committee be instructed to administer oaths, and to cause the attendance of witnesses.

Mr. BRIGGS moved to insert the word "forthwith;" which Mr. JUDSON accepted as a modification.

After some conversation between Messrs. MANN of New York, ADAMS, and BELL,

H. OF R.]

Pension Bills.

[JUNE 11, 1836.]

Mr. BELL moved the following two resolutions as a substitute:

Resolved, That the two reporters, Henry G. Wheeler and Robert Codd, who are now in the custody of the Sergeant-at-arms, upon a charge of disorderly conduct in the presence of the House, be delivered over to the civil authorities, to be dealt with according to law.

Resolved, That in adopting the preceding resolution, the House are not influenced by an opinion of any deficiency of authority in the House to punish for disorderly conduct in their presence.

Mr. BELL explained his object to be to get rid of the difficulty for the present, without waiving the authority of the House in such cases. Out of one hundred lawyers in the House, no two would probably agree as to the mode of proceedings in this case, or as to the degree and mode of punishment for the breach of privilege involved in it. At this stage of the session, when the time of the House was so precious, he was anxious to get rid of the subject. At a future time, he hoped that some law would be enacted defining the privileges of the House, and the mode of punishing breaches of privilege.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he had, of course, had but a moment's time to reflect upon the subject now before the House, but he must confess that the proposition of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, to turn these transgressors over to the civil authority, struck him favorably; and if now called upon to vote, he would vote for it. And he would do so the more readily, because the second resolution guarded amply against any disclaimer of power on our part to punish for contempts. The amendment admitted that we had the power to punish for a breach of the privilege of this House. But because we had power to do a thing, it did not follow that it was always wise to do it. He thought we would much better subserve the interest of our constituents by attending to the various public bills before us, instead of entering upon the trial of these men. We were now in the seventh month of our session, and many if not most of the important bills reported to the House were not finally acted upon. There was the fortification bill, the land bill, and the bill to regulate the deposits in the local banks, all of which were yet undisposed of; and he thought the interest of the nation would be better promoted by attention to those important subjects, than by trying these pugilistic gentlemen. From the time that had already been consumed this morning upon the question whether both men should be arrested, and from the knowledge we all had of the disposition here to talk, we could fairly conclude that this subject, if a select committee were appointed, would occupy at least a week of the precious time of this House. The committee would report the evidence, the views of gentlemen would conflict as to the culpability of the one or the other, and upon the question of guilt there could not fail to be a protracted debate; but when we came to the question what punishment we would inflict, there would be still greater diversity of opinion, and much greater disposition to debate. In view of this inevitable consumption of the precious time of this House, if a select committee were appointed, he would vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

After some further remarks from Messrs. BELL, LANE, JUDSON, MANN of New York, MILLER, SPEIGHT, C. ALLAN, and CRAIG,

Mr. BELL withdrew his resolution, and

Mr. ADAMS inquired by what law or authority it was that these individuals were now in custody?

Mr. BOULDIN rose to ask what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] meant? Did he suppose that the privileges of the people of this country were so great that their own servants and Representatives could not go on with their business, but that their own members, or even reporters, might go on fighting in their presence, and they have no right to take the offenders into custody? Did he mean that individuals not members might raise quarrels out of doors, and one or more of them run into this hall for protection, and we not have power to take them—lay hold on them? This he said was imprisonment, not power to pitch them out of doors; not the right given to take them, and send them to a justice of the peace.

If these were the privileges of the people, they exercised the privilege of sending us to this House little to their credit or advantage to themselves, and less to ours.

He would have voted for the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] and was sorry it was withdrawn. He wished to get clear of these disturbers of the peace as quick as possible.

He had no doubt the law would settle the thing very well. We had something else to do than to try such offenders. He had nothing against either of them. They had disturbed us a little, and he would be glad to have no more trouble with them, or about them.

Mr. HIESTER then moved the previous question; which was seconded: Ayes 94, noes not counted; and the main question being ordered, was put, and agreed to without a count.

So the resolution was agreed to, and the committee was ordered to consist of five members.

The following gentlemen composed the select committee: Mr. JUDSON of Connecticut, Mr. MASON of Virginia, Mr. BELL of Tennessee, Mr. MANN of New York, and Mr. WILLIAMS of North Carolina.

PENSION BILLS.

The hour from 11 to 12 of this day having been specially set apart for the consideration of "pension bills," and that hour having elapsed, from the length of time occupied in reading and amending the journal,

Mr. WARDWELL moved to set apart the residue of this day for that purpose; which was agreed to.

The House then went into Committee of the Whole, (Mr. CRAIG in the chair,) and first took up the following bill:

"A bill extending the provisions of the act entitled 'An act supplementary to the act for the relief of certain surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolution.'"

Mr. C. ALLAN moved to amend the bill by extending its provisions to all those who were engaged in the Indian wars from 1781 to 1795.

After some remarks from Messrs. C. ALLAN, WARDWELL, McKENNAN, and McKAY, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved to amend the bill by striking out "three," and inserting "six" months, as the term of service entitling an individual to a pension under the provisions of the bill.

The amendment was discussed by Messrs. MANN of New York, D. J. PEARCE, LANE, and WARDWELL.

Mr. BOON said that he would detain the committee but a very short time, as his only object in rising was to reply very briefly to the objections which had been urged against the measure proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MANN,] for whose opinions, Mr. B. said, he had a very high regard. The gentleman from New York had stated, that to extend the pension system to the three months' men, and to those who were engaged in the Indian wars, would be a drain upon the Treasury of more than four millions of dollars. Sir, said Mr. B., suppose this estimate to be correctly stated, for what better or nobler purpose could such an amount of the public treasure be expended? When I first came into Congress, some ten years since, the old Indian fighters who then stood at the bar of this House, and petitioned Congress to compensate them for services rendered in defence of their country, and for property taken and destroyed by the enemy, were then told that they might go home to live in penury and want the remaining remnant of their days, as there was a large national debt to pay, and an empty Treasury to meet it.

Now, sir, we are told that there is in the Treasury of the United States some forty or fifty millions of dollars, over and above the wants of the Government; and yet, justice is withheld by the Government from those who have fought the battles of their country, and who, from old age and other causes, are unable to make a comfortable support for themselves and their families. Many of them have gone down to their graves, and left a helpless widow, with a family of small children, thrown upon the cold charity of the world for support. Who, I ask, Mr. Chairman, braved the bloody tomahawk and scalping-knife of a savage foe, and gave rise to the settlement and value of your vast public domain, which now yields annually to your Treasury millions and millions of dollars? Sir, it was the citizen soldiers of the West. Sir, they are the sons and grandsons of the revolutionary heroes of the old thirteen States of the Union. And now that your Treasury is full to overflowing, shall a just reward for their patriotic services be longer withheld? I trust not, Mr. Chairman. Shall we now, for the purpose of creating a large surplus revenue, to be distributed among the several States of the Union, thereby creating a host of stipendiary pensioners upon the Treasury, who never performed one hour's service to their country, turn a deaf ear to the petitions and well-founded and just claims of these meritorious men, who, by their sacrifices and deeds of noble daring, have contributed so much to our present prosperous and happy condition as a nation?

I, Mr. Chairman, would most cheerfully give my vote to appropriate the last dollar of the surplus revenue in the Treasury, in compensating those who have performed service in the defence of their country. I appeal to gentlemen of the Northern and Southern States of this Union, where so many millions of dollars of the public treasure have been expended for public services rendered, and for the defence of the Atlantic seaboard, to do justice to the Western States. I mean the old soldiers who have been mainly instrumental in giving settlement and value to your vast public domain. Grant the poor pittance asked for by the friends of this amendment to your pension laws, and, sir, you will not only have performed an act of sheer justice to a most meritorious class of our fellow-citizens, but, sir, you and your Government will have the lasting gratitude of the surviving soldier, and of the surviving widows and children and grandchildren of those patriot soldiers who have been gathered home to their fathers. Sir, let it not be said that this Government has subjected itself to the charge of injustice or ingratitude towards its faithful sustainers.

The amendment was then disagreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD moved so to amend the bill as to provide pensions for the widows of those engaged in the Indian wars; which, after some remarks from that gentleman, was agreed to.

Mr. WARDWELL moved to include "minute men;" which, after some debate between Messrs. WARDWELL, RENCHER, ANTHONY, VANDERPOEL, and HAMER, was disagreed to.

After some further proceedings and debate, the bill was finished and laid aside.

The committee also considered about one hundred bills for the relief of individual pensioners; all which were reported; and those to which no exception was taken were, in mass, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time on Monday.

LESLIE COMBES.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the Senate bill for the relief of Leslie Combes; and, after some remarks from Messrs. PARKER, C. ALLAN, UNDERWOOD, and HAWES, the bill was ordered to a third reading.

JEAN BAPTISTE JANIS.

The bill for the relief of Jean Baptiste Janis was then taken up.

Mr. WARDWELL moved to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. REYNOLDS rose and said:

Mr. Speaker: I do not intend at this late period of the session, and at this time on Saturday evening, to trouble the House with a long speech. I would be pleased if the Clerk will read the commission which Colonel Clark gave to the claimant, appointing him an ensign in a company commanded by Captain Francois Charleville, which commission is now in possession of the House. I would be also well pleased if the Clerk would read the report or statement of the claimant.

[These documents were not read, as their existence and validity were not doubted.]

Mr. R. further said that it was a matter of history, recorded and known to the country, that Colonel George Rogers Clark, in the year 1778, marched a regiment to the Illinois country, and on that consideration his corps was called "the Illinois regiment;" that on the 4th July, at night, 1778, he entered the town of Kaskaskia with his troops, and captured that place. At the same time there were other settlements and towns in the possession of the enemy near and in the same region of country which at that time was called "the Illinois country."

After taking possession of another village, (Copolia,) which is situated, as Kaskaskia is, near the Mississippi river, Colonel Clark made preparation to capture also from the enemy the military post Vincennes. This expedition was performed in the year 1779. This became necessary, or the conquests already made would not secure the citizens of Kentucky and elsewhere from the inroads made into their country by the Indians, who were inflamed against the Americans by the English. Vincennes was a post which was defended by the British soldiers to the amount Mr. R. could not then recollect; but it was a fort of some strength; and in which, as well as I recollect, Governor Hamilton commanded. In order to be able to succeed in the capture of this post, and thereby to insure peace and quiet to the citizens, Colonel Clark was compelled to enlist into the regiment under his command two companies more. One company was commanded by Captain Charleville, whom I mentioned before, and another commanded by Captain McCarty; one raised in Kaskaskia, and the other in Copokia, and both organized and composed a part of "the Illinois regiment," under the command of Colonel Clark.

The claimant of this pension, Jean B. Janis, was, as I before stated, appointed an ensign in the company commanded by Captain Charleville.

These are all historic facts, which are on this occasion not questioned or doubted, and in fact are admitted.

It is also a fact that Colonel Clark commenced this campaign from Kaskaskia to Vincennes in the winter or spring of the year 1779, at a time that it was extremely difficult and almost impossible, from the inclemency of the weather and the high stage of the water between those two points, to march his army from one post to the other. The distance is one hundred and sixty or seventy miles. The country at the time the march was performed was greatly inundated with water, and the rivers (the Wabash and others) were so high that the waters were from bluff to bluff in them, and in some instances two or three miles wide. The snow and the ice had not entirely left the ground; and add to this, that there were no baggage wagons, and, in fact, not much food, to attend the army. Yet, with all these privations, hardships, and difficulties, these brave soldiers, under the command not only of a brave but also a talented man, accomplished their march to Vincennes, and took that post from the enemy without the loss of a man.

In this campaign the claimant, Mr. Janis, performed service as an ensign in the company commanded by Captain Charleville. He went, and, like others, acted well his part in that campaign. There is not on record the history of a campaign that exhibited more talents in the plan, and required more interpidity and courage in the execution, than the campaign planned and executed by Colonel Clark in the capture of the British posts on the Mississippi and in the Illinois country.

At that day there were very few people settled west of the mountains, and these few were infested and eternally annoyed by the Indians, excited to murder and bloodshed by the British enemy. It became necessary, therefore, in order to secure the peace and quiet of these settlements, to capture these British posts, by which the Indians were supplied with the munitions of war, and to remove back the Indians and the means of their support to such distance as they would not be able to disturb the white people. This was accomplished. More was accomplished, also; the country was taken and retained from the enemy, which now composes the best and the fairest portion of the Union.

In the treaty of 1783 with Great Britain, the capture and occupation of this country by the American arms is adverted to, and, no doubt, was taken into consideration at the time of making the treaty. This is the country that was captured from the enemy by the energy and bravery of Janis, and others, that now pours into the Treasury of the United States so much money from the sales of the public lands. There are millions received from the sales of the very same lands which the "Illinois regiment," in which Janis acted as an officer, took from the enemy at a time that "tried men's souls." Yet the honorable chairman says, if a pension be given to Mr. Janis, it will form an exception, and violate the general rule and law on this subject. Be it so. I should consider it an honor to violate a rule that would deprive a man of a pension, made under circumstances such as these. The gentleman [Mr. WARDWELL] seems to represent this case as a person with gold weights, weighing out money by the cent, to a revolutionary soldier who performed so brave and noble a part in that struggle as did Mr. Janis. I will call to the recollection of the gentleman the privations and hardships on the march to capture Vincennes. Did Janis, when he was wading in the snow, ice, and water, to his neck, think of weighing out his energies and bravery with gold weights? Did he at that time think he was violating any rule, (and "his case would form an exception,") when he was fighting before the post of Vincennes? Nice conscientious scruples, and gold weights, were at that time not considered by Janis, and now should not be by us. A liberal and honorable acknowledgment of such service, which was glorious and beneficial to the whole Union, ought now to be made to him by us. We are now reaping the fruits of his and their labor; and I am, as one individual, in legislation or otherwise, proud to acknowledge it. We are now at our ease, happy in every respect, reclining in the shade of "the vine and fig tree," which was spoken into existence by the energies and talents of the revolutionary soldier. We are their happy children, and I hope we will have the gratitude to sustain, in reclining life, the few of our revolutionary fathers that remain among us. They cannot live among us only for a few years. The gentleman for whose benefit this bill is brought before Congress is far advanced in years, and cannot, by the course of nature, live long. I am informed he is about eighty years old. This bill, which only provides ten dollars per month during his natural life, will not beggar the Treasury, and will be an honorable acknowledgment of his revolutionary services. It will be a proud boon to his numerous and respectable descendants.

The gentleman [Mr. W.] says the case of Janis, if it becomes a law, will violate the existing law on the subject of revolutionary pensions. This is true, I presume. If the claim of Janis was embraced in the principles of the law now in existence, there would be no necessity for another act for his benefit. This claim would be allowed and paid under the provisions of the present law. The reason the old law does not embrace his case, is the foundation of the present application to Congress. The gentleman further says that, from all the information he can obtain, Mr. Janis served only thirty-six days; and as the law requires a service in all of six months in the Revolution to entitle a soldier to a pension, that, on that consideration, he is not entitled to a pension. Even to go with the gentleman into this rigid and strict rule, requiring proof of six months' service, it can be fairly presumed that, in the absence of evidence, Mr. Janis was six months in service. The gentleman would not require six months of continued fighting in a serug's* battle, nor would he require six months' wading in snow, ice, and water, to entitle the soldier to a pension. The service which was so honorably performed by Colonel Clark in capturing these posts would require six months or more for its execution; and the fair presumption is, that Mr. Janis was employed in the service under Colonel Clark for six months or more during his conquest of the Illinois country.

The evidence spoken of by the gentleman [Mr. W.] cannot be correct. It would require more than thirty-six days for the army to march, at that season of the year, from Kaskaskia to Vincennes, and return. There were no bridges or ferries at the time, and the route was almost impassable from the snow, ice, and high waters in the rivers and other streams. In this calculation there would be no time left for preparation and organization for the campaign at Kaskaskia before they started, and no time left for the capture of the post, (Vincennes,) and for its occupation by the American forces. Every reasonable man will know it will require more than thirty-six days for the performance of this expedition. I do not want for Janis any thing that is not right and proper—he, himself, would not receive from Government or any individual any thing that was not strictly honorable and correct. He is a gentleman whose character for honesty and integrity stands above suspicion.

I read a printed statement of his services, which lies on the Clerk's table; and I know not now if it were his own statements or a report of a committee—I would believe one as much as the other; I will vouch for his statements to be correct. I have known him and his character from my youth, and I know it to be good; and on this occasion I consider it my duty to state it, although he is not my constituent, but a resident of the State of Missouri.

It may be, Mr. Speaker, from the fact that I have been raised in the country where this service was performed, and on that consideration have heard so much about it, of its perils and hardships, that I have become so well convinced of the justice of the claim of Mr. Janis. It seems to me to be a claim of such propriety and justice that the House cannot hesitate to allow it. The gentleman need not fear that this case will open a door for similar cases. There are none in our country, as I know, similar to that of Mr. Janis; but if there were, it would be just and proper to allow them. I hope the House fully comprehend the merits and justice of this case, and knowing it, will allow it.

* A battle in which all on both sides are killed.

After some remarks from Messrs. WARDWELL, STORER, and ASHLEY, the bill was ordered to a third reading.

ELLEN ABEIN SCHMUCK.

The bill granting a pension to Ellen Abein Schmuck was then taken up; and, after some debate by Messrs. PARKER, EVANS, WHITTLESEY of Ohio, TAYLOR, and HAWES, the latter gentleman asked for the yeas and nays on the engrossment of the bill, but the House refused to order them, and the bill was passed to a third reading, by a vote of 75 to 47.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. JUDSON, from the select committee on the subject of the disturbance which occurred in the House this morning, made a report, in part, concluding with the following resolution:

Resolved, That Robert Codd, having done no act in violation of the privilege or order of the House, be forthwith discharged from custody.

The motion was agreed to.

It was suggested that, in order to justify the detention of the other person, the Speaker should issue a warrant.

The SPEAKER said he considered it necessary to have the authority of the House for issuing a warrant.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, moved that the Speaker be authorized to issue his warrant to the Sergeant-at-arms for the arrest and detention of Henry G. Wheeler, for a contempt and breach of privilege of the House, by committing an assault on the body of Robert Codd, in the presence of the House; which motion was agreed to.

The House then adjourned.

MONDAY, JUNE 13.

The pension bills ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on Saturday, were severally read a third time, and passed.

MICHIGAN AND ARKANSAS.

In execution of the special order of Monday last, the House then proceeded to the consideration of the following bills:

"An act to establish the northern boundary of the State of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union, upon the conditions therein expressed."

"An act for the admission of the State of Arkansas into the Union, and to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the same, and for other purposes."

Both these bills had been reported from the Committee of the Whole, without amendment.

The House proceeded first to the consideration of the Michigan bill.

Mr. VINTON renewed the following amendment, offered by him in Committee of the Whole:

"And provided also, and it is hereby further expressly declared, that if the convention provided for in the third section of this act shall not give the assent therein required, the boundaries of the States of Ohio and Indiana shall nevertheless be, and forever remain, fixed and established between them and Michigan, as the same are in this act above specified and described."

Mr. V. asked for the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and the question being taken, was decided as follows: Yeas 81, nays 126.

YEAS—Messrs. Heman Allen, Ashley, Bailey, Bond,

Boon, Bunch, John Calhoun, William B. Calhoun, Campbell, Carr, Carter, George Chambers, John Chambers, Childs, Nathaniel H. Thomson, Toucey, Turrill, Vanderpoel, Wagener, Ward, Wardwell, Webster, Weeks, White, Thomas T. Whittlesey, Sherrod Williams—126.

So the amendment was negatived.

Mr. ADAMS moved to amend the bill by striking out the 1st, 2d, and 3d sections, and inserting as a substitute certain provisions reserving to Michigan the rights and limits secured to the Territory by the ordinance of 1787.

Mr. ADAMS rose and addressed the House three hours, in opposition to the boundary as described in the bill. He examined the provisions of the ordinance of 1787, which, he contended, settled the boundaries of the States of Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio, with that of the Territories north of those States, definitively and forever; and that the several boundaries could not be altered, unless by the common consent of Congress, the States and Territories interested, and the State of Virginia. He contended that the bill before the House altered the boundary between Michigan and Ohio, to the injury of the former State, and in violation of the original compact.

When Mr. ADAMS had concluded his remarks, several gentlemen addressed the Chair, and the floor was obtained by Mr. CUSHMAN, who said that, believing the previous question to be one of the most salutary rules of the House, and believing this to be a fit occasion for its application, he now moved it.

Mr. ADAMS remarked that he hoped the yeas and nays would be taken on his motion to amend.

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved a call of the House, and thereupon asked the yeas and nays; which were taken, and the motion was agreed to: Yeas 109, nays 43.

The call was commenced, and proceeded in for some time, when, on motion of Mr. HUNTSMAN, all further proceeding in the call was dispensed with.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question was put on ordering the bill to a third reading, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 153, nays 45, as follows:

So the bill was ordered to a third reading this day.

ARKANSAS.

The House then took up the bill providing for the admission of Arkansas into the Union.

Mr. BRIGGS asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. ADAMS then renewed the amendment submitted by him in Committee of the Whole, in relation to the restriction of slavery in the State of Arkansas.

The amendment having been read,

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, rose and moved the previous question.

Mr. ADAMS then claimed the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, insisted upon his right.

The CHAIR decided that, according to the strict rule, the latter gentleman was entitled to the floor, if he insisted upon it. That gentleman rose in his place, and was announced by the Chair. He submitted a motion; that motion was propounded from the Chair, and the gentleman from Massachusetts did not claim the floor until the Chair was about to put the question to the House.

Mr. ADAMS appealed from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, inquired if the gentleman from Massachusetts had resumed his seat.

Mr. ADAMS stated explicitly he had not.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, said it was clear, then, that the gentleman from Massachusetts was entitled to the floor.

Mr. BOON remarked, then if a gentleman chose to stand in his place, he might claim the floor, to the exclusion of every other member, as long as he pleased.

Mr. PHILLIPS said that, being in the immediate neighborhood of his colleague, [Mr. ADAMS,] and having observed what passed, he felt bound to state that, according to his recollection, his colleague rose, addressed the Speaker, stated that he wished to offer an amendment to the bill, and sent his amendment to the Clerk, remaining upon his feet while the Clerk proceeded to read it, evidently with the intention of proceeding to address the House in relation to it. The Speaker was, at the time, looking towards the other quarter of the House. At the instant when the Clerk had finished reading, the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] rose, was immediately recognised by the Speaker, and moved the previous question, which was entertained by the Chair. Mr. ADAMS immediately claimed the right of proceeding, stating that he had not relinquished the floor, and had merely awaited the reading of the amendment by the Clerk. The Speaker then looked towards him, and immediately said: "The gentleman from Massachusetts will proceed"—but, upon objection being made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HANNEGAN] and others who were standing in the centre aisle, the Speaker decided that the gentleman from Kentucky was entitled to the floor. Mr. P. said that he could not have the slightest doubt that his colleague was entitled to the floor, and that he was in the act of addressing the Chair when the gentleman from Kentucky submitted his motion.

Mr. BOULDIN said he, like the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] was standing near the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.] Mr. B. was standing in front of him, [Mr. ADAMS,] and quite near, though not quite as near as the gentleman last up, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] who was sitting very near him on his left. Mr. B. had not the least doubt of the sincerity of that gentleman in saying that his colleague [Mr. ADAMS] had not forfeited his precedence on the floor. He [Mr. B.] had little knowledge of the rules, but standing immediately before the gentleman, [Mr. ADAMS,] he had expected him to support his motion, and was listening to hear it. He was surprised not to find him go on. A short time after he [Mr. B.] had come to the conclusion that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] did not intend to support, at that time, his motion to amend; the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WILLIAMS] addressed the Chair, as he understood it, and the Chair announced "the gentleman from Kentucky."

Mr. ADAMS here interrupted the gentleman from Virginia, and was going on for some time; when

Mr. BOULDIN begged leave to ask the gentleman whether he was explaining, or what?

Mr. ADAMS said he was answering the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BOULDIN then said the gentleman from Massachusetts had cut him out in the middle of a semicolon; while the gentleman himself had made his motion, had his amendment read, and was waiting until another gentleman had obtained the floor, and addressed the Chair, and still claimed the floor. Mr. B. said he would move to lay the motion to amend on the table.

A suggestion being made that the motion was out of order,

Mr. BOULDIN then moved the previous question on the appeal; which was seconded by the House: Ayes 95, noes 51.

Mr. EVANS asked for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 109, nays 80.

Mr. REED then asked for the yeas and nays on the main question, being "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?" which were ordered, and were: Yeas 97, nays 87.

Arkansas.

[H. OF R.]

So the decision of the Chair was affirmed, and the question recurring on the motion for the previous question, it was seconded by the House: Ayes 101, noes not counted.

Mr. BRIGGS called for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question to be put; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 126, nays 67.

YEAS—Messrs. Ash, Ashley, Barton, Beale, Bean, Bockee, Boon, Bouldin, Boyd, Brown, Buchanan, Bunch, Burns, Cambreleng, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, Nathaniel H. Claiborne, John F. H. So the House determined that the main question, on ordering the bill to a third reading, should then be put.

Mr. HIESTER asked for the yeas and nays on that question; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 147, nays 52, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chilton Allan, Ash, Ashley, Barton, Beale, Bean, Bell, Bockee, Boon, Bouldin, Boyd, Brown, Buchanan, Bunch, Burns, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carter, Casey, George Chambers, John Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, Nathaniel H. Pearce, Phillips, Potts, Reed, Russell, Shinn, Slade, Sloane, Underwood, Vinton, Elisha Whittlesey, Lewis Williams—52.

So the bill was ordered to a third reading this day.

The Michigan bill was then read a third time.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said that a test vote had already been taken upon this bill, and the expression in its favor was so strong that no gentleman could doubt its passage. Under a firm belief that the further consumption of time would not change a vote, or alter the result, he moved the previous question.

So the bill was passed.

The Arkansas bill was then taken up and read a third time.

Mr. HUNTSMAN moved the previous question; which was seconded: Ayes 95, noes not counted; and the main question being ordered,

Mr. ALLEN, of Vermont, then asked for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 143, nays 50, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chilton Allan, Ash, Ashley, Barton, Beale, Bean, Bockee, Boon, Bouldin, Boyd, Brown, Buchanan, Bunch, Burns, John Calhoun, Cambreleng, Campbell, Carter, Casey, George Chambers, John Chambers, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, Nathaniel H. Adjournment of Congress.

[JUNE 14, 1836.]

So the bill was passed.

Mr. CONNOR said, as the House had been delivered of twins, he thought after the operation they might adjourn; and he made that motion, but subsequently withdrew it at the request of

Mr. CLAIBORNE, of Mississippi, who made an ineffectual attempt to offer a resolution; and Mr. LOVE renewing the motion to adjourn,

The House adjourned.

TUESDAY, JUNE 14.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

On motion of Mr. HAYNES, the joint resolution was then taken up and read, as follows:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives close the present session of Congress, by an adjournment of their respective Houses, on the 23d day of May next."

Mr. HAYNES moved to strike out the 23d of May, and insert the 27th of June.

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved to insert the 4th of July. He made this motion, he said, in accordance with an understanding which had been had with gentlemen on this floor, who wished to continue the session till that time, in reference to the interests of the Western part of the Union. He knew that those interests were of great importance, and he hoped that the motion would be agreed to without debate or division.

Mr. HARDIN urged that it was impossible at this time to tell on what day we could get away. He would vote reluctantly for the 4th of July, but would prefer the 11th. Nearly the whole of the session had been appropriated to bills relating to the interests of the States east of the mountains. He thought it incumbent on Congress to take some measures for the distribution of the proceeds of the sale of the public lands. He also alluded to the probability that circumstances would render it proper for the House to go into the consideration of our relations with Texas. He hoped that the further consideration of the resolution would be postponed till Monday next.

Mr. PARKS was opposed to adjourning on the 4th of July. He was aware that a great deal of the session had been taken up by debate, perhaps useless debate, without doing the business of the people. There had been but a few of the appropriation bills passed, and the bills to admit two States into the Union, and that was pretty much all that had been done. The House had, by a large majority, determined to fix a day of adjournment; but it would become necessary for the House to reflect and consider what business is yet remaining undone. There were also other States which had business which needed action, besides the Western States. There were yet to be acted on two fortification bills; the bill to organize the Treasury Department; the custom-house bill; a Judiciary bill; a bill to reorganize the Patent Office; a bill to reorganize the Land Office; a bill to regulate the public deposits; an army bill; a bill for the regulation of the mint; a bill in relation to the Cumberland road; a bill to graduate the price of the public lands, and various other bills. All this business could not be done in eleven days. Much would have to be left undone; and whose business was to be left undone? He would not vote to fix the day of adjournment on the 4th of July, because it would be impossible to get through much of the important business of the House by that time.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved to refer the joint resolution to a select committee, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of proposing a day of adjournment of the present session.

Mr. W. went on to contend that nothing was ever gained by fixing the day of adjournment, and he did not believe that the business before the House could be got through with in the time proposed. His object in making the motion he had was, that the committee should take up the subject, and examine into the state of the business before the House, with a reference to its disposition and the time to adjourn.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, hoped the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina would be adopted, and especially that they would not waste time in discussing the subject.

Mr. SUTHERLAND adverted to the large mass of business before the House, bills indispensably necessary to be passed. The "harbor bill," the "light-house bill," the "custom-house bill," and many others. The most important business of the country had been left undone, and he should vote for the most distant day.

Mr. HIESTER was opposed to the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina, for he thought the House could dispose of and arrange its order of business as well as a select committee. He should go for the earliest day; for when a day was once fixed, business would be expedited.

Mr. LEWIS thought the subject had better be postponed, and he hoped the House would pass to the orders of the day.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, was in favor of the proposition of the gentleman from North Carolina. It was the old practice of Congress to raise a committee to inquire into and recommend what business should be immediately transacted, and that practice fell into disuse only at the 21st or 22d Congress. He could not see how any Western gentleman could vote for an early day of adjournment. He referred to the fact that the city of New York alone had more time devoted to its own individual business than the whole country west of the Alleghany mountains, whether the business be of a public or private character.

Mr. HAYNES said he would harmonize the two propositions as to fixing the day, and accept the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MANN] as a modification of his own.

The question accordingly recurred on fixing on the 4th day of July.

Mr. CAMBRELENG expressed his surprise that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITTLESEY] should advocate the proposition for a select committee on this subject, since it was well known that, when it was the practice to raise such a committee, their report was invariably set aside in the House. He should vote against it. Mr. C. said he had uniformly voted against fixing any day of adjournment, and he had been governed in that vote by one consideration alone. It was this: that he would not vote for any day fixing the day of adjournment until the bill regulating the deposits of the public money was either passed or failed. Two years ago the House sent this bill to the Senate, which body never returned it. One year ago the bill was defeated in the House by an amendment, moved by an opposition member, which would have rendered it totally inoperative. Mr. C. also expressed his surprise at what fell from the gentleman from Ohio, in reference to the bill for the relief of the city of New York. That bill related to nothing more than the collection of the public revenue, in which every portion of this Union was just as much interested as the city of New York. But he should like to know whose fault it was that this bill had occupied two months? Certainly not the fault of the delegation from New York, or the majority of the House. A large majority were evidently, from the vote given that morning, determined to fix some day for adjournment; and if they did, he hoped they would fix the longest day. He did believe, however, that when the day was once fixed, they would transact more business in ten days than in two months without it.

Mr. SPEIGHT should vote against the proposition of his colleague, because it was asking a select committee to do that which every member of the House could do for himself, by referring to the calendar, viz: ascertain the state of their business. He was disposed to vote for a day certain.

Mr. BRIGGS inquired which motion then pending had precedence.

The CHAIR replied, the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina to commit with instructions.

Mr. BRIGGS was in favor of fixing on the 4th of July.

Mr. BOON rose and said that all who knew him, as a member of the House of Representatives, knew full well that he had at no time evinced a disposition to delay action on the business of the House, or to produce a long session. He had sat in his seat six and a half months during the sittings of Congress, and had given his vote upon many questions in which his constituents were not particularly and immediately interested; in the mean time he had been assured, by many highly respectable gentlemen from the old States, that something should be done for the people of the new States in the West before the adjournment of Congress, and he hoped that those gentlemen would make good their promise. Mr. B. said that he would only advert to three bills in which the people of the State which he had the honor, in part, to represent, felt a deep and abiding interest. I allude, said Mr. B., to the Cumberland road bill, the bill to graduate and reduce the price of the public lands, and the bill to reorganize the General Land Office. Sir, said Mr. B., I consider the bill last named one of the most important that has been presented to the consideration of Congress. The passage of this bill is not only of vast importance to the people of the new States, but, sir, it is of vast importance to all those of the old States of the Union who have purchased any portion of the public lands. Mr. B. said that he would vote for the 4th day of July, as the day to be fixed for the adjournment of Congress. He would, he said, vote to adjourn on tomorrow, if those bills which he had named were acted upon, and such other bills as might be indispensably necessary for the common defence of the country.

Having said thus much, Mr. Speaker, I will now, said Mr. B., reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BRIGGS,] who has just resumed his seat. That gentleman has said that those of this House who are opposed to this administration are in a "snug minority of some forty-five;" and rather tauntingly asks how it is that the minority in this House can defeat the wishes and the will of the majority. The gentleman from Massachusetts tells this House and the country that the friends of the administration in this House are in an overwhelming majority; and again asks the question, how is it that the minority in the House are liable to the charge of defeating the will of a majority? Mr. B. said, I will tell the gentleman from Massachusetts, and the country at large, how it is that the party in politics opposed to this administration have managed to embarrass the proceedings on business in this House, and to defeat the will of the majority. Sir, it is in Committee of the Whole House, where the "previous question" cannot be applied, that the minority can detain the majority as long as a proposition to amend shall be undecided, and where debate is unlimited. Such has been the course of the party opposed to this administration throughout this very protracted session. Amendments have been proposed and debated at great length by the minority in this House, which they well knew would be voted down by the majority as soon as the subject could be brought into the House, where the "previous question" could be applied.

Sir, I recollect that one amendment proposed by an opposition man to one of the appropriation bills, some time since, was discussed in Committee of the Whole for weeks together. Sir, said Mr. B., there is another mode by which the minority in this House have wasted its time, and caused delay in the business of the House; that is, by frequent calls for the yeas and nays on immaterial questions, such as a motion to adjourn; for a call of the House; for the previous question, and on points of order. Each taking of the yeas and nays consumes about one half hour of the time of the House. Search the journals of the House, and I venture to assert that it will be found that, nine times out of ten, those delays have been produced by motions and calls by the party opposed to this administration. It is in this way, and by long speeches, that the time of the House has been taken up, and the business of the country neglected. Sir, if the majority in politics in this House will go with me for the "previous question" every two hours in the day, (as the people themselves would, could they be here and witness our proceedings,) the business of the House would be proceeded in, and some beneficial results might yet grow out of our labors.

Mr. DUNLAP regretted to see such an earnestness on the part of many gentlemen to fix a day of adjournment, for he did not concur in the reasons assigned in its favor. He hoped no day of adjournment would be fixed, but that they would first act upon all the public and private business before them, and then adjourn.

Mr. MANN, of New York, replied at some length to the remark of the gentleman from Ohio in reference to the time the New York bill had occupied. Neither the delegation from New York nor the majority of the House were responsible for the very wide range the debate had taken; but the greater part of it came from the delegation from Kentucky.

Mr. GRENNELL said he was in favor of the 4th of July, and saw no necessity for a committee for the purpose indicated by the honorable gentleman from North Carolina. A committee might review the business of the House, but to what end? Could it throw new lights upon it? All the unfinished business on the calendar could not be acted on. It was not intended that such a committee should select certain measures for the special action of the House, for reasons to be given. How, then, could it assist the judgment of the House? If such was the intention of the advocates of a committee, he should protest against it. We have the unfinished business of the session (said Mr. G.) fully and distinctly before us; we have for weeks held it in view in reference to the day of adjournment. He would, therefore, consider this House the fittest committee to review its works, and say when they shall terminate.

It was true (Mr. G. said) the House had yet to act upon some bill regulating the deposits of the public money, and the division of the surplus revenue among the States; upon the land bill, fortification bill, and others of magnitude. At least he hoped for such action. Some measures there were especially interesting to the West, which he should be glad to pass and adopt. But, (Mr. G. asked,) can we not act on the measures of chief importance in the time that will be left us till the 4th of July? Indeed, he believed the House would accomplish more, and to better purpose, by having the day of adjournment fixed and before it, than by leaving that point longer unsettled.

Some gentlemen had complained that the West had not been sufficiently regarded in the legislation of the session. Perhaps (Mr. G. said) it may be so. He would repair the injustice. But there was a point beyond the West—our West—to which some gentlemen would direct the attention of this House, but to which we were, at present, in his judgment, forbidden to look, by every dictate of policy and duty. He referred to Texas. Gentlemen, in this debate, had expressed a hope that Congress, at the present session, might acknowledge the independence of that country, and, perhaps, go further in reference to it. He would hold in high respect the sympathies felt and expressed by gentlemen for the people of that revolted province. He hoped and trusted they would achieve their independence and power of self-government, and exercise them forever, but without connexion with this Union; but he could not consent to prolong the session for any movement with any reference to Texas. He felt sure no measures, at the present session, could wisely or safely be adopted, bearing upon that people. Delicate questions would arise, which gentleman should hesitate to encounter.

Mr. LANE thought the better way of determining on the day for the adjournment of the House was by looking at the business which was to be done. He was for having the deposit bill acted upon, because he considered the responsibility which was thrown upon the President was too great to be put into the hands of any individual. He said the nation looked to Congress to act upon this bill before they adjourned, and it would take some time to discuss this single bill. Then the bills chartering the banks of the District were to be acted on, to prevent bankruptcy and ruin to the people of the District. If the 4th of July was fixed as the day of adjournment, the bills for the Western country must go unacted on; and he was unwilling to fix a day of adjournment, to cut off action on those bills.

Mr. HOWARD suggested a modification to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina, that the select committee consist of the chairmen of all the standing committees of the House; which

Mr. WILLIAMS accepted, and his amendment was so modified.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, approved of the modification, and was more in favor of the resolution now than he was before. He was aware that all the bills now before the House could not be acted upon; and he thought they might follow a precedent which had heretofore been set, by referring the subjects before the House to a committee, for the purpose of determining which was the most important business. In relation to the deposit bill, he thought there ought to be but one opinion; which should be, that Congress should not adjourn until that bill was passed. He thought to refer the matter to prominent members of the House was the motion which ought to prevail. He was in favor of fixing as early a day as possible; but he would take into consideration the business which was to be done.

Mr. PATTON moved to lay the whole subject on the table for the present, but subsequently withdrew it.

Mr. HAWES was in favor of the motion to commit this subject to a committee. He was in favor of having as much of the public business transacted as possible before they adjourned. He alluded to the bill to make appropriations for the West Point Academy as a measure which would occasion considerable debate, as Mr. H. himself intended speaking some hours to show the corruptions of that institution. Mr. H. concluded by moving to postpone this resolution until Monday next.

Mr. EVERETT said he had uniformly voted against the suspension of the rule to take up this resolution, and he would now state the reason why he had so voted, and why he was now ready to fix the day for adjournment. He had voted against the suspension of the rules, because he did not wish to fix the day of adjournment until the bill for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands should be finally acted on. He foresaw, and he presumed every friend of that measure must have foreseen, that if the day was previously fixed, we had no security that that bill would be taken up. The friends of that measure had it in their power (it requiring a vote of two thirds) to say that the day of adjournment should not be fixed until it was taken up; they knew that by surrendering the power in their hands they gained nothing; their opponents would not adjourn until they were prepared. By the vote now taken, suspending the rule, the power was surrendered. He considered it as evidence that the friends of the bill no longer entertained a hope that it would be taken up; and if that was not to be taken up, he should vote for the earliest day of adjournment.

Mr. ASHLEY would prefer the 11th of July.

The question was taken on the motion to postpone till Monday next; which was negatived: Ayes 61, noes not counted.

The proposition of Mr. WILLIAMS was rejected without a count.

The question then recurred upon the motion to insert the 4th of July.

Mr. HIESTER moved to insert the 27th of June, and

Mr. ASHLEY moved to insert the 11th of July.

These motions were ruled not then to be in order.

Mr. HIESTER asked for the yeas and nays on the first motion; which were ordered.

Some conversation took place as to the mode in which the question should be propounded, between the CHAIR, Messrs. GARLAND of Louisiana, VANDERPOEL, and GRENELL. The point was, whether the date in the resolution, as it came from the Senate, should be considered in blank. If so, the vote would be taken on the longest time first; if not, the questions would be taken in the order in which they were made.

Mr. LEWIS said, as the bill changing the time of meeting of Congress might again come up and be acted on, he would move to postpone the further consideration of the subject till Tuesday next. Lost.

The question was then taken on inserting the 11th of July, (as an amendment to fixing the 4th,) and decided in the negative: Yeas 73, nays 137.

The question recurring on inserting the 4th of July, Mr. HIESTER moved to insert the 27th of June. Lost.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to insert the 2d of July. He gave as a reason for the motion the fact that the 2d was on a Saturday, and he presumed that Congress would not transact business on the 4th of July, unless there was some imperious necessity for it.

The motion was lost, when the motion to insert the 4th of July was agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was concurred in.

MICHIGAN AND ARKANSAS.

On motion of Mr. SEVIER, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. PIERCE, of New Hampshire, in the chair,) and proceeded to consider the following bill:

"An act supplementary to the act for the admission of the State of Arkansas into the Union, and to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the same, and for other purposes."

The bill having been read,

Mr. VINTON moved the following amendment, as an additional section to the bill:

Be it further enacted, That the 8th section of an ordinance passed by the convention of delegates at Little Rock, assembled for the purpose of making a constitution for the State of Arkansas, which is in the following words, viz: "All that section of country lying west of the western boundary of the State of Arkansas, which was formerly a part of the Territory of Arkansas, under the provisions of an act of Congress, approved the 26th day of May, 1824, entitled 'An act to fix the western boundary line of the Territory of Arkansas,' and which was ceded by the United States to the Cherokee and Choctaw Indians, whenever the Indian title shall be extinguished to the same, shall be attached to, and form a part of, the State of Arkansas; and when the said Indian title shall be extinguished, the western boundary of the said State shall be in accordance with the provisions of the said act of Congress," be, and the same is hereby, rejected.

Mr. V. addressed the committee at some length in support of the amendment.

A debate followed, in which Messrs. SEVIER, PARKER, LOVE, PATTON, CAMBRELENG, HOWARD, HUNTSMAN, STANDEFER, McKAY, TOUCEY, and CHAMBERS of Pennsylvania, took part.

Mr. CUSHING said: If, in common with the gentleman who spoke last, [Mr. PARROX, of Virginia,] I could feel persuaded that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VINTON] is of no practical importance, I should be content to give a silent vote upon the subject. But I take a very different view of the subject. I conceive the amendment to be of immediate practical value; and this I will endeavor to show to the satisfaction of the committee.

On this incidental question I shall not undertake to recapitulate the wrongs of the Indians. Nor shall I stop to inquire what present cause of complaint have the Cherokees or Creeks against the States of Georgia and Alabama. There is little in the conduct of the Europeans towards the aboriginal inhabitants of this continent which the eye of justice and humanity can regard with satisfaction. The history of the intercourse of the two races all over the New World exhibits in every page the weak subdued by the strong, and the ignorant despoiled by the wise. Humane as we have been, compared with the conquerors of Spanish America, we have nothing to boast of in this respect. Nor is there any part of the country wholly exempt from blame. In Massachusetts, in New York, in Pennsylvania, in Virginia, the red men have either disappeared before the march of civilization, or they have sunk into abject dependence on the men of Europe. That change in their condition, which is already consummated in the older and more populous States, is now in the process of accomplishment elsewhere; with this difference, that it is going on at present in a more enlightened age, in the sight of the world, and on a broader scale of wrong. I am forced to the reluctant conclusion that it cannot be stopped. Sooner or later the tribes remaining east of the Mississippi will have to abandon the graves of their fathers, and seek a new home on the prairies of the further West. Without debating the original policy or justice of that train of measures which it is now impossible to arrest, or adverting to the character of the means taken for the attainment of the contemplated end, I wish to avail myself of this, as of every other occasion, to manifest my sense of the duties we still owe to these unhappy remnants of the ancient masters of this continent.

What is the present case?

The convention of the people of Arkansas, assembled to form a constitution of Government for that State, passed an ordinance for submitting to the Congress of the United States certain propositions, which, if assented to by us, are to be obligatory on the State of Arkansas. That ordinance has been officially communicated to Congress. The 8th section of it is in the following words:

"Sec. 8. All that section of country lying west of the western boundary of the State of Arkansas, which was formerly a part of the Territory of Arkansas, under the provision of an act of Congress, approved the 26th of May, 1824, entitled 'An act to fix the boundary line of the Territory of Arkansas,' and which was ceded by the United States to the Cherokee and Choctaw Indians, whenever the Indian title shall be extinguished to the same, shall be attached to, and form a part of, the State of Arkansas; and when the said Indian title shall be extinguished, the western boundary of the said State shall be in accordance with the provisions of the said act of Congress."

The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio has for its object to signify, in express terms, the dissent of Congress from the proposition.

This amendment is opposed by the gentleman from Arkansas, [Mr. SEVIER.] He does not allege that Arkansas has any claim of right to the territory in question, either now or in the supposed future contingency. He does not pretend that Congress shall accede to the proposition of the convention; but he argues that the amendment is unnecessary, since neither by the bill admitting Arkansas into the Union, nor by this supplementary bill, does Congress assent to the proposition of Arkansas. I cannot concur in his conclusion.

Previous to the enactment of the law of 1830, the idea of removing the Indians west of the Mississippi was a mere unformed project; that act rendered it the settled policy of the United States. The law is memorable for the eloquent and deeply interesting debates of which it was the subject. It is important as fixing irrevocably the fate of the Indians within the chartered limits of the several States. And it adds another to the thousand examples of the fact, that it is our interest and advantage, not their rights or feelings, which guide our dealings with the red men. We, the Government of the United States, decreed, in substance, that the Indians must and should give place to our own population, and betake themselves out of our way to the upper waters of the Arkansas.

To be sure, they were to exchange the lands they now hold for new lands to be assigned to them in the West. An exchange is a contract. A contract implies the independent act of men free to make stipulations in their own behalf, and to accept or decline those of the other party. But has such been their condition? Do they not know that we are determined to have their lands? That we shall obtain those lands, by their free consent, if they choose to give what they cannot withhold, but, if not so, then by other means within our power? That they must treat for the exchange at our bidding, or remain to be pillaged by the lawless and unprincipled among our citizens, and then destroyed by the public force if they resent the wrongs they suffer? In a word, we dictate the exchange; we secure to ourselves the quiet occupation of the lands we covet; while the only assurance they have against molestation in their new country is in promises, not fulfilled by us hitherto in all faithfulness and honor.

Of these Indians, 31,348 persons have already emigrated. There still remain within our borders 72,181 persons to be removed. Included in the latter number are the handful of Seminoles who bid defiance to our armies, and the powerful tribes of the Creeks, already at war with us, and of the Cherokees, whose future course no man is able to predict.

Throughout all our negotiations with these people, when we urge upon them, as one of the arguments of removal, the security they will enjoy beyond the Mississippi, we are met with the long list of engagements of the same kind, which we have made but to break. They point to this very proposition of the State of Arkansas, as indicating that what has been will be again; as evincing that our citizens look even now to the time when they shall be ousted from their new possessions. There is a memorial here on file, recently presented, which complains, and justly, too, that, even before they have taken possession of the lands assigned to them, we begin to talk of making those lands our own once more, as if it was our settled design to exterminate them, or to drive them into the western desert.

Now, in the first place, the proposition of Arkansas is inadmissible and ill-timed in itself. If the day shall ever come when the territory on her frontier is no longer to be held by its present proprietors, then will be time enough to decide whether it shall be placed under her jurisdiction. It is altogether premature at present.

In the second place, it conflicts with the statute of 1830, the third section of which is in these words:

"In the making of any such exchange or exchanges, it shall and may be lawful for the President solemnly to assure the tribe or nation with which the exchange is made, that the United States will forever secure and guaranty to them and their heirs or successors the country so exchanged with them, and, if they prefer it, that the United States will cause a patent or a grant to be made and executed to them for the same: Provided, always, That such lands shall revert to the United States if the Indians become extinct, or abandon the same."

Mark this proviso. It contemplates only two contingent events in which the western territory ceded to the Indians can revert to the United States. One is the absolute extinction of the Indians; the other is their abandonment of the territory. It does not look to a retrocession of the territory by the Indians as a thing to be considered at all. Either the law will not believe this to be possible, or it will not hold up the possibility to observation. It abhors this alternative as the old philosophy said nature did a vacuum. But this very contingency, which the statute shuns to regard or admit, which it sedulously keeps out of view, is forced upon us by the ordinance of the people of Arkansas. They speak of a time as possible when "the Indian title shall be extinguished;" not when the Indians shall become extinct, or shall abandon their lands; not when their title shall become extinct; but when their title shall be extinguished; which implies an act of extinguishment, a treaty or contract for the accomplishment of that object.

I contend that it is the duty of Congress to give a prompt and decided negative to this proposition. It is not enough to pass it by in silence, to omit assent to it, to reject it by implication. If Arkansas and the United States were the only parties to be affected by it, this might do. In general, perhaps, a proposition not accepted may be considered in law as rejected. But it is not always so. There are many cases in which silence gives consent. There are many others in which a party acquires rights adverse to another by a failure of the latter to make a positive expression of dissent. But we must not treat this as a nice question between lawyers. It acts upon the minds, the feelings, and the conduct, of the Indians. We should dispose of this proposition in a way to reassure them, to remove the distrust which the proposition has awakened; which is only to be done by the distinct and express rejection of it in terms which they cannot misapprehend. And this is the great practical benefit to the United States, which the amendment secures.

We have removed, and are in the course of removing, all our Indian population to the western side of the Mississippi, and concentrating them there on the frontiers of Arkansas and Missouri; we throw them together in a new country; we stipulate with them that they shall consider themselves under our protection. They are not our allies, nor yet our subjects. Under these circumstances, our interest and our duty both seem to exact of us a conciliatory, just, and honorable treatment of this peculiar people.

It is our interest to be at peace with them. We have fearful evidence, in the disastrous events of the present year, of the mischief which a scattered few of these savages can inflict on us, when they are driven to desperation. East Florida is laid waste. Our baffled generals have abandoned it to the tender mercies of Ocoola. The war there will have occasioned a call on the present Congress for appropriations to the amount of five million dollars. Suppose all the tribes to be concentrated in the West, capable of mustering a military force of thirty thousand men, and in communication with the Mexican States: would they not be fit objects of apprehension? And does it not become us, in the mere question of interest, if we may, to make them our friends there?

Nay, more: they may be rendered eminently useful to us in their new position. If attached to us by ties of interest and affection, would not the more civilized tribes stand as a kind of advance guard of the United States on the side of Mexico and the wild Indians of the remote West?

But, without regard to considerations of interest, we are bidden, by the most imperative dictates of honor and humanity, to see to their welfare, and quiet them in their new possessions. They have been deeply wronged by us. If not wronged, they have been at least irreparably injured. They have been torn up by the roots, overturned, dashed to the ground, crushed, and driven off by the onward torrent of our own advancing population. It may have been the necessity of civilization that they should have perished so long as they remained in its presence. Yet it is for us they have withered and wasted away, that we may dwell in prosperity and peace in the pleasant places which they and their fathers occupied before we came for their destruction. If we are not lost to every sentiment of honor and feeling, we shall spare no effort to render them contented and happy in the homes we have forced them to accept in the West.

Impressed with these convictions, I would have this proposition of the convention of Arkansas stamped at once with the reprobation of Congress; I would take such a decisive stand on this point as to exclude all hope from the minds of the inhabitants of that State, and extinguish the very seminal idea, that they can ever gain possession of the territory we have so solemnly guarantied to the emigrant Indians.

Mr. EVERETT said he desired to prevent any misapprehension as to the case of Missouri, alluded to by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HUNTSMAN.] If the remarks of the gentleman should be published, an incorrect impression would be made. The case of Missouri could not be quoted as a precedent for the case in this bill. The land proposed to be eventually annexed to Arkansas is now in the possession of the Cherokees under the guarantee of a treaty, assigning it to them as their permanent home. But on the land eventually to be annexed to Missouri there is not a single Indian who has any claim to remain under any treaty. In 1834, the Committee on Indian Affairs, without having regard to any interest but that of the Indians themselves, excluded this territory from the Indian country; and on the ground that it would be unsafe to place them on this narrow slip, where they must of necessity be brought into frequent collision with the whites. The Missouri river is the natural outlet for the produce of the western part of Missouri. They would pass through it, unless prevented by force. No Indian tribe could there maintain the policy intended to be established in the Indian country—an exclusion of the whites. When it was settled that it should not be included in the Indian country, the only thing that could be done was to annex it to Missouri. The Indian title was, to every purpose beneficial to the Indian, extinguished, but yet not absolutely. The land had been ceded by certain tribes, for the use of such tribes as the President should locate thereon. All the tribes ceding it had been located elsewhere, except a remnant of the Ioways, which were about to join their tribe on a location out of this territory; so that all the Indian title remaining was this trust, that the land should remain for the use of such Indian nations as the President should locate thereon. It was now settled that no Indian would be located there. In 1834, when the report referred to was made, there was an unratified treaty ceding a part of this land to the Pottawatamies. In consequence, probably, of the report, that treaty was ratified, on the condition that they should relinquish the land; which they did. An appropriation had been made the present session to extinguish the Indian title. He referred to the report of the Committee on Indian Affairs accompanying the Missouri bill for a full explanation of the subject.

Mr. VINTON withdrew his amendment, and offered the following:

Strike out the word "that," in the first section of the bill, and insert the following: "In lieu of the proposition submitted to Congress by the ordinance of the convention of delegates, held at Little Rock, assembled for the purpose of making a constitution, which is hereby rejected;" which, after a few remarks from Messrs. TOUCEY, CHAMBERS of Pennsylvania, and SEVIER, was agreed to.

The bill was then laid aside, and the committee took up the "bill supplementary to the act to establish the northern boundary line of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of Michigan into the Union."

The bill having been read,

Mr. VINTON moved the same amendment to this bill he had moved to the Arkansas bill, and which had been agreed to, merely changing the words "Arkansas" and "Little Rock," to "Michigan" and "Detroit."

After some remarks from Messrs. GARLAND of Louisiana, SEVIER, ROBERTSON, VINTON, LANE, and HUNTSMAN, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved a further amendment, repealing that part of the third section of the act to which this bill is supplementary, relating to the Member and Senators elected to Congress from Michigan. Mr. R. gave as a reason for the amendment, that it conflicted with the constitution of the United States, which gave to each House the right to judge of the qualifications of its members.

After a few words from Mr. TOUCEY, the amendment was lost: Ayes 53, noes 77—and the bill was laid aside.

The committee then took up the "bill to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States in the State of Michigan."

Mr. LANE moved to reduce the salary of the district judge from $2,000 to $1,500; and also that the same salaries be paid to each of the district judges of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, [in those States they are now $1,000;] which, after a few remarks from Messrs. LANE, TOUCEY, and E. WHITTLESEY, was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, then moved to reduce the salary of the district judge of Michigan to $1,500; which was agreed to: Ayes 80, noes not counted.

On motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, the committee then rose and reported the bills and amendments to the House.

The Speaker having resumed the chair.

The House concurred in the amendment of the Committee of the Whole to the Arkansas bill, and the same was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

The second bill, in relation to Michigan, being taken up, Mr. ROBERTSON renewed the amendment offered by him in Committee of the Whole, and asked for the yeas and nays thereon; which were ordered.

Mr. TOUCEY raised the point of order that the amendment could not be moved, inasmuch as it was wholly dissimilar from, and unconnected with, the subject of the bill.

The CHAIR overruled the objection; and the question being taken on the amendment, it was decided in the negative: Yeas 59, nays 96.

Mr. TOUCEY moved an amendment, directing the manner in which the university or seminary lands should be located, viz: by the Legislature, and in quantities not less than one quarter section each.

Mr. STORER called the attention of the House to the fact that the trustees of the Michigan seminary or university had located some of their lands within the territorial limits of the State of Ohio, and others on the most valuable and richest sections bordering on the Maumee, south of the line established in the bill providing for the admission of Michigan into the Union.

After a few remarks from Messrs. WHITTLESEY of Ohio, TOUCEY, STORER, and VINTON, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WHITTLESEY then submitted a proviso to the same, to secure the rights of persons who had purchased grants from the trustees; which was agreed to, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

The amendment to the "bill to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States in the State of Michigan" was then concurred in, and that bill was also ordered to a third reading to-morrow.

The House then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 15.

As soon as the journal of yesterday had been read,

Mr. ADAMS moved a correction of the journal of the proceedings on Monday in reference to the entry relating to his claiming the floor on that day, after the motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, (see proceedings.) Mr. A. having read his amendment at length,

Mr. HAMER hoped it was not intended to spread the gentleman's speech upon the journal, because, if so, the same privilege must be accorded to the other gentlemen who spoke on the question.

After some remarks from Messrs. PATTON and ADAMS,

Mr. S. WILLIAMS said: Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as the proposition to amend the journal, now under consideration, grew out of a motion made by me for the previous question, I consider it my duty to make a few remarks, in justice to the Speaker and to those who sustained the decision of the Chair upon the appeal made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS.] If I understand the proposition to amend, it is to permit the gentleman from Massachusetts to have placed upon the journal his intentions and reasons for claiming the floor when the Speaker had decided that I was entitled to it. In the first place, I deny the right of any member upon this floor to have his intentions and reasons for supporting and maintaining any proposition under consideration placed upon the journal. Sir, suppose we adopt the rule that each member shall have his intentions and reasons for every vote he gives, or every position he assumes, placed upon the journals of this House, when would we be able to close the present session of Congress; and when, I would ask, would the Clerk be able to make up the journal? Sir, it would be endless, and worse than useless, to attempt such a course. As well might I ask to have my reasons placed upon the journals for demanding the previous question, as for the gentleman from Massachusetts to ask to have his intentions and reasons placed upon the journals, why he concluded and determined in his own mind that he was entitled to the floor in preference to me. If I understand the reading of the journal, it is made up in the usual way, and according to the customs and rules of parliamentary usages; and I, for one, am against any change or innovation, to suit the caprice and whim of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] or any other gentleman.

My main object in rising, Mr. Speaker, upon the present occasion, is not to discuss the propriety of the amendment, but merely to state the facts as they occurred and took place upon the occasion to which this amendment of the journal has reference. When the bill to admit the State of Arkansas into the Union was taken up, expecting we were to have a long protracted, and I might say, a useless debate, I determined to call the previous question; and immediately upon the announcement by the Speaker, of the question upon the reading of the bill a third time, I rose and addressed the Chair; and, as I then thought, and yet believe, (and as several gentlemen around me thought,) I was entitled to the floor. The Speaker, however, announced the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] who thereupon moved his amendment, sent it to the chair, and it was read by the Clerk. As soon as the Clerk read the amendment, I addressed the Speaker; the Speaker announced the gentleman from Kentucky. I then remarked that I considered it of more importance to vote and to do the business of the people, and return home to our constituents, than to sit here and hear long and tiresome abolition speeches, and I therefore moved the previous question. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ADAMS,] who I believe was upon his feet all this time, never pretended to claim the floor; and when the Speaker, and not until then, entertained my motion for the previous question, and announced from the chair that the previous question was demanded, did the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] pretend to claim the floor; and when he did claim it, I then took my seat, not with an intention of yielding the floor to the gentleman, but for the purpose of waiting the decision of the Speaker who was entitled to the floor; and the Speaker imagining, I suppose, by my sitting down, that I had yielded the floor, announced the gentleman from Massachusetts. I then rose from my seat, and remarked that I claimed the floor. The Speaker then said, if I claimed the floor by the rules of the House, I was entitled to it. I remarked again, that I did claim the floor. The Speaker then decided that I was entitled to it, and, to my mind, it is a very clear proposition that I was entitled to the floor; for if the gentleman from Massachusetts was entitled to the floor, because of his having moved the amendment to the bill, in preference to me or any other member of the House, (which proposition, by the by, I deny,) the time at which he should have claimed the floor was when I addressed the Speaker, or as soon thereafter as he could have done so, and not to wait until I gave my reasons for moving (and having actually moved) the previous question, and until the Speaker had entertained my motion, and distinctly announced from the chair that the previous question was demanded. It was then too late for the gentleman from Massachusetts to claim the floor, if he would have been otherwise entitled to it, which I deny. There is no rule of this House which entitles the mover of a proposition to the floor in preference to all the other members of this House. We are all, in that respect, upon an equal footing. I therefore have no hesitation in saying that the Speaker decided correctly, and the House did right in sustaining his decision; and I am equally clear and certain that the reasons given, and intended to have been given, by the gentleman from Massachusetts, why he thought he was entitled to the floor, should not be placed upon the journal. I shall therefore vote against the proposed amendment.

Mr. CAMBRELENG moved to lay the motion to amend the journal on the table.

Mr. ADAMS called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. WISE asked if it was in order to lay such a motion on the table?

The CHAIR replied in the affirmative, for it was still in the power of the House to take it up again whenever they thought proper.

At the suggestion of Mr. HAMER, Mr. CAMBRELENG withdrew the motion to lay on the table, and moved the previous question.

Mr. ADAMS raised the point of order whether the gentleman from New York could withdraw the motion after the yeas and nays had been ordered on it; but the point was overruled by the Chair.

Mr. PHILLIPS asked for the yeas and nays on the motion for the previous question.

The CHAIR reiterated the decision frequently before made, that the call was not in order.

The House seconded the previous question, and ordered the main question; on which

Mr. PHILLIPS called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 51, nays 110.

So the motion to amend the journal was lost.

BOOKS TO MEMBERS.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of taking up and considering the resolution to provide books to the new members of the 24th Congress; which was agreed to: Ayes 95, noes 37.

The resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to supply such members of the House as have not been provided under former orders, with the following books:

The Diplomatic Correspondence;
The Documentary History of the United States;
The Land Laws;

The American State Papers;

The Register of Debates, including the two volumes of the first Congress, published by Gales & Seaton, and the two volumes of the last Congress;

Contested Elections;

Commercial Regulations;

Secret Journals to 1778;

Elliot's Debates;

And that the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to report a bill for the necessary appropriation to carry this resolution into effect.

Mr. SPEIGHT rose and remarked that, as he believed every gentleman was prepared to vote upon it, he moved the previous question; which was seconded: Ayes 82, noes 42; and, on ordering the main question,

Mr. MERCER called for the yeas and nays, but the House refused to order them, and the main question was ordered without a count.

Mr. UNDERWOOD then asked for the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered.

Mr. INGERSOLL asked the unanimous consent of the House to permit him to modify the resolution by excluding such books as were out of print.

Mr. UNDERWOOD objected.

Mr. ANTHONY moved to lay the resolution on the table; and

Mr. SMITH called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. ADAMS asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw the motion, to enable him to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the main question was ordered; accordingly,

Mr. ANTHONY withdrew the motion, and

Mr. MANN, of New York, renewed it.

Mr. HAWES asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were taken.

Before the vote was announced,

JUNE 15, 1836.]

Michigan and Arkansas.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. MANN, of New York, raised the question of order, that, by former decisions of the House, and the rule adopted the other day on the Michigan and Arkansas bills, this resolution must be considered in Committee of the Whole, inasmuch as it involved an appropriation of money.

The CHAIR said that was not the proper time to raise the question. The vote must be first announced, and then, if the question was raised, the Chair would have no difficulty in deciding.

The vote was then announced to be—yeas 82, nays 99. So the House refused to lay the resolution on the table.

The period for which the rule had been suspended having expired,

Mr. CHAPIN moved a further suspension for one hour, to proceed with the consideration of the above resolution.

Mr. MANN, of New York, asked for the yeas and nays, but the House refused to order them, and the question being taken by tellers, was decided in the negative: Ayes 94, nays 60—not two thirds; and the House passed to the special orders.

MICHIGAN AND ARKANSAS.

The following engrossed bills were then read a third time and passed:

The bill supplementary to the act entitled "An act to establish the northern boundary line of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of Michigan into the Union;"

An act supplementary to the act entitled "An act for the admission of the State of Arkansas into the Union, and to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the same, and for other purposes;" and

The bill to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the State of Michigan.

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved that the House take up and consider the following bill, which had been laid on the table some days ago:

"An act to settle and establish the northern boundary line of the State of Ohio."

Mr. ADAMS said he thought that would be doing over again what had been already done, inasmuch as the provisions of this bill were embraced in the bill for the admission of Michigan into the Union, and would look as if the House distrusted the validity of that act.

The motion was agreed to without a count.

Mr. MANN, referring to what had fallen from the gentleman from Massachusetts, remarked that it was to satisfy the scruples of gentlemen from Ohio as to the construction of the former bill. He himself saw no necessity for the passage of this bill, believing that Congress had expended their whole power over this subject on the other bill. In reply to the gentleman's question, what reason there was for the passage of this bill, Mr. M. would reply, according to the fashion of their own country, by asking another question, why should it not be passed? The one question was as good as the other.

Mr. CRAIG argued that there were objections to the passage of this bill, and he proceeded to point them out.

Mr. BOULDIN said he would vote for the passage of this bill. He had voted for a degree of despatch, in passing the bills for receiving Michigan and Arkansas, which was not his habit. He did it for peace sake. The United States and Ohio, as well as Michigan and Ohio, seemed, last summer, to be getting to a point which was little short of war. He had voted to give Ohio the land in dispute, and Michigan much more, in the place of it, for peace sake. He did not think Ohio entitled to the land; but that the United States had the right, at least, to compromise the dispute, and give Michigan a quantity amply sufficient to make up for what was claimed by Ohio. He understood that this bill followed the lines of the bill lately passed; and why not pass it? The same motive that induced him to vote for more than ordinary despatch and decision, in passing the bill before alluded to, would induce him to vote for this bill.

Mr. HUNTSMAN made a few remarks on the same subject.

Mr. MILLER moved the previous question; which was seconded: Yeas 74, nays 47; and the main question was ordered.

Mr. ADAMS asked for the yeas and nays on the main question; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 122, nays 42. So the bill was ordered to a third reading.

The question being on the passage of the bill,

Mr. MILLER said he had but a very few words to say on this subject, and they were in explanation of his own vote. He had voted to lay the present bill on the table when it was first taken up for consideration, because there was a provision in another bill, the bill for the admission of Michigan into the Union, to settle the boundary line of Ohio. That bill has now passed, and establishes this disputed line as effectually as Congress can establish it. He therefore thought it was now too late to entertain a discussion in relation to the force of the ordinance of 1787, and the right of Congress to settle the question. This body has acted, and has fixed the disputed boundary in the first section of the bill to admit Michigan. He thought this sufficient, and had voted against ordering the present bill to a third reading, because it only reaffirms that which we have already done. A large majority of the House, however, had thought proper to vote for it, in order to remove the doubts which some gentlemen have expressed. To this he did not object; but, for himself, he believed it entirely unnecessary, and had therefore voted against it, and would do so again on its final passage.

The debate was further continued by Messrs. ANTHONY, UNDERWOOD, ADAMS, LOVE, WARDWELL, BOND, and KINNARD.

Mr. BRIGGS said: Though the question as to the boundary between Ohio and Michigan had produced a great and protracted excitement between the parties interested, the whole matter, in his opinion, turned upon a single point—all depended upon the construction of a proviso in the fifth fundamental article of the ordinance of 1787. The subject had undergone the most learned and elaborate discussion and investigation, by committees in both Houses of Congress, and by gentlemen representing the interests of Ohio and Michigan. But a large portion of the labor had been expended upon branches of the subject which, in his view, were not necessary to enable us to come to a correct decision of what he considered the main point in issue. He agreed with the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. UNDERWOOD,] that the true interpretation of the ordinance of '87 was the important thing to be ascertained. That was the question. Mr. B. said he was frank to declare, if he could surmount the difficulty which he encountered in the ordinance of '87, as a matter of expediency he would give his assent to the line as claimed by Ohio. This difficulty, however, he had not been able to master.

When he first read that ordinance with attention, he was strongly impressed with the opinion that the line running east and west through the southerly bend of Lake Michigan was intended by its framers to be an unalterable line between the three States south of it, and the one or two States which Congress might "think proper to establish in that part of the territory" north of it. Since then, he had read, with a good deal of care, the reports and arguments on both sides, but without weakening or changing his first opinion. From a perusal of the whole of the fifth article to which he had alluded, and looking to the language of the proviso, which more immediately relates to this boundary, it was made very clear, indeed, to his mind, that it was designed to be a fixed and permanent boundary.

H. OF R.]

In that ordinance it is said, "it is hereby ordained and declared, by the authority aforesaid, that the following articles shall be considered as articles of compact between the original States and the people and States in the said territory, and forever remain unalterable, unless by common consent." Article fifth declares "there shall be formed, in the said territory, not less than three nor more than five States; and the boundaries of the said States, as soon as Virginia shall alter her act of cession, and consent to the same, shall become fixed and established as follows." Then follows a description of the boundaries of the three Territories, since erected into the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, the northern boundary of each of which is the territorial line between the United States and Canada: "Provided, however, and it is further understood and declared, that the boundaries of these three States shall be subject to be so far altered, that if Congress shall hereafter find it expedient, they shall have authority to form one or two States in that part of the said territory which lies north of an east and west line drawn through the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan." No one has expressed a doubt that the boundaries of the three States described in this article, but for the power conferred on Congress by the proviso, are among the things declared to be unalterable, "unless by common consent." The proviso gives to Congress the power, if they shall think it expedient, to alter the boundaries of these three States. But how to alter them? To what extent may these limits, so particularly and carefully described, be changed by the National Legislature? The language of the proviso is clear and explicit on this point. There would seem to be hardly room for a difference of opinion upon it. "The boundaries of these States shall be subject to be so far altered" that Congress may, if they see fit, form one or two States in that part of the said territory which lies north of an east and west line drawn through the southerly bend of Lake Michigan. Congress has exercised their power under this clause by saying that there shall be one or more States in that part of the said territory. Having thus used the power, they can no farther alter the boundaries of the three States, than by fixing their new northern limits where the proviso directs them to be fixed.

But it is argued that the power to form one or two States in that part of the territory north of the line drawn through the southerly bend of Lake Michigan means that they may form one or more States any where, in any part of the territory north of said line, and that they need not, unless they choose, make that line the base or southern boundary of the State or States so formed. Is this the common-sense, the obvious and the natural construction of the terms used? It seems to me to be quite the reverse. The language is not, that Congress may form one or two States in a part, or in any part, of the territory named; but that they may form one or two States in that part of the said territory which lies north of a given line. They can make no more than two States, at any rate, in that territory, and they can no farther alter the boundaries of the other States than by forming the one or two States in that part of the territory north of said line. The first clause of the fifth article, referring to the whole territory, declares there shall be formed, "in the said territory, not less than three nor more than five States." Will it be contended that the intention of this clause of that article would have been complied with by forming five States in a part of that whole territory, excluding from their limits a portion of it? Yet the phraseology is precisely the same in the one case as it is in the other. The true meaning, then, is, that the one or the two States shall be formed in all that part of the territory north of the designated line. This appears to be the clear and plain import and meaning of the language used. If this is correct, it follows of necessity, that, by the exercise of the power given under the proviso, the northern boundaries of the three States are so far altered as to be on the east and west line running through the southerly bend of the lake, instead of being on the territorial line between the United States and Canada. Beyond this, Congress cannot alter the boundaries of those States without the common consent, because by the ordinance these limits are declared to be unalterable. By the bill under consideration, Congress undertakes to establish a different boundary for the northern part of Ohio from either of those indicated in this ordinance, not only without, but against the consent of Michigan. In doing this, I believe they transcend their powers. Holding this opinion, I am constrained to vote against the bill.

The bill for the admission of Michigan into the Union, which has passed both Houses of Congress, and only waits the signature of the President to make it a law, contains the same provision as to the northern boundary of Ohio, as the one before us. This is one of the reasons which led me to oppose that measure by my vote. There were, to be sure, other objections of great weight, but this, standing alone, would have been sufficient to have settled my opinion against it. It is true, there was a clause in that bill calling on the people of Michigan to give their consent to the boundary as therein established. Upon that consent depends their admission into the Union. This, in my view, is another highly objectionable feature in that bill. Its incorporation is a palpable violation of the rights of the people of that Territory. Acting under its influence, they are, to all intents, in a state of moral duress. You place the boundary between them and a neighboring State, where they say you have no authority to place it, without their consent. They remonstrate against your act. Still you go on, and do what they protest you have no right to do, and tell them that, unless they give their assent to this violation of the compact, this dismemberment of their territory, they shall not come into the Union, but remain in a state of territorial bondage and dependence. Is this keeping the faith of the nation with the people of Michigan according to the plain and obvious meaning of the ordinance of 1786? If Congress has the power and the right to fix the northern boundary of the State of Ohio where she claims it should be, and where the act of admission fixes it, why require the people of Michigan to give their assent to it as a condition of their admission? If Congress has not this right, without the consent of the people of Michigan, where is the justice of the attempt to extort that consent from them? These, sir, are, in short, the reasons which compel me to stand up, though in a small minority, against the bill which you are about to pass by an overwhelming majority.

But that majority, however large, cannot annul, though they may violate, the sacred and unalterable ordinance of seventeen hundred and eighty-seven; an ordinance that will forever remain as a lofty monument of the wisdom and patriotism of its authors. The faith which it pledges should never be tarnished by a violation of its spirit, or an evasion of any of its provisions.

Mr. CAMBRELENG appealed to gentlemen not to continue the discussion. It was admitted on all hands that this bill was merely affirming the provisions of a bill which had passed the other day, and he hoped that discussion might not be protracted on a measure of this kind, when they had but fifteen days to act on the many important bills yet unacted on.

Mr. REYNOLDS, of Illinois, then moved the previous question; and the tellers reporting ayes 63, noes 19—no quorum—

Mr. CHAPIN moved a call of the House; which was ordered.

After proceeding in the call for some time,

Mr. HIESTER moved that its farther proceeding be dispensed with; which was agreed to.

The previous question was then seconded without a count, and the main question being ordered and put, was carried without a division. So the bill was passed.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

In further execution of the special order of the 26th of January, the House, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, proceeded to the consideration of the "bill making appropriations for certain fortifications for the year 1836." The bill was reported from the Committee of the Whole, with sundry amendments, and the question was on concurring in these amendments.

The amendment pending was the following:

"For fortifications, Charleston harbor, South Carolina, and preservation of the site of Fort Moultrie, $150,000," increased by the Committee of the Whole to "$200,000."

Mr. HARDIN addressed the House in opposition to the large appropriations embraced in these amendments. This bill, he said, involved an amount of money not less than $4,000,000. It could not be passed until the 1st of July, and from that time till the next session it would be impossible to expend so large a sum upon one species of works, especially when we took into consideration the vast expenditures now going on in the States for their works of internal improvement. He was convinced the labor could not be found by which so much money could be expended.

Mr. H. referred to a variety of details on the subject, and cited some documents in support of his views, among which were letters from Generals Gratiot and Wool, and to show that the amount proposed in this bill could not be judiciously expended, and that such an increase of fortifications would require a very great increase of military force.

Mr. PINCKNEY moved to amend the amendment, by specifying the objects of appropriation, viz: "one hundred and fifty thousand dollars shall be applied to the construction of a sea wall for the preservation of the site of Fort Moultrie, and the remainder for the construction and repair of Castle Pinckney."

After a few words from Messrs. PINCKNEY, McKAY, and CAMBRELENG, Mr. P. withdrew his amendment.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then, in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. HARDIN,] went into a statement to show what were the objects of the appropriations contained in the bill, and the amendments proposed by the committee. He said there was now no surplus of former appropriations, and the appropriations now proposed would all be needed during the year.

Mr. THOMPSON could not vote for the amendment. He protested again and again against the mode now becoming the established usage of the House, of voting large sums without any of the restraints and guards heretofore required. Upon what authority was this appropriation asked? Upon a report from the Department, a survey and estimates? No, but a general sweeping clause in a bill drawn at the Department, without even deigning to give a reason or a fact. How is a member, who votes for this clause, to justify himself to his constituents? By giving facts and reasons for it? No: he has none such. The only ground upon which he can put it is, that the Department recommended it. If this practice becomes common, there was no reason for the very useless and expensive encumbrance of a legislative body, if it is to sink into a mere registering of imperial rescripts; and if there is any class of legislative acts where the separation of executive and legislative power should be strictly guarded, it is in questions of taxation and appropriation. He was sure it was not so intended by the Secretary of War, but he did not regard it as respectful to this House to ask in this mode large appropriations without giving one reason for them.

It is said that the member from the district [Mr. PINCKNEY] thought that the appropriation was necessary. Mr. THOMPSON meant no disrespect to that gentleman; but he was sure the gentleman [Mr. PINCKNEY] would not himself be willing that any the least importance should be attached to his opinion on a question of fortifications. [Mr. PINCKNEY said he only spoke from the opinions of others and officers.] Then, sir, (said Mr. T.,) let us have that information. Those officers are our officers; we have a right to all the information which they can give. Let us know how much is necessary, and how much can be expended, and he would vote for the larger sum. He thought it probable that this sum, and a larger one, would be required; but he was perfectly sure that the smaller sum could not be expended, and therefore should not vote for the larger.

He had seen, if he was not mistaken, a letter of the gentleman [Mr. PINCKNEY] to his constituents, that he relies upon these large appropriations to Charleston as a set-off against an abandonment (Mr. T. would not say wilful) of the most important interests of the State, and that which is so regarded, almost with unanimity, throughout the State. As one of the representatives of the State, Mr. T. repelled, with scorn, the idea that all the money in your Treasury could tempt the people of that State from their devotion to its rights and interests, or that any agency in obtaining it will atone for a false step, in other and more important matters; nay, more, South Carolina would not only not do this, but the State will not engage in the disreputable scramble for public plunder. Mr. T. must be consistent: this amendment violates all those salutary checks and principles for which he has uniformly contended. He will not violate them now because his own State was to be benefited.

Mr. HALL said he did not rise with the view of entering into a general argument on the subject of fortifications, but for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to certain facts. He had already, while the House was in Committee of the Whole, expressed himself in favor of liberal appropriations for fortifications, and he intended to vote for such appropriations. It had been represented by gentlemen who were pressing this bill upon the House in all its details, and with all the amendments proposed by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that it was an ordinary appropriation bill; and surprise had been expressed that any part of it should meet with opposition. Under these circumstances, he had thought it proper to compare this bill with those for similar objects which had been proposed and passed in previous years, and he had accordingly collected from statutes and public documents some facts which he wished to submit to the House.

The amount of the present bill, as originally reported to the House, was	$1,875,592 95

Fortification Bill.

[JUNE 15, 1836.]

He would now compare this bill with those which had been passed during the previous years of the present administration. On recurring to the statutes, he found the amount of our former appropriations for fortifications to have been as follows:

Appropriations for 1830,	-	-	- $851,000
Do. 1831,	-	-	- 713,900
Do. 1832,	-	-	- 643,200
Do. 1833,	-	-	- 822,900
Do. 1834,	-	-	- 870,594

Whole amount for five years,	-	$3,901,594
------------------------------	---	-------------

It will be perceived (Mr. H. said) that the amount of the present bill only fell short of the whole appropriations for these five years by a little more than $200,000.

[Mr. CAMBRELENG here said he wished to correct the statement of the gentleman from Vermont. The present bill contained appropriations for other objects than for the construction of fortifications. Nearly one half the amount properly belonged to the army bill, and not to the fortification bill.]

Mr. H. said he had stated the matter correctly. He had stated that the bill contained an appropriation of $700,000 for the armament of fortifications, and $731,000 for other objects, and doubtless these two sums were for objects which belonged to the army bill, if they properly belonged any where. But did the honorable chairman recollect that the army appropriation bill had already passed; that it exceeded in amount the army bill of the last year by more than $900,000, although it contained no appropriations for the Indian wars, or for the increase of the army, which latter objects had all been provided for in separate bills? It was the army appropriation bill for the ordinary objects of a peace establishment, increased since last year from $3,100,000 to over $4,000,000. He did not think the gentleman would mend the matter much by transferring the location of these appropriations from one bill to the other. They were new and extraordinary, wherever they might be located; but as he intended to notice the $700,000 amendment for the armament of fortifications hereafter, he would proceed with his statement in regard to the bill. The present bill contained appropriations for the construction of fortifications of over $2,200,000, while the highest appropriation for any previous year had been but $870,000.

Mr. H. then called the attention of the House to the amount of the fortification bill of the last year. That bill, as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, and as it passed the House and was sent to the Senate, amounted to the precise sum of four hundred and thirty-nine thousand dollars. It passed this House on the 20th of January, 1835, and the statement of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. PARKER,] that the then Committee of Ways and Means had resisted and prevented all increase of it, was entirely correct. He (Mr. H.) recollected the efforts which were then made to obtain additional appropriations, and he remembered the existence of our difficulties with France was urged as an argument in their favor. He had looked into the journals of that day, and found that an additional appropriation of sixty-seven thousand dollars was proposed for Boston harbor, fifty thousand for Baltimore, and forty-four thousand for St. Augustine; that the yeas and nays were taken separately on each of these propositions, and all of them rejected. The name of the present chairman of the committee [Mr. CAMBRELENG] was recorded on the journal on each of these propositions, and on each of them in the negative. These three rejected additions amounted to the sum of one hundred and sixty thousand dollars, while the appropriations contained in this bill for the same objects footed at four hundred and fifty thousand dollars; and yet the House was told that the present bill was an ordinary fortification bill, and that it contained nothing calculated to excite opposition, or even particular examination.

Mr. H. said he did not pretend to be very wise on the subject of fortifications. It was not until lately that his attention had been particularly drawn to the subject, and he had only been able to examine it in the general, without going much into details. He had, however, examined it sufficiently to be satisfied that it was a great subject—one which very few men well understood, and one which required and demanded the most thorough and critical attention of every member of the House. It was worth while to know a little better than was now known what were the nature and extent of the objects to be gained by the erection of the works in contemplation—to ascertain the number of men and the character of the force which would be required to man them both in peace and war; and to be able to approximate towards an accurate estimate of the amount of expenditures which would be necessary to erect and to arm them. On the subject of expenditures, the examination he had made had satisfied him that very little reliance was to be placed on the estimates of the engineer department, in regard to the cost of fortifications. As instances in proof of the truth of what he asserted, he mentioned Forts Monroe and Calhoun, in Virginia. On Fortress Monroe there had been expended $1,739,000, and two years ago the House had been informed by the Department that the work was finished; yet the present bill contained an appropriation of $210,000 to complete it. The original estimate of the cost of this work was $1,260,000, which, deducted from the actual cost, gave an excess of expenditure over the estimate of $689,000. There had been expended already on Fort Calhoun $1,389,000, and it was now estimated that it would cost $531,000 more, making the whole cost $1,920,000. The original estimate was $904,000, showing an excess of cost over the estimate of $1,016,000. It would be noticed (Mr. H. said) that although about $1,400,000 had been expended on this fort, yet the estimate was not reduced $400,000; and if we went on at this rate, the actual cost of the work could not be expected to be much less than $3,000,000. And were these enormous expenditures necessary to the defence of the country? The Secretary of War had informed us in his report that they were not; that much smaller works would have answered every purpose better, as they might have been more cheaply and more certainly furnished with sufficient garrisons, and leaving the force thus spared from them for the defence of other exposed points in their vicinity.

There was another point to which Mr. H. said he wished to call the particular attention of the House. Neither the Department nor the chairman of the committee had expressed any opinion as to the practicability of expending the sums proposed in this bill on the contemplated works during the year. There had been a perfect silence on that subject. He had been desirous of bringing his mind to some definite conclusion in regard to it; and as the best means of arriving at a proper result, it had occurred to him to look back to the expenditures for the same objects during previous years. He found that the fortification bill of 1834, which amounted to eight hundred and seventy thousand dollars, was passed on the 30th of June of that year, about the same time in the season at which this would probably become a law; and he found it contained appropriations for many of the works which were provided for in this bill. Mr. H. said he had, from printed public documents, constructed a table, showing the items of appropriations of 1834, with the amount of the expenditures made during the year under each, and also the amount remaining unexpended; and for the purpose of further

Mr. H. stated the amount of appropriations of 1834 for each object, as contained in the table, with the sums expended during the year, and compared the amount of expenditures with the appropriations proposed in 1835, and with those in the present bill, and commented on them in detail. The general result of which, he said, appeared to be, that of the appropriations of eight hundred and seventy thousand dollars made in 1834, four hundred and seventy-five thousand were expended during the year, and three hundred and ninety-four thousand remained unexpended; that for those objects in 1835, the Committee of Ways and Means and the House, after the delivery of the reprisal message, had thought it necessary to appropriate four hundred and thirty-nine thousand dollars; and that now, when all danger of a foreign war had ceased, an appropriation was demanded of $1,920,000. He also referred particularly to the appropriation for the fort at Throg's Neck, near New York. It appeared that one hundred thousand dollars had been appropriated for that fort in 1834, only thirteen thousand six hundred dollars of which had been expended during the year; and on the 1st of January last there still remained unexpended of that appropriation the sum of forty-seven thousand nine hundred and fifty-six dollars and sixty-two cents. In the face of this fact, that only about one half of an appropriation of one hundred thousand dollars could be expended in two years, the committee had recommended a further appropriation of two hundred thousand dollars for the same object! He considered this recommendation as highly extraordinary and extravagant, and he could not conceive on what possible ground it could be justified or excused. The whole bill was altogether unprecedented in amount, most of the individual appropriations unnecessarily and extravagantly large; and no man, he presumed, would seriously pretend there was any expectation that the money could, by any possibility, be expended during the year. In consequence of the demand for labor, occasioned by the prosecution of the immense works of internal improvement going on in all parts of the country, he believed it would now be found much more difficult to expend money profitably than in 1834, and that whatever might be the amount of the appropriations, the expenditures could not be greater than those of that year. The money might, doubtless, be wasted, but he wished to make no appropriations for such a purpose. He was willing to appropriate all that there was any reasonable probability of expending to advantage, and at that point he desired to stop.

Mr. H. said the appropriation of seven hundred thousand dollars for the armament of fortifications was, in his opinion, wholly unnecessary, unless it should be deemed expedient to erect a cannon foundry. In that case a portion of the sum might be retained for that object. It would be recollected that there was an appropriation of two hundred thousand dollars for the armament of fortifications included in the army bill. This was just double the amount which had been appropriated on previous years, and he could show, from the report of the Secretary of War, that it was all which he deemed necessary. Mr. H. then sent to the chair the report of the Secretary, from which the Clerk read a clause at page 23, stating that for the armament of fortifications the Government had now on hand 1,818 new cannon, and about 1,000 others of a useless or doubtful character. That the works actually finished, or so far completed as to admit of a part of their armament being placed in them, required about 2,000 guns. It appeared, then, (Mr. H. said,) that but 182 new cannon were now required, and it could not be doubted that the two hundred thousand dollars already appropriated was much more than sufficient to furnish them. This matter of the armament of fortifications had been much confused by the manner in which the estimates had been presented. Estimates for fortifications which were completed, for those in progress, and for those only in contemplation, had all been jumbled together in one mass, and the amount exhibited as an estimate of what was now required. He would not comment in detail on this mode of procedure. The general view of the Secretary was the correct view, and the one on which the House ought to act.

Mr. H. commented on the mode in which many of the estimates were furnished from the Departments. He protested against the doctrine that the mere ipse dixit of some under officer in the War Department, that such a sum was proper for such an object, without any of the whys and the wherefores, without the specification of any data whatever as the ground of his opinion, was here to be taken as evidence of the propriety of the appropriation. Those who doubted the necessity of any particular appropriation ought not to be required to prove a negative, to show that the appropriation was unnecessary. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, whose peculiar business it was to communicate with the Departments, and to understand these matters, should be held to show affirmatively that the appropriations were proper, that the interests of the country required them, and that the money could be profitably expended. This was especially his duty when the appropriations, like those in the present bill, were so uncommon and extraordinary in amount. For himself, he had become tired of voting millions upon millions out of the public Treasury merely upon faith, and he hoped we should hereafter have reasons for all the extraordinary demands made upon it. He trusted the House would carefully examine this bill, and cut it down to some reasonable dimensions before passing it.

Mr. BOON rose and said that he had heard from a certain quarter much of self-praise from gentlemen who claimed for themselves the honor of being the only faithful "public sentinels" to watch the public Treasury, and to guard against what they are pleased to call a wasteful expenditure of the money of the dear "people." Sir, said Mr. B., all this may be well enough, and he would not dispute this point with gentlemen who might think proper to claim for themselves this honorable distinction. But he would say to these honorable gentlemen that there were two descriptions of "public sentinels." One description or character of "public sentinels," said Mr. B., are the advocates of high taxes being imposed upon the people for the purpose of enriching the public Treasury. The other description of "public sentinels" are those who guard the pockets and the purse of the people against the imposition of any higher or more tax than a sum sufficient only for a prudent and economical support of the Government under which we live. Sir, said Mr. B., I profess to belong to this latter description of "public sentinels," having been placed upon the public watchtower by a highly respectable and intelligent portion of the freemen of this nation. But we are told, Mr. Speaker, that some fifty or sixty millions of dollars over and above the wants of the Government have been drawn from the pockets of the people and locked up in the deposite banks, and that utter ruin to the country will follow, unless it should be speedily taken and distributed among the twenty-six States that now compose our Federal Union. Now, Mr. Speaker, if this vast sum of surplus revenue is really like to produce the evil complained of, I ask to what political party, and to which description of "public sentinels," should the blame attach? Surely not to the friends of this administration, for they have been the uniform advocates of reducing the taxes of the people to a standard of revenue sufficient only for the legitimate purposes of the Government. Sir, this has been, and still is, the policy advocated by this administration and its friends. While, on the other hand, a system of high taxes has been advocated by those who have stood opposed to this administration, any who now claim to be the only faithful "public sentinels" to guard with vigilance the money which they have been mainly instrumental in forcing from the pockets of the people by an unjust, and unequal, and oppressive "system" of taxation. I allude, Mr. Speaker, to your high tariff laws, and your public land laws. Sir, the day is not very far distant when the people, the working men of this country, will see where the shoe pinches, as well as feel it, and will, as sure as we now live, apply the proper remedy in due season.

Mr. B. said the people were ever ready to redress grievances which might be brought upon them by their public agents. The people, under the present state of affairs in our political history, would naturally be brought to inquire into the causes that have produced the evil at present complained of, and they will readily perceive that it has been produced by over-taxing the many, for the benefit of the few, and they will indignantly throw off the yoke of oppression by discarding from their service unfaithful public agents. Mr. B. said the people of this country would not be satisfied with the plan proposed for distributing the surplus revenue, for many good and valid reasons; one of which was, that the project, if adopted, would create an army of pensioned overseers—not pensioners for services rendered in their country's defence in times of war, but pensioners to disburse the money of the people, and to act as overseers over the working men of the country—who, to obtain one dollar, or even one cent, of the "spoils," would have to earn it by the sweat of their brow, by digging for it in the mud, and in ditches and swamps.

Mr. B. said the effect of this new "system" might be told in a very few words. The people are to be taxed, under the operation of the tariff laws and in the purchase of the public lands, with a view to raise a large surplus fund over and above the wants of the General Government, to be placed in the several State treasuries, to be applied to certain objects, under the direction of the State Legislatures; and while a portion of the people and the respective States may in some degree be benefited by the measure, there will be other portions, equally entitled to the benefit of the "spoils," that must and will, from the very nature of things, go wholly unprovided for out of this fund, so raised by a tax levied on the people at large. Who cannot perceive a state of things that must grow out of this new and (to say the least of it) doubtful policy? Why, I again ask, the necessity of over-taxing the people to raise a large surplus in the Treasury, to be scrambled for by Congress, and to be quarrelled over by the several State Legislatures? Sir, why not let the people's money stay in their own pockets, to be by themselves expended as they may think proper? Sir, the people are humbugged, and many of them are deceived in this matter. Sir, I go for lowering taxes, until the revenue shall be trimmed down to the Government standard. Let the issue be fairly made before the people, and there can be no earthly doubt as to their decision.

Sir, said Mr. B., the freemen of this country never will consent to yield to any "system" of taxation that will impose greater burdens upon the tax-paying community than what may be needed for the legitimate purposes of the Government. The people want no surplus in the Treasury above what may be necessary to meet any emergency that might happen in the event of a war with any foreign Power, or with the Indian tribes within our own borders. Above this, the pockets of the people are the safest repositories for their own money. Sir, I am opposed in toto to the project of raising any amount whatever of surplus revenue for distribution among the several States of this Union. Sir, the principle of high taxes is anti-republican, and will not be sanctioned by the people. The question should not be as to what shall be done with the surplus revenue, but it should be as to what shall be done to relieve the people from an unjust and oppressive system of taxation by the General Government.

The amendment pending was still further debated, being supported by Messrs. SUTHERLAND and ADAMS, and opposed by Messrs. BRIGGS and THOMPSON of South Carolina, when

Mr. MAURY moved that the House adjourn; which was agreed to: Ayes 73, noes 59.

And the House adjourned.

THURSDAY, JUNE 16.

BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. JUDSON, from the select committee on the subject, moved to take up and consider the report and resolutions of the standing committee appointed to inquire into an assault committed within the hall of the House of Representatives on Saturday last; which was agreed to.

The report was then read, and it concluded by recommending the adoption of the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That Henry G. Wheeler has been guilty of a contempt and breach of the privileges of this House, by committing the said assault in the hall of the House of Representatives while the House was in session.

2. Resolved, That the said Henry G. Wheeler shall be excluded from any place on the floor, or elsewhere in the hall, as a stenographer, to take down the debates of this House.

3. Resolved, That the said Henry G. Wheeler be securely imprisoned by the Sergeant-at-arms of this House for the remainder of the session, and that the Speaker of this House do issue his warrant to carry into effect this resolution.

Mr. JUDSON moved that Mr. Wheeler be brought to the bar of the House.

Mr. HAWES said he wished to offer an amendment to the resolutions, which, if agreed to by the House, would supersede the necessity, which he could not see in any stage, of bringing the individual to the bar of the House.

Mr. JUDSON withdrew his motion, it having precedence, to enable Mr. HAWES to submit the following, as a substitute for the three resolutions:

Resolved, That Henry G. Wheeler be discharged from the custody of the officers of this House.

Mr. H. made a few remarks in support of his amendment, and in reference to the subject of privilege generally, and he questioned the power of the House to inflict punishment. He adverted to the report of the committee, and the testimony upon which that report was based, which testimony came from the frank and voluntary declarations of Mr. Wheeler himself. Mr. H. had no wish to be considered as encouraging any thing of this character. On the contrary, he deplored it, and regretted that it should have occurred; but they were not prepared, at that late period of the session, to go into an investigation of this character. The individual had himself offered the only testimony the House was in possession of, and he has expressed his sorrow at the occurrence, and that he had no design to offer an indignity to the House. What more, then, let him ask, could the members of that House require? The individual had been led away by his feelings, in a momentary and irrepressible impulse of passion; and, under these circumstances, Mr. H. was not prepared to visit him with any severity of punishment.

Mr. ADAMS hoped that the third resolution would be struck out, or that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HAWES] would move his proposition as an amendment to that resolution only. The third resolution he considered went too far, and the amendment, as now proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, not far enough. He thought the excluding this gentleman from the hall as a stenographer would be sufficient punishment for the breach he had committed. He would therefore vote for the first resolution, and for the second with some modification, and for the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, if offered as a substitute for the third.

After several suggestions from Messrs. MASON of Virginia, EVANS, and HAMER,

Mr. HAWES accordingly moved his amendment as a substitute for the third resolution.

On motion of Mr. HIESTER, Mr. Wheeler was then placed at the bar of the House.

The question being on the adoption of the first resolution,

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he would vote for the first resolution, for he had no doubt that the accused had been guilty of a breach of the privilege of this House; but as he had met the question fairly, and had expressed his regret at the occurrence, Mr. V. was not disposed to inflict very severe punishment. He would, when the second resolution came to be considered, move to amend it, so as to limit the exclusion of the accused from this hall to the present session of Congress. This he thought, under all the circumstances, would be a punishment adequate to the offence.

Mr. CRAIG suggested that counsel should be assigned to the accused, and that he be interrogated if he wish to say any thing.

Mr. CHAMBERS, of Kentucky, said he had consulted with Mr. Wheeler, who said he desired to add nothing to his statement given in to the committee and embraced in the report.

Mr. ROBERTSON then moved a substitute for all the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That Henry G. Wheeler be discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-arms, and that he be excluded from the hall for the residue of the present session.

Mr. HAMER and Mr. GRANGER suggested that the House pass on the first resolution, and that the gentleman from Virginia offer his resolution as a substitute for the second and third.

Mr. ROBERTSON then modified his resolution by inserting the words, "for an indignity offered to this House."

After some further remarks from Messrs. MASON of Virginia and HAMER,

Mr. ROBERTSON withdrew his amendment, so as to permit the question to be taken on the first resolution.

The first resolution was then agreed to.

Mr. JUDSON, chairman of the select committee, moved to amend the second resolution by inserting at the end the following: "during the continuance of the present session of Congress;" which was agreed to, and the resolution as amended was also agreed to.

The question being on the third resolution,

Mr. HAWES moved the following substitute.

Resolved, That Henry G. Wheeler be discharged from the custody of the officers of this House."

Mr. JUDSON said it was due to the committee to state that, under the precedent of 1793, they felt bound to report this resolution; but he would also state that, from the very frank and honorable manner in which the accused had met the question before the committee, he himself had no objection to the amendment.

After some remarks from Mr. MANN of New York and Mr. HARDIN, the amendment was agreed to: Ayes 123, noes 31; and

The SPEAKER directed Mr. Wheeler to be immediately discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-arms.

LAND BILL.

The next business in order was the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act to appropriate, for a limited time, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands of the United States, and for granting lands to certain States."

The following motions were pending:

By Mr. CARR, to refer it to the Committee on the Public Lands;

By Mr. GILLET, to the Committee of Ways and Means; and

The following amendment, moved by Mr. DENNY: "with instructions to either committee to which the bill should be referred, to report the same on Wednesday next, without amendment."

Mr. SPEIGHT remarked that, in order to try the sense of the House on this bill, he would move to lay it on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, said as it was the object of the gentleman to try the sense of the House on this subject, he would move a call of the House for that purpose; and he made that motion accordingly.

The call was ordered, and proceeded in for some time, two hundred and two members having answered to their names; when,

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, it was dispensed with.

Mr. GRENELL then asked for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the bill on the table; which were ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, hoped the rule which compelled every member to vote in his place would be enforced in the present case; and he should move its enforcement wherever he saw it evaded.

The question was then taken, and decided in the negative: Yeas 96, nays 110, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ash, Ashley, Barton, Beale, Bean, Beaumont, Bockee, Boon, Bouldin, Bovee, Boyd, Brown, Cambreleng, Casey, Chaney, Chapman, Chapin, Cleveland, Craig, Cushman, Davis, Dickerson, Doubleday, Dromgoole, Dunlap, Efner, Fairfield, Farlin, W. K.

So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

MR. KINNARD moved to modify the instructions to the Committee on the Public Lands, so as to provide for disposing of the public lands in limited parcels to actual settlers, at prices sufficient to reimburse the United States for the expense of acquiring, surveying, and selling said lands.

MR. GARLAND, of Louisiana, sent to the Chair a motion to refer the bill to a select committee, with certain instructions, which he said he would move when in order.

MR. BOULDIN then rose and spoke as follows:

MR. SPEAKER: The whole question, then, at this time, is this: To what committee shall this bill be referred? It is of the utmost importance that it should be referred to the proper committee. I feel a desire to make a few remarks upon this bill, and shall make but few. I feel much interest in this subject, and my constituents, I am sure, feel much; the whole nation is alive to the importance of it—I mean the distribution of the public revenue, or rather, as it is generally called, the surplus revenue. Sir, I have heard it from all sides, and most emphatically said and reiterated from the school in politics to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [MR. DENNY] is attached, (and he himself has often and over and again repeated,) that the surplus revenue of the United States is dangerous to the people—dangerous to the Government of the United States—hostile to the purity of our institutions; and that it ought not to be permitted thus to endanger all that is dear to us—ought not to be permitted to exist in sums so large.

A natural inquiry, an all-important inquiry, here arises: How came this great evil in existence? Who created it? What was it created for? I hear the same song ringing in my ears from morning till night, "the danger of the surplus revenue." I know it is dangerous to the people, for I see and know and feel its effects. But who, sir, created it? The very men who now seek most to alarm us with its fearful consequences. The very men who said and insisted that nothing could secure the prosperity of the people of the Union but the very measure that gave birth to this dreadful calamity that has befallen us, and without continual sustenance from which it would immediately languish away and perish, and pass out of existence. And, sir, who are they? Are they not the friends of this bill and of the American system? Who do its friends take pride in claiming as the father of both? Perhaps, however, Alexander Hamilton was the true father of the American system. But another distinguished gentleman claims that system as his offspring, and his friends do so likewise, and he feels for it the never-dying attachment of a father to his offspring. Who is the father of this land bill, if he is not? How often and how long have we all heard and talked of the American system and the land bill? To whom has universal reputation given it? Who sustained this very bill in another body lately with such ardor and eloquence as is seldom rivalled any where by any man, if it was not the father of the American system? Did not the bill, in its original state, contain a provision that this money, when distributed, should be spent by the States in internal improvements and schools? I cannot, from these and many other reasons, but feel an apprehension that there is a desire, by this means and others, among the friends of this American system, to revive and continue it in existence. I have, therefore, a great choice as to what committee shall take charge of the bill.

The gentleman from Ohio [MR. VINTON] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [MR. DENNY] seemed to agree in part, and disagree in part. The one thought this surplus produced most mischief in one way, and the other in another way; but both agreed that its effects are dreadful, and will be worse. Sir, I own the evil is great, and the remedy difficult and doubtful; but who produced it? What is the remedy? To whom shall we fly for relief? These are questions as natural as they are important. We have seen who produced it. Now, sir, shall we fly to the same quarter for relief? If it was brought on us by them without knowing the effects, it shows a want of forecast. If designedly, knowing at the same time the effects likely to be produced, then surely we must infer that they think they have a remedy. They were warned of the evil, and implored to desist from it. The answer was, that without this protecting system, this tributary duty system, this "American system," the country could not prosper.

Now the thing is done, and the money collected and in hand, and that in defiance of all who thought with us, who were opposed to it, of the injustice of the measure as well as of its fearful consequences, the very men who produced the evil are loudest in complaints against it and against the administration, and the opposers of the whole plan that produced it, because it is in existence. True, if the President had not, by his veto, put a stop or a check to the progress of expenditures for internal improvements by the Federal Government, we should have no surplus; but we should have had the tariff, the internal improvement, and the bank, in all their strength. If, then, we raise the money and distribute it among the States, and by that means carry on the American system in a new way, what would be the difference? Simply this: we should have to pay for collecting and distributing (instead of collecting only) this surplus revenue. This would be the whole difference in effect, and so increase the tariff to that extent.

I prefer to intrust the care of this evil to those who were against the creation of it, and are opposed to the continuance of it. The father and all the most devoted friends of the bill were friendly to the creation of this surplus, and friendly to all the measures that are calculated to supply the fountain from which it must continue to be fed, if fed at all.

JUNE 16, 1836.]

Land Bill.

[H. OF R.]

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DENNY] said the bill ought to go into the hands of those who had no feeling on the subject. Then, sir, it would go where I would be more willing than he would to see it go. It would go out of this House, for there is nobody here that has no feeling about it. Who here has no feeling on the subject? What committee of this House has none? Did the gentleman himself display no feeling about it? I am free to admit, sir, that I have a great deal of feeling on the subject, and so has the whole nation. Yet, if we should now be brought to the point of the bayonet about the distribution of it, as we were on account of the gathering of it, and the Union at hazard, and the whole nation in a ferment, it is then that a certain gentleman, who has the reputation of being the father of this project, as he was of the other, after having raised such a degree of heat that it would again seem as if the Union itself would be dissolved, may perhaps again interpose and arrest the consequences, and again obtain the credit of making peace, after having had awarded to him that of causing the war. Sir, I am unwilling to intrust this particular subject to any man, or the supporters of any man, who raised the money at the hazard of the dissolution of the Union, to be distributed back among the States for purposes of internal improvement, or upon charity.

I am anxious not to send it into the channel into which the friends of the American system wish to send it, for the very reasons that have been urged for doing so. I do not know as yet what I may think the best to be done with the money; but I do know that I wish the American system defeated. I know it has been said often that this administration have done nothing that the South had expected from it; that the President was and is an internal improvement man, a tariff man, and a bank man. I care but little for charges, and not much more for abstract opinions; but I have great reliance upon actions, especially if long persevered in, and under difficulties. Sir, the present Chief Magistrate is the first President, from the foundation of the Government, that has ventured to advise or hint the least abatement of this protective system, as far as my recollection extends. While he is advising, message after message, that it should be reduced, I find the internal improvement system suddenly arrested, the tariff brought to a stand, and afterwards reduced, and a recharter of the Bank of the United States refused. What did the South desire of him more than to put down the bank, the internal improvement system, and protecting duty system, commonly called tariff; in short, the American system?

But it has been said, sir, though checked or put down during this administration, it has not contributed to do it; that the President and a majority in Congress are in favor of them all. Heaven protect me from being a favorite, if this is the fate of favorites. But I will go into no argument in answer to this charge, further than merely to refer to a declaration made by the father of the system himself. Alluding to the President of the United States, and the Governor of Pennsylvania, during the panic session, he said: "Internal improvement dead at his feet, (the President's;) Bank of the United States prostrate under his conquering hand; tariff just not annihilated: and this is the man that Pennsylvania delights to honor."

Now, sir, who ought to know, who does know, better than that gentleman, who has inflicted this cruelty to his own offspring? Sir, it is, for the most part, the first love that sticks. His heart was early fixed on this system, and that attachment can only be extinguished with life. I grant it ardent—I am sure it is sincere; and I think it folly to expect it to give way now. Would attachment thus indelible, judgment so profound, acumen so penetrating, research so unwearied, as will be accorded by all to the father of the American system, likely mistake the friends for the foes of the apple of his eye? I think not. I cannot but believe that he knew the President had been chiefly instrumental in putting down this system—a system which is hideous to the eyes and hateful to the feelings of many of the South, who, with myself, have suffered long and painfully under it. I cannot but recognise this bill as a renewal of the system—a scheme to get a hold on the States to induce them to commence internal improvements on their own account, looking to Congress for the money. Suppose them, then, half finished; what would be the natural consequence? Would not the States be tempted to submit to a high tariff to finish them? It is in vain to say that States cannot be tempted. "Lead us not into temptation" will apply as well to States as to men. How many men of the boldest spirits have been thus tempted by the miser, brought into his snares, and thus become his slaves? Sir, is not this the evident effect, if not the object, of the bill under consideration?

I am willing to have the advice of an intelligent committee, for I am in doubt what is the best thing to be done with this money. I understand that this House is divided into two parties on the object of this bill. One in favor of high duties or taxes—protecting duties—the American system; and the other against it. I do not wish the bill to go into the hands of the friends of this system. I wish it to go into the hands of those who were, and are, and will be, opposed to the renewal of it. Is there such a committee in this House? If there be, I wish it referred to that committee. Sir, I am not very well acquainted with the rules, and orders, and committees, and parties, of this House. I know much better where I do not wish the bill to go, than where I do want it to go.

If there be a committee who thought that the whole supposed sixty millions of surplus ought to have remained in the United States Bank, with a capital of not much more than half that amount, while the amount of surplus is constantly accumulating—who thought the Bank of the United States had a mortgage on our surplus fund as long as the bank continued, or as long as they were good, in consideration of $1,500,000 to be paid by instalments—I do not wish it to go to that committee.

By the way, Mr. Speaker, what a strange contract this must have been. If we applied while the charter remained, and they were good for the money, we could not get it; if when they were good for nothing, whether the charter had expired or not, we could not get it. Though pushed for money to such a degree as to be obliged to execute such a mortgage as this, still we have had, from the execution of the mortgage, more than the sum obtained, or rather promised, deposited without interest with them.

They proposed that Congress should grant them exclusive privileges, and offered to pay for them. After chaffering, it was agreed that for so much money to be paid by instalment, and for service to be rendered by them to the United States—to wit: that they would hold their revenues in their banks, and pay the money out when it was required—the charter was granted; and to enable the bank to pay according to their contract, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to pay the revenues into their banks, in order that they might be able to execute this part of their contract. If the Secretary at any time thought proper to place it elsewhere, he was authorized to do so, as he had always been before. Of course, if the money was not paid into the bank, they had no risk of holding, or trouble in paying out. They whipped this around into a mortgage on our surplus funds, and it seems to me an attempt was made to dragoon a gallant nation into submission to this monstrous pretension. And, sir, what is the surplus revenue? It must be the balance in the Treasury after an economical administration of the Government. If a man buy or obtain a mortgage on an interest in an estate, he has the right to superintend the executor, and see that he run into no unnecessary expenses. If the bank had such a mortgage as the one supposed, she had a right to superintend all our disbursements of money, and keep us within economical bounds. God grant that any thing could keep us within the bounds of economy. But had we the right to reduce the tariff, and thus the surplus, to which, by this view of the subject, the bank was entitled by purchase or mortgage, while they had this lien on us? Had I ever believed that such a bargain had been constitutionally made, I would have held the nation bound to carry it into effect. But I never believed it. If there be any committee who thought so, or, thinking so, thought it ought to be renewed and rechartered, I do not wish this bill to go to that committee. I view them all, bank, internal improvement by the Federal Government, and tariff, to be the American system. You make no internal improvement without money; and you cannot get money without some place to go to for it. True, the tariff brings it, but you must have a place to put it. The Government dues you can pay away; but you must hoard up when you go for the great improvements, or go in debt. Whether there be any necessary connexion or not, there is great intimacy among the friends of each. There are some who are against the Bank of the United States, but would ransack heaven and earth for arguments, if they could find them, to prove that we cannot live without it; that the public money is safe nowhere else.

Fortification Bill.

Sir, if there be a committee who a short time since told us, in substance, that but for the mercy of the French, and the good behaviour of a certain other honorable body not far off, we should have been utterly destroyed, our whole Atlantic coast set on flames, and who now, fearing that this surplus, or a part of it, should be spent in fortifying the country, now tell us that we have whipped the British, who had been too strong for the world—who say we are double as strong in numbers, and four-fold in money and fortifications, and what do we want with fortifications—I do not wish this bill to go to that committee.

While all was tranquillity at home and peace abroad, high prices for every article, the fruit of industry bore a fair price, and health and prosperity prevailed through the land, still there were many who were not happy—who feretold evil to come, and even at hand. Now that we have war, the cry is the same. While we had no money, but were in debt, the cry was the same; and now we have money beforehand, the cry is still the same; and at last, this direful evil of having more money than we know what to do with has come upon us. I would compare these evil prophets to the Rain Crow. His mate happens to be on her nest, setting for weeks to bring her young into life, in the most rainy season of the year. Lonely and dissatisfied, he keeps an unwearied complaint, while his mate sits silent and patient in her nest. Rain comes plentifully during this season, and he is denominated the Rain Crow, without his knowing or caring any thing about the rain. So these prophets who prophesy evil, and only evil, must at last prove true prophets. It is certain, I suppose, that some of them at least know the time and the means of raising this money, but expected it to be laid out, long before collected, in internal improvements. So that as to the evil of having accumulated this vast sum, they were as ignorant, and perhaps more ignorant, than those who are opposed to internal improvement by the Federal Government. The evil, however, has come upon us, and I acknowledge it to be great, the remedy difficult, and success doubtful. I am anxious to hear the advice of some appropriate committee.

There is a remedy which I have not ventured even seriously to think of putting to practice, much less to hint to you before. But, sir, suppose that committee, in their wisdom and patriotism, in order to put a check or a stop to the dreadful and growing evil, should suggest to this House the propriety of reducing the taxes to the wants of the Government, what would you think of it? Who would, or could, or ought to complain of it? Would it be a class of people loud in complaints and brilliant in imagination, to magnify the evil of the surplus, and prompt to foretell the utter ruin of us all, should this surplus continue to accumulate? who would tell you that the evil might be thus remedied, and the balance of the nation saved, but their manufactures destroyed? The balance of the nation would be saved, but they would have to give something more for land, if they wished to purchase, should the sale of the public lands be stopped.

Mr. Speaker, though this seems to be a remedy so natural, simple, and certain, I am afraid almost even to hint or to hope that any committee will so report, lest I should be told of breach of compromise, breach of faith. Sir, I do not wish to render myself liable to such a charge by any suggestion. But if any class have such a hold on our faith, are they Shylocks? Will they insist on the pound of flesh? Will they do worse? Will they destroy themselves and us to have their contract literally executed? I can hardly think there is such an one in existence; but if there be, let faith be kept, though we all perish.

Mr. Speaker, I am under the perfect conviction, that as the levying these duties so far exceeded the wants of the Government, to favor a few at the expense of the many, had well nigh involved us in civil war, so the distribution of sums so large must threaten the purity of the public functionaries, and corrupt all the channels of virtue and information to the people, and cause our simple republican institutions to totter on their foundations.

Mr. Speaker, sums as large as these cannot be safe any where, either in regard to themselves, (looking only to their own security,) or in regard to the purity of those who may be tempted by them. Sir, is there any thing in the tariff compromise which will justify us to go on taxing the people, when the very sums collected will hazard the peace and security of the Union, and endanger every thing that can be dear to freemen?

[Mr. Boudin's remarks were not concluded when the orders of the day again arrived, and he was prevented from bringing them to a close.]

FORTIFICATION BILL.

In further execution of the special order of the 26th of January, the House, on motion of Mr. CAMBRELENG, proceeded to the consideration of the "bill making appropriations for certain fortifications for the year 1836." The bill was reported from the Committee of the Whole, with sundry amendments, and the question was on concurring in these amendments.

The amendment pending was the following:

"For fortifications, Charleston harbor, South Carolina, and preservation of the site of Fort Moultrie, $150,000," increased by the Committee of the Whole to "$200,000."

The question was then taken on the amendment, and it was non-concurred in: Yeas 85, nays 38.

Mr. STORER then rose, and moved a reconsideration of the vote; and, in reply to Mr. GRAVES, stated that he made the motion at the request of a gentleman behind him, [Mr. PIERCE], than whom a purer-minded man did not breathe. He himself, however, should again vote against the amendment.

Mr. CUSHMAN asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

JUNE 16, 1836.]

Fortification Bill.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. EVANS moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, and thereon

Mr. CUSHMAN asked for the yeas and nays; but the House refused to order them.

Mr. EVANS withdrew the motion to lay on the table. After a few remarks from Messrs. MERCER, GRAVES, STORER, and LANE, the question was taken, and decided in the negative: Yeas 90, nays 103.

The following amendment of the Committee of the Whole was then taken up:

Strike out of the bill the following clause:

"For incidental expenses attending repairs of new and old fortifications, and for the purchase of new sites, and the enlargement of old ones, at such places as the public service may require on the seaboard of the United States, $200,000," and insert "for incidental expenses attending repairs of fortifications, and for the purchase of additional land in their neighborhood, $200,000."

Mr. THOMSON, of Ohio, proposed further to amend by inserting an appropriation to compromise and secure to the United States the title to the Pea Patch Island, in the river Delaware.

The CHAIR ruled the proposed amendment to be out of order, on the ground that its provisions were the same as were embraced in a bill then on the table.

RECESS.

Mr. SPEIGHT said he would make a motion that he believed would meet the concurrence of a large majority of the House. He moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of taking a recess at some hour that day and thereafter. Agreed to, by a vote of 111 to 50.

Mr. SPEIGHT then moved a resolution that the House take a recess from half past 2 o'clock P. M. till 4 o'clock on this day, and on each succeeding day during the present session of Congress.

After some suggestions and amendments proposed by Messrs. HIESTER, MANN of New York, and MASON of Virginia, the original resolution was agreed to: Yeas 114, nays not counted.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then sent to the Clerk's table a document from the engineer department, explanatory of the amendment.

Mr. HARD moved to reduce the sum in the amendment to $100,000.

Mr. H. was proceeding to address the House on the subject, when his remarks were arrested by the arrival of the time for the House to take its recess.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. HARD concluded his remarks in support of his proposition to reduce the appropriation one half; and the debate was continued by Mr. PARKER; when

Mr. HAWES said, as the Senate had passed a bill for the distribution of the public moneys by a vote of 40 to 6, all the moneys which could be saved from these extraordinary appropriations would add to the amount of the distribution. He therefore moved the previous question.

The question on the second to the previous question was taken by tellers, and negatived, only 38 voting in the affirmative.

The debate was then further continued by Messrs. HALL of Vermont, UNDERWOOD, CALHOUN of Massachusetts, BRIGGS, LAWRENCE, CAMBRELENG, McKIM, GRAVES, McKAY, and WHITTLESEY of Ohio.

Mr. HALL, of Vermont, called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 96, nays 88.

So the amendment to the amendment of the Committee of the Whole was decided in the affirmative.

The question then recurred on the motion to strike out and insert.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to strike out the following words: "and for the purchase of additional land in their neighborhood." He stated that he made the motion because the principle of authorizing executive officers to purchase land was a novel and highly objectionable one; and it would be easy at any time, when land was required for such a purpose, to make an application to Congress.

Mr. CAMBRELENG briefly replied to the gentleman from Virginia, and defended the propriety of the appropriations proposed in this bill for the defence of the country. The measures embraced in it were admitted on all sides to be indispensable. These appropriations were now resisted, because the surplus for distribution should not be diminished; and in two years from this time the gentlemen from the South and West would find their constituents called upon for increased taxation. All he desired was to save a comparatively small amount for the necessary defences of the country; and he went on to show that the whole extraordinary appropriations would not amount to more than $2,000,000 during the present session, while gentlemen said there was a surplus of something like $50,000,000.

Mr. HARDIN contended that if the House had passed all the extraordinary appropriations proposed this session, they would have exceeded $10,000,000. The argument of the gentleman from New York, that if a certain measure were passed the people would in two years be called upon for an increase of taxes, was a mere speculation, in which Mr. H. put no faith. The population was on the increase, and the reduction of duties would produce greater consumption, and consequently supersede the necessity of any increase of taxes. Mr. H. said he would make a motion he had, he believed, hardly ever made in his life before, though he had been twenty years in legislative bodies; he would move that the House adjourn.

Mr. CAMBRELENG called for the yeas and nays; whereupon

Mr. HARDIN withdrew his motion.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, said a few words in opposition to the amendment of his colleague.

Mr. McKAY drew the attention of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. ROBERTSON] to the fact, that up to 1820 the Government invariably purchased land, without any special provision or appropriation for the purpose.

Mr. ROBERTSON replied that the gentleman from North Carolina had produced a very bad precedent, which it seemed the Committee of Ways and Means were about to re-establish.

After a few words from Mr. WISE, the amendment was rejected.

The amendment of the committee, as amended by the House, was then concurred in.

The following amendment of the Committee of the Whole was then propounded:

"For the armament of fortifications, in addition to the amount included in the bill making appropriations for the support of the army for 1836, seven hundred thousand dollars: Provided, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to expend so much of the said sum as may be necessary therefor, in establishing a national foundry, at such place as he may deem expedient."

Mr. CAMBRELENG proposed the following amendment, to come in after "1836:"

"Including cannon, mortars, howitzers, gun carriages, howitzer carriages, mortar beds, powder, cannon balls, shells, and for transportation of ordnance and ordnance stores; and in the purchase of twenty acres of land, adjoining the Kennebec arsenal, Maine; and the purchase of land, and enclosing the rear of the public ground with a brick wall and coping, at the Frankford arsenal, Pennsylvania; and constructing a forging shop, one story high, 75 by 40 feet, of brick, at the arsenal, Watertown, Massachusetts; and for the purchase of a steam engine of eight-horse power, and for quarters for officers, at Fort Monroe arsenal."

Mr. C. explained that the effect of the amendment, if adopted, would be to diminish the appropriation embraced in the amendment to $450,000. If the House should reject this amendment, he should then move to reduce the original amendment from $700,000 to $450,000.

After some remarks from Messrs. BRIGGS, DENNY, MERCER, CAMBRELENG, and BOND,

Mr. HUNTSMAN moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. CAMBRELENG asked for the yeas and nays, but the House refused to order them.

And the motion to adjourn prevailed: Ayes 76, noes 75. So the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, JUNE 17.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

Mr. WHITTLESEY, of Ohio, moved a suspension of the rules for this day, for the purpose of proceeding with the consideration of the "fortification bill," expressing a hope that it would be brought to a conclusion as soon as possible.

Mr. CAMBRELENG remarked that he had given notice of his intention to move to take up the "deposite bill" this day; but, under the expectation that the "fortification bill" would be finished to-day, he would not press the other motion, but hoped the House would concur in that made by the gentleman from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to without a count.

Mr. CAMBRELENG then withdrew for the present the amendment offered by him last evening, giving notice that he should move it when the amendments of the Committee of the Whole had been gone through with.

The question accordingly recurred on the amendment reported to the House, appropriating $700,000 for the armament of fortifications, (given at length above.)

Mr. BOND concluded his remarks in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved to amend the amendment by striking out all after the word "therefor," and inserting "that there shall be set apart, from the appropriation contained in the amendment, a sum not exceeding $75,000, for the establishment of a national foundry at the city of Washington; and an additional sum of $10,000 for the purchase of adjoining land and water power from the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal Company."

Mr. MERCER made some remarks in favor of the establishment of a national foundry, but he did not consider the sum proposed by this amendment sufficient. He was favorable to having all our ordnance manufactured in a foundry of the Government, as he considered the work would be much better executed by this means than by private contract.

Mr. DROMGOOLE adverted to the report of the Committee on Military Affairs. He said that committee was favorable to the purchase of the foundry already established within the District of Columbia, if such purchase could be effected. By this purchase the Government would at once be enabled to go on in the manufacture of ordnance, as all the materials would be ready to commence operations. Mr. D. said the sum proposed by his amendment was sufficient for the purchase of this foundry, and he thought it would be the better plan to try the experiment on a small scale than to build up a great foundry for the purpose of manufacturing all the ordnance which the Government might need.

Mr. A. H. SHEPPERD made a point of order, whether the gentleman from Virginia could move an amendment to this bill when the same proposition was contained in a bill now before the House.

The CHAIR decided the amendment to be in order.

Mr. BRIGGS appealed from the decision of the Chair.

After a few remarks on the point of order by Messrs. DROMGOOLE, BRIGGS, MASON of Virginia, WISE, and A. H. SHEPPERD,

Mr. SPEIGHT (the Speaker pro tem.) remarked, that whenever he had the honor to occupy the chair, as he now did from the indisposition of the Speaker, he should discharge the duties of the station, and particularly on points of order, with the utmost caution and deliberation. It is true, as had been stated, that no amendment can be entertained to a bill under consideration, of the same nature of another bill or proposition pending before the House; yet it was nevertheless true that amendments had been and could be entertained, which were substantially the same as bills before the House. In this particular case, it is true that a bill is pending of a kindred nature to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia; but there is a manifest difference between them, both in form and substance. The amendment is of a general nature, clothing the President with plenary powers; but the bill No. 628, to which reference had been made, was particularly directed to a specific object. Upon a view of the whole case, he felt no hesitation in saying that the amendment was perfectly in order, and, as such, he should entertain it.

Mr. BRIGGS then withdrew the appeal, and

Mr. HAWES renewed it; when the point was further discussed by Messrs. R. M. JOHNSON, WARD, and SMITH; when

Mr. HAMER moved the previous question on the appeal; which was seconded: Ayes 90, noes not counted; and the main question, being ordered, was put, and decided in the affirmative: Ayes 69, noes 51.

So the decision of the Chair was affirmed.

Mr. DENNY was opposed to the amendment, and also opposed to the erection of a great national foundry. These great works might be necessary in Europe, but he conceived they were not needed in this country. If gentlemen would refer to the report of the Secretary of War, they would see that in three years a great national foundry would manufacture sufficient ordnance for all the fortifications; and when that was done, the foundry would be of no further use to the country, or but very trifling. Another inconvenience also arose from the fact, that if this amendment should prevail, it would be two years, at least, before the national foundry would be in such a state of completion as to be of any service in the casting of ordnance. On these points Mr. D. dwelt at some length, and quoted largely from the documents of the War Department.

Mr. REED believed the District was the best situation for the erection of a foundry, and he preferred leaving the selection of the site to the President. He had no distrust of him on that subject. It was true that up to this time our cannon had been cast by private contract, but that offered no reason why the same plan should be continued. Certainly the contractors could have no reason to complain, since they had long enjoyed a very profitable monopoly.

Mr. WISE was at a loss to perceive any objection to the construction of a national foundry, for it had been earnestly recommended by the Secretary of War, whose opinion was corroborated by some of the ablest of our officers and engineers, and it was approved of by the Military Committee of that House. The next question was, where was the best site? Two committees had had the subject under consideration, and the District of Columbia was recommended as presenting the best locality, for the quality of the ore in the vicinity, for the advantages of water power, for the facilities of transportation, and as being near the seat of the General Government, over any other section of the country. Mr. W. quoted at some length from the report which gave the reasons at length in favor of the District.

The third question was, what kind of a foundry was wanted? This was answered in the reply of Captain Thomas Ap C. Jones to the interrogatory of the committee. A cheap foundry, on a small scale, for purposes of experiment. Mr. W. adverted to the fact that the metal at Pittsburg was not equal to that in the vicinity of the District. At the former the failures were numerous, egregiously so; while in the District they varied only from one to two per cent.; that is, no more than one or two guns out of a hundred failed to stand the test.

Mr. HESTER made an earnest appeal to the House, particularly to members of the opposition, not to speak or make long speeches, but to vote. There were but few days remaining of the session, and he did hope that, after the long and protracted debates that had already occupied the session, they would now begin to vote.

Mr. McKAY suggested a modification of the amendment, so as to leave it entirely discretionary with the President, and not to restrict the Executive to the purchase of General Mason's foundry, but limiting the sum to be expended for the purpose to $75,000. He could not vote for the amendment, because by it the Executive would be restricted to the purchase of General Mason's foundry, which he was satisfied was not worth the sum asked, (viz: $75,000,) by $25,000. He should vote against it, and move one to the effect he had indicated.

Mr. DICKERSON referred to the report of the Secretary of War, by which it was seen that that officer was limited in his inquiries to the District of Columbia, and he neither did nor had authority to extend his researches further.

Mr. THOMSON, of Ohio, gave a detailed statement of what had taken place before the Military Committee, in relation to this subject. Mr. T. was a member of the sub-committee which had made an examination of the site of General Mason's foundry, and he considered it a most advantageous one. Beside this, there was every kind of machinery connected with the establishment for the casting and manufacture of ordnance.

Mr. LANE said he had risen for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to one or two facts in relation to the bill under consideration, and the unfinished business upon the Speaker's table. The day of adjournment has been fixed. The hours of the session are numbered. Are gentlemen aware of the shortness of time allotted for the action of this House upon the immense business before it, and the importance of many of those bills to the nation, and more especially to the West? And, sir, what are we doing, and what have we done for the last two days? On yesterday morning the House commenced at the 37th line of the bill; we are now at the close of the second day, and we have arrived at the 51st line, having passed over fourteen lines in two days. Seventy-one lines of the bill remain to be considered, which, at the same rate of speed, will require one day beyond that of adjournment. Yet, sir, are honorable gentlemen engaged in idle and useless debate, as if it was the first week of a long session.

The people expect action, voting, not idle debate, having no reference to the subject-matter before the House. The nation demand it; our own reputations require it. And, Mr. L. said, he would advise the friends of the bill to vote, and not talk, if they intended to pass this bill. Should they not profit by this advice, necessity and duty will call upon a majority of this House to lay this bill upon the table, that others equally important may come in for a share of the time of the House; and if no other member shall be found to make that motion, Mr. L. said he would make it himself. The interior and the far West have rights as well as the seaboard; and, as one of the representatives of the West, he should be wanting in his duty, should he sit silent and suffer such a wanton consumption of the time of the House and the people of the nation.

Mr. SMITH asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered; and the question being then taken, was decided in the negative: Yeas 27, nays 159.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The House then, according to the order adopted on yesterday, took a recess from half past 2 to 4 o'clock, P. M.

EVENING SESSION.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

The following amendment being pending,

"For the armament of fortifications, in addition to the amount included in the bill making appropriations for the support of the army for one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, seven hundred thousand dollars: Provided, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to expend so much of the said sum as may be necessary therefor in establishing a national foundry, at such place as he may deem expedient."

Mr. GRANGER moved to reduce the sum of $700,000 to $400,000, on the ground that this was as much as could possibly be expended for the object contemplated between this and the 4th of March. Mr. G. also moved to strike out the proviso, and called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he had himself intended to move to reduce the item to the sum embraced in his colleague's motion, if the proviso were stricken out; and he had distinctly stated that fact to the House on yesterday.

After some further remarks from Messrs. CAMBRELENG, MERCER, CHAMBERS of Pennsylvania, GRAVES, CUSHING, and PEARCE of Rhode Island,

Mr. GRANGER modified his motion by proposing to strike out the proviso first; which motion was agreed to without a count.

Mr. GRANGER then renewed his motion to reduce the appropriation to $400,000; and the call for the yeas and nays being withdrawn,

Mr. CAMBRELENG said he was in favor of this motion, for reasons before given; and it was substantially his own amendment. It was agreed to without a count.

The question then recurring on the amendment as amended,

Mr. CAMBRELENG renewed the following amendment, offered by him on yesterday, to come in after "1836:"

"Including cannon, mortars, howitzers, gun carriages, howitzer carriages, mortar beds, powder, cannon balls, shells, and for transportation of ordnance and ordnance stores; and in the purchase of twenty acres of land adjoining the Kennebec arsenal, Maine; and the purchase of land, and enclosing the rear of the public ground with a brick wall and coping, at the Frankford arsenal, Pennsylvania; and constructing a forging shop, one story high, seventy-five by forty feet, of brick, at the arsenal, Watertown, Massachusetts; and for the purchase of a steam engine of eight-horse power, and for quarters for officers, at Fort Monroe arsenal."

This amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER offered the following amendment to the amendment; which was disagreed to:

"And that the Secretary of War is hereby required to cause an examination to be made, by some competent person, of the foundries in East Tennessee; also, the quality of the iron for cannon and small arms; and cause a report to be made to Congress at the next session, or as early as practicable, of the facts; and also his views as to the propriety and practicability of procuring cannon from that part of the country, for the armament of our forts and fortifications, and naval service. The amount of the expense attending such examination to be paid out of this sum."

The amendment of the Committee of the Whole, as amended, was then concurred in.

The following amendment was concurred in without a division:

"For Fort McHenry, Redoubt Wood, and Covington Battery, near Baltimore, fifty thousand dollars."

Mr. HAWES moved to reduce the following amendment:

"For Fort Monroe, two hundred and ten thousand dollars," to $15,000; agreed to: Ayes 65, noes 63; and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. McKAY moved to amend the following:

"For fortifications at St. Augustine, Florida, fifty thousand dollars," by striking out the first two words, and inserting "For the repair of Fort St. Mary, and the sea wall at," which was agreed to, and the whole amendment concurred in.

The following was concurred in without a division:

"For knapsacks and camp equipage authorized by the act approved the nineteenth of March, one thousand eight hundred and thirty-six, for volunteers of militia, fifty-two thousand seven hundred and five dollars."

The following amendment being propounded from the Chair:

"For accoutrements for the army, one hundred and two thousand three hundred and five dollars"—

Mr. GRANGER made some inquiries in relation to the items of which this clause was made up.

Mr. CAMBRELENG sent a document in explanation to the Clerk's table; which was read.

Mr. GRANGER said he was satisfied.

Mr. DUNLAP moved to add the following: "and that $50,000 of said appropriation be appropriated to the erection of a public depot for arms at Memphis, Tennessee." Lost; and the amendment of the committee was concurred in.

The following amendment being propounded:

"For a depot for munitions of war in the Territory of Arkansas, forty-two thousand two hundred and fifty-six dollars"—

Mr. McKAY thought it had been improperly introduced in this bill, inasmuch as it was for a new work, and had not undergone the examination of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ASHLEY spoke to the following effect: He said the objections urged by the gentleman from North Carolina were not, in his opinion, well founded; and it would, no doubt, so appear to every gentleman of the House, on referring to a map of the country, showing the relative situation of Memphis to the quarter from whence danger was expected, and against which the depot was intended. The necessary arms and munitions of war for the defence of that portion of the frontier ought to be placed high up the Arkansas, not further east than Little Rock, and he should vote accordingly. Mr. A. reminded the House that Missouri was in the same situation of Arkansas, as regards danger on the Western frontier. A bill was then in possession of the House providing for a depot at some convenient point on the Missouri river; but as there was much business before the House, that bill might not be reached on the calendar, he proposed, therefore to amend the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee so as to provide for the depot in Missouri in the bill then under consideration. It being an appropriation bill, would, without doubt, command the consideration of both Houses of Congress. Mr. A. said it was highly proper to provide all the necessary means to be used in defending the frontier, and place them at convenient points, where they could be used on the first appearance of hostilities. He was not in favor of sending to Washington for instructions, or three or four hundred miles for arms and munitions of war, after an attack had been made on the frontier inhabitants, before the enemy could be met. He wished the necessary provisions made to enable the militia of the States and Territories most exposed to strike at once, in the event of a war, with such regular troops as may be at hand, and, in place of addressing the Secretary of War on the subject of supplies, &c., for carrying on the war, to inform that officer of the enemy's having been repulsed and defeated. He was not disposed to boast of the militia of Missouri, but he would venture to say they would do their duty in the event of war in that quarter, and he wished them to have the means of doing so effectually.

He (Mr. A.) had proposed, some days ago, that cannon, &c., for two companies of light artillery should be placed at the disposal of the Governor of Missouri; the proposition was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, before whom, on an invitation from the chairman, he (Mr. A.) had appeared, and given, as he thought, good reasons for the adoption of the measure; but although the committee determined to report favorably, they also proposed to extend the law to all the States, which Mr. A. thought was treating the proposition not as it deserved, as many of the States wanted no such provision, and in that shape the final action of Congress on the subject might be prolonged. Two good companies of light artillery, well equipped, might, in some situations, do more towards defending the frontier than two thousand men otherwise armed.

Mr. DUNLAP then received Mr. A's proposition as a modification of his amendment; and the bill was so amended as to provide for three depots of arms and munitions of war: one in Arkansas, one in Missouri, and one at Memphis, in Tennessee.

After a few remarks from Messrs. ASHLEY and MERCER,

Mr. DUNLAP moved to amend the amendment, by inserting, after the word "Arkansas," "and for a depot for munitions of war in the town of Memphis, in the State of Tennessee," $42,256.

After some remarks from Messrs. SPEIGHT, ASHLEY, RIPLEY, CAMBRELENG, McKAY, LINCOLN, and HARPER,

Mr. McKAY suggested a modification, as follows: "For the purchase of sites and the establishment of depots and arsenals in the States of Arkansas, at Memphis, Tennessee, and Missouri;" which was agreed to.

Mr. McKAY moved a proviso, that the expense of these works should not exceed $25,000 each.

Mr. MERCER suggested $14,000, for he said he knew the fact that the arsenals in Virginia had not cost more than that.

Mr. McKAY so modified his amendment, and it was agreed to; and the amendment as amended was concurred in.

The following amendment was concurred in without a division:

"For the purchase of twenty-eight fire engines and the necessary apparatus, twenty-two thousand four hundred dollars."

The following amendments of the Committee of the Whole were severally concurred in without a division:

"For store-houses at Newport, Kentucky, one thousand five hundred dollars."

"For purchasing seven acres of land, including the site of the powder magazine attached to the arsenal at St. Louis, Missouri, provided the same shall be ascertained not to be on land of the United States, two thousand one hundred dollars."

JUNE 18, 1836.]

Reduction of Duties—Pension System.

[H. OF R.]

"For erecting a piazza in front of the building occupied as barracks by the troops at Augusta arsenal, Georgia, four hundred and fifty dollars."

"For barracks, quarters, store-houses, hospital, stables, and materials for the same, at Fort Jesup, Louisiana, twenty-five thousand dollars."

"For rebuilding the wharf, and materials for the same, at Fort Wolcott, Newport, Rhode Island, five hundred dollars."

"For constructing a wood yard, and a wood yard wharf, and for materials for the same, at Fort Monroe, Virginia, one thousand dollars."

"For constructing a wharf, and for materials for the same, at Fort Severn, Maryland, one thousand dollars."

"For rebuilding and repairing barracks, quarters, hospital, store-houses, and materials for the same, at Fort Brady, Michigan Territory, five thousand dollars."

"For the purchase of land adjoining Fort Sullivan, and the buildings thereon, three thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars."

"For the following objects, in addition to former appropriations for the same:

"For national armory at Harper's Ferry, seventy-seven thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven dollars."

"For national armory at Springfield, forty-five thousand dollars."

"For the purchase or manufacture of light brass and iron field artillery, and for construction of field artillery carriages, caissons, and travelling forges, one hundred and thirty-seven thousand one hundred and ninety dollars."

"For the construction of furnaces for heating cannon balls, twelve thousand dollars."

The following additional section to the bill was also concurred in:

"SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized, under the restrictions of the act of the 1st of May, eighteen hundred and twenty, to make transfers from one head of appropriations for fortifications, to that of another for a like object, whenever, in his opinion, the public interest shall require it."

Mr. HAWES then moved to reduce the appropriation "for the preservation of Castle Island, and repairs of Fort Independence, Boston harbor," from $150,000 to $100,000.

After some remarks from Mr. LAWRENCE, in favor of the original appropriation, and in opposition to the amendment,

Mr. HAWES briefly supported his motion; when Mr. McKIM moved the previous question; but the House refused to second the motion: Yeas 66, nays 72.

Mr. McKAY said a few words against the amendment, and Mr. HAWES in support of it.

Mr. HAWES then gave notice that he should make similar motions in relation to other clauses of the bill.

The amendment was further discussed by Messrs. BEAL, REED, and LAWRENCE, when the yeas and nays were ordered, on the motion of the last gentleman.

Mr. SPEIGHT then moved the previous question; but the House again refused to second the motion, only 52 voting in the affirmative.

Mr. HAWES's amendment was then agreed to: Yeas 89, nays 81.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said that, from what he had seen, and from what had already been avowed, he was convinced that the motion just carried was but the beginning of a system of razeing, which, commencing at Boston, was to go "down all along shore;" and if we should remain here long enough to dispose of all the new propositions that were to be made, we would be detained till morning. Sufficient time had certainly been spent upon the bill. It had been fought and debated paragraph by paragraph, and for his part he was unwilling to fight over again the protracted battles which it had already provoked, and therefore moved the previous question.

The motion for the previous question was seconded by the House: Yeas 77, nays 66.

Mr. HALEY asked for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question to be put; which were ordered.

Mr. HANNEGAN moved that the House adjourn. Lost.

The question was then taken, but before the result was announced,

Mr. BRIGGS moved a reconsideration of the vote by which the appropriation for Castle Island and Fort Independence, Boston harbor, was reduced to $100,000.

The CHAIR decided the motion to be out of order, and thereupon announced the vote to be: Yeas 91, nays 71.

Mr. HALEY then moved an adjournment. Lost.

Mr. GRIFFIN called for the yeas and nays on ordering the bill to be engrossed; which were not ordered.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. SPEIGHT,

The House adjourned.

SATURDAY, JUNE 18.

REDUCTION OF DUTIES.

Mr. McKAY moved that the rules be suspended for the purpose of enabling him to offer the following resolutions; which were read:

Resolved, That the revenue receivable under the present law is, and will be, more than is required for the fair and legitimate wants of the Government, and that provision ought to be made for its reduction.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury report to this House, at the commencement of the next session, what alteration can be made in the existing tariff of duties, consistently with the principles of the several acts imposing duties upon imports, with a view to reduction.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury also report upon the best mode of diminishing the revenue arising from the public lands, without retarding the settlement of the new States, or impairing the interests of the General Government; and, generally, his views as to the best mode of reducing the revenue to the fair and constitutional wants of the Government.

Mr. MANN, of New York, asked for the yeas and nays on the motion, and they were ordered.

Mr. HOWELL moved to lay the motion on the table, and thereupon

Mr. PARKS called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. HOWELL then withdrew his motion; and the question being taken, the House refused to suspend the rules: Yeas 121, nays 76—not two thirds.

PENSION SYSTEM.

The bill to extend the pension system, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-day, was then taken up.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, moved the following resolution:

Resolved, That the bill be recommitted to the Committee of the Whole House, with instructions to strike out the provisions which grant a pension to those persons who were engaged in the Indian hostilities of the West, subsequently to the revolutionary war, terminating in 1783.

Mr. FRENCH moved the previous question; which was seconded by the House: Yeas 78, nays 50.

Mr. VINTON called for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question; which were ordered.

Mr. JARVIS moved a call of the House. Lost.

H. OF R.]

The Deposit Bill.

[JUNE 20, 1836.]

The House determined that the main question should be put, by a vote of 89 to 86.

Mr. CAMBRELENG asked for the yeas and nays on the main question, (the passage of the bill;) which were ordered.

Mr. PARKS moved to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. REYNOLDS, of Illinois, asked for the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 68, nays 111. So the motion to lay on the table was decided in the negative.

Mr. JARVIS moved a call of the House. Mr. J. said, on the passage of a bill of this character, he desired to see a full House. The motion was lost, only 49 voting in the affirmative.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and decided in the affirmative: Yeas 169, nays 75. So the bill was passed.

Mr. JARVIS moved a reconsideration of the vote. He said the bill had been forced through the House in a most extraordinary manner, and then went on to show the heavy drains it would cause upon the public Treasury, and examined its provisions at some length. He concluded by moving that the question of reconsideration be postponed until Monday next, so that every gentleman might come prepared to vote upon it understandingly.

Mr. HARDIN, after a few remarks in support of the provisions of the bill, moved the previous question on the motion to reconsider; which was seconded: Yeas 69, nays 62.

Mr. RENCHER called for the yeas and nays on ordering the main question to be put; which were ordered, and were: Yeas 92, nays 70. So the House determined that the main question should be put.

The main question on reconsideration was then put, and disagreed to without a count. So the bill was finally passed.

The House adjourned.

MONDAY, JUNE 20.

THE DEPOSITE BILL.

Mr. LANE moved a suspension of the rules for the purpose of taking up the bill from the Senate "to regulate the deposite of the public money," and thereupon asked for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. HALL, of Maine, moved a call of the House; which was ordered, and proceeded in for some time, when the further proceedings therein were suspended.

Mr. ANTHONY moved to amend the motion by instructing the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to separate the two propositions embraced in the bill, and to report the same in two bills.

Mr. VINTON asked if it was in order to move to amend a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. BELL remarked, that if it was in order to move the instructions, then the whole merits of the bill would be open for discussion. The proposition, he said, was to divide the bill, and upon the question of instructing the committee every part of the subject could be discussed.

Mr. ANTHONY said he did not suppose it was in order to discuss the bill, or he should have stated his reasons for moving the amendment.

Mr. BELL said the object of a majority was to get the bill up before the House for discussion before it could be reached in order, and there was a direct way to do it. If two thirds could not be found to agree to take it up, they could postpone, or lay on the table, temporarily, every other subject, until it should be reached.

After several requests were made to have the amendment withdrawn, by Messrs. PHILLIPS, LEWIS, CAMBRELENG, and DENNY,

The SPEAKER decided the original motion and amendment to be out of order, on the ground that a bill must be taken up and read a first and second time before it could be in order to dispose of it.

By general consent, the bill was then taken up, and read twice; and the question being on its commitment,

Mr. DICKERSON then moved to add to the motion to commit the bill to a Committee of the Whole, instructions to separate the same into two bills, so that the first should regulate the depositories of the public moneys, and the second should provide for the distribution of the surplus among the States.

Mr. D. said he was in favor of the whole bill, but with his view he could not consent that both propositions embraced in it should be acted upon jointly. The first part of the bill was for the disposition of the public money in the banks, from the time it was collected till it was otherwise disposed of. The next was for the disposition of the surplus, on certain conditions, among the States. These, he thought, were two different and distinct propositions, which had excited much of the public attention. He was satisfied that many members were in favor of both propositions. He was one of them. Some were in favor of neither. Some others were in favor of one and opposed to the other of the propositions. Every man who was in favor of both ought, he thought, to endeavor to carry one at least; but the course taken, by uniting them, he said, jeopardized both. Some believed one of them unconstitutional, and such would be compelled to vote against both; whereas the first alone they would vote for. Therefore, if they were kept together, it would, in fact, jeopard the whole bill. He thought the public interest required that they should be divided, so that the first part at least might be passed.

It might be said that he ought not to look beyond the action of the House itself; but he thought they ought to look at another part of the law-making power; and he was going on to intimate that the President might approve of that portion of the bill regulating the depositories, but would veto the whole if the distribution among the States was connected with it, when he was reminded that the allusion was not in order. He concluded with again saying that he was in favor of both parts of the bill, and he was not willing that either should be jeopardized.

Mr. DENNY thought the proposition to divide the bill would be fatal to the whole of it. The gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. DICKERSON,] he said, had gone, apparently, on the ground that there were two bills, instead of one; but he could see only one entire proposition for the disposition of the public money, and he did not see how it could be divided. There would not be time during the present session to mature two bills, and obtain the action of the Senate upon them separately. He thought that all those who wished to pass the bill would keep the two propositions together.

Mr. McKENNAN said he was utterly opposed to separating the two propositions; and he would appeal to the friends of the bill not to take up time in debating this preliminary motion. All the House had to do at this period of the session was to vote.

Mr. SPEIGHT rose to appeal to the House. He said there were, clearly, two distinct propositions in the bill. He was in favor of that for regulating the depositories in the banks, and was opposed to the other. He said it was the same bill, with one or two slight exceptions, which passed the House two years ago, and was lost in the Senate, which was now sent back, with an entirely new principle, which he thought would go to prostrate the whole currency of the country. A principal objection to it was, that it asked no security of the States for the payment of the money, when it should be called for, and he considered it, in that respect, as very defective. He would appeal to the House, and ask them not to compel him to vote for a principle which he considered obnoxious, or to go against the whole bill, a part of which he approved as highly necessary. He would ask the House to divide the bill, and he would pledge himself to take no steps to defeat the measure for distribution, though he could not vote for it.

The Deposit Bill.

Mr. MERCER said he was really astonished that gentlemen could consider the two propositions distinct. He would not vote for the first proposition unless it was united with the other, which had been considered so obnoxious. It was a proposition to reduce the amount of the deposits in the banks from $38,000,000 to $5,000,000. It was an important part of the subject of regulating the public deposits, and indissolubly connected with it. He said it went to make the States responsible for the repayment of the money, and ought not to be called a distribution; and he could not understand how it should be said there was no security for the money, when they were required to render certificates, and it depended on the action of the General Government alone to make them responsible for the repayment. He asked who had ever heard of amending a Senate bill by dividing it into two bills? The object might properly be attained by striking out a part of this bill, and introducing into the House another bill; but he had never heard of its being done in the way then proposed.

Mr. LANE said he had submitted the resolution to have the bill taken up, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in order that it might be speedily and finally acted upon.

The first part of the resolution has been adopted, and the question now is upon the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. DICKERSON,] to have it referred, with instructions that the committee separate the bill, and report to the House that part which regulates the deposits in the State banks, and that portion which provides for the surplus revenue remaining on hand on the 1st of January next, to be deposited, all except five millions, in the respective State treasuries, at a certain per centum.

Mr. L. said he was in favor of both branches of the bill, and more especially the latter part of it. It has been argued, as a reason why the instruction moved ought to be adopted, that they are subjects disconnected with each other, and therefore ought to be disunited. So far from this being the case, each branch of the bill provides for the safe keeping of the public money; one provides for keeping a portion in the State banks; the other in the respective State treasuries. They are similar in principle, and, in fact, both regulate and provide for the safe and efficient keeping of the public money. Why, then, ought they to be separated? Will not the public money be as safe in the State treasury, with the faith of the State pledged for its safe keeping and repayment, as in the State banks, irresponsible in their character, and often doubtful in point of credit?

Can it be said that it has been lawful and constitutional for the last two years to keep the public money in the State banks, in the absence of all law other than the necessity of the case, resting entirely upon the judgment and discretion of the Secretary, and that it will now be improper and unconstitutional to deposit a portion of it in the State treasuries, in and by authority of law?

The object of the bill is to secure the public revenue, the money of the people. It contemplates a higher security than the deposit banks, for a large portion of it. The respective States, the whole people, will be bound for its repayment. And it matters not whether we order it deposited in the local incorporated banks, private bankers, in the hands of agents, or in the State treasuries—it is but a deposit, and the only object ought to be its safe keeping, the convenience of the Treasury, of disbursement, and the interest and prosperity of the country.

While it was a source of extreme regret to find himself bound to differ in opinion with many of those with whom it had and always would give him pleasure to act, he had the consolation to know and believe he was acting in accordance with the opinions, wishes, and interest, of those whom he had the honor to represent. No political considerations should ever induce him to violate the one, or disregard the other.

Mr. L. said it could not have escaped the attention of honorable gentlemen, that he had introduced a resolution, in the early part of the session, in substance the same as the bill now under consideration.

To conclude, (Mr. L. said,) he trusted the bill would be adopted as a whole, after some trifling amendments; which, if no one else would offer, he should himself propose to the committee.

Mr. DICKERSON accepted the amendment as a modification of his motion.

Mr. PARKER said the bill was admitted by all to be one of importance. It had been sent from the Senate, and the only question was, how the House should dispose of it. He thought it ought to go into Committee of the Whole untrammelled, for a full and free discussion. It did not, as had been said, consist of two distinct propositions, but was intended to regulate the money in the deposit banks, and to prevent too much accumulation in their hands, and to put it in a safer place. At any rate, the House ought not, he thought, to divide the bill before its merits had been discussed and understood. No man at that time could tell what its provisions were. As to the supposition that the money would not be safe in the keeping of the States, he had only a single answer: if he could trust institutions created by the States, he could trust the States themselves. If the money would be safe in banks created by the States, and existing by their will, it would certainly be safe in the State treasuries.

Mr. CALHOUN, of Massachusetts, thought it an incorrect course to instruct the Committee of the Whole, and it would go to defeat the very purpose of committing bills to such a committee, that of full and free examination. He called for a division of the question.

Mr. SMITH said he concurred in the proposition of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CALHOUN,] to divide the original proposition of reference to the Committee of the Whole. And while he was desirous that, under such a division, the first part of the proposition to refer might be adopted, he was alike desirous of seeing the latter part rejected, leaving the bill of the Senate to go before the Committee of the Whole untrammelled by instructions of any kind. I am, sir, (said Mr. S.,) in favor of the bill as a whole. I am in favor of both parts of the bill, not as separate and disjointed measures, but as one and an entire measure. Taken in parts, I am opposed to the bill as its provisions now are. As distinct parts, I believe it to be defective. As a whole, I think it to be substantially good, though susceptible of amendment, perhaps, in some minor particulars. And as a whole—as a great national measure, and not as a party measure—I hope it will be adopted by this House. I hope it will receive the support and countenance of every gentleman who is willing to look above party considerations in reference to the vast public funds that are accumulating upon our hands, and be adopted as a measure that is highly essential to the continued prosperity and welfare of this great nation.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to the reasons that have been assigned—assigned in all

H. OF R.]

The Deposit Bill.

sincerity of purpose and honesty of heart, I doubt not—by gentlemen who are in favor of dividing the bill of the Senate, and in support of their proposition. To my mind they are wholly inconclusive, and I hope they will not prevail in the House.

Sir, it is said that the bill of the Senate should be divided, because it embraces two distinct and different measures; that is to say, the provision for depositing a certain portion of the public money with the local banking corporations is denominated one measure, and the provision for depositing another portion of the public funds with the State Governments, or in the State treasuries, is denominated another measure. But (said Mr. S.) I conceive each provision to resolve itself into one and the same general measure and purpose—into a single act of disposing, on deposit, of the surplus money of the Federal Government. The system of deposit proposed by the bill may be said to run into two branches, but not into two distinct and independent measures. The bill, sir, in each part, has been framed with reference to the other part. If separated, neither part will be satisfactory to a majority of this House, without very essential and important alterations; whereas, take the bill as a whole, and all its parts are, in the main and in substance, satisfactory to the House, if I can judge of the disposition of the House upon the subject.

It is said, sir, that the bill imbodyes two distinct and different measures, because the conditions and securities upon which the public moneys are to be deposited with banking corporations are different from the conditions and securities exacted of the State Governments. This difference, to my mind, does not go to any principle; it involves a mere question of expediency, a mere question as to the sufficiency or insufficiency of the securities which you exact in each case for your deposites. Sir, it is true that you do, by this bill, propose to exact different securities from local money-trading corporations for your deposites, from those you exact of the State Legislatures for the deposites intrusted to them. Is other security required of the States than their acceptance of the deposites on the terms you prescribe? Are you desirous of placing them on the same footing, and to regard them as the same grade of depositories with local private corporations? Are you not willing to trust the sovereign States upon terms different from those which you would impose upon private banks? Sir, I have confidence in the fidelity and integrity of the people and of their State Governments. I hold them in infinitely higher esteem than I do any private local corporation, be that corporation made up of whatever men or class of men it may. I will not go ahead of events to call in question the honesty of the people, and of the State Governments, which are under the people's immediate influence, to give preference and precedence to your local trading bank corporations. I have, on the contrary, full and entire faith in the State Governments. I believe they are incapable of entering into any relationship with the Federal Government, and proving treacherous to that relationship. I believe no assurance which any State Government of this Union shall give to the Federal Government, and no expectation which the people of this country shall raise through their respective State Governments in relation to the public deposites, will be violated under any circumstances. No, sir; I would deal with them in good faith, and in good faith will they fulfil their every obligation.

But, sir, it is different when you come to the private banks; of them I would exact, as this bill proposes to do, further and additional securities. Every thing between them and the Government must be matter of contract, and nothing should be left to mere good will on their part. Bind them to the performance of your requirements, as you would bind any individual whose only motive of serving you is notoriously his private interest, and not the public welfare. I would create no greater dependence, on the part of the Government, upon these local corporations, than is indispensably requisite for the convenience of Government; and to the full extent that the States can be preferred as public depositories of your surplus moneys, I would prefer them.

Sir, I reason on this subject from what I am sure will be the voice of the people of Maine, when the question is stated in its simple form, and brought down to its simple elements. For instance, the Federal Government has a single deposit bank in the State of Maine—a local, money-making institution, owned by private individuals. This bank has now, and will have hereafter, if no better system be adopted by us, the exclusive benefit and control of all the public moneys placed or left on deposit within the State of Maine, to be used when and how it is that institution's good pleasure to use it, and without any consultation with the people at large. Now, sir, the question put to the people of Maine by the provisions of the bill is, do you prefer making the present deposit bank in Maine the exclusive keepers and managers of some hundreds of thousands of dollars of the public moneys, or do you prefer to take a large portion of it, which the Federal Government has no immediate use for, into your own immediate keeping and control, for the common benefit of the whole State? Sir, I believe that the people of Maine would prefer to have the use and benefit of so much of these funds as the Federal Government does not need, to be managed for their common benefit, than to have it deposited with any private corporation in existence.

[Mr. CAMBRELENG here called Mr. SMITH to order. He said it was not in order for the gentleman from Maine to discuss the merits of the bill, and on this ground he called to order.]

The SPEAKER said the proposition was to commit the bill, with instructions, and the Chair could not interpose to arrest debate on the subject of the instructions.]

Mr. SMITH said he was proceeding to illustrate the effect of amending the bill of the Senate as proposed, to bring the operation of the amendment home to the interests of the people of his own State.

[Mr. CAMBRELENG again rose, and said, if the gentleman from Maine was allowed to discuss the merits of the bill, he should claim the right of reply.]

The SPEAKER said he could not discover that the gentleman from Maine was out of order.]

Mr. SMITH proceeded. He said he hoped and desired that the gentleman from New York would reply, if he wished to do so. The Chair has decided that I am not out of order in my course of remark. I was carrying my illustrations home to the interests of my own constituents. Perhaps I go too near home to the condition of things in the State of New York also. Be it as it may, I go for the bill of the Senate as a whole.

Another reason offered for dividing this bill (and it has been suggested by the honorable gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. DICKERSON,] who says he is in favor of both parts of the bill) is, that the one part may not be put in jeopardy by the other part of the bill. Now, sir, I am opposed to a division of the bill, that neither part may be put in jeopardy, by being separate from the other. The strength of each is essential to the safety of the other; and the two parts, being adapted to the purpose of securing to the people at large the safest and most useful deposit of the surplus moneys of their Government, ought to stand or fall together. They are framed with special reference to each other. What gentleman would dispose of the whole of the public moneys among local corporations upon the terms proposed by the first part of the bill? And yet what gentleman is unwilling to dispose of a portion of those funds in the manner thus provided? The first part of the bill provides that the local banks shall pay for a certain portion of the public deposits received by them only two per cent. per annum interest, in addition to the services to be performed by them for Government in transfers of the public moneys from one point of the Union to the other. The amount to be reserved by this deposit bill, in local banks, for this operation, is five millions of dollars. Sir, I accord my cordial support to this arrangement. But, sir, I would not do so if these banks were to have in deposit the whole of the public moneys, say from thirty to fifty millions of dollars. Two per cent. interest only on such an amount, though added to their aggregate of services for the Government, would not be a judicious nor just arrangement for the public Treasury. Four per cent. interest, under such a sweeping control and use of the revenues of the country by these local institutions, would be nearer right, and might well be afforded. But the bill has been made to conform, in the particular of interest to be exacted of local banks, to the comparatively small amount of deposits with which they are allowed to operate, and from which they are allowed to derive benefit, and not with reference to the aggregate of surplus.

The Deposit Bill.

Sir, I have another reason to influence my mind most decidedly against a division of this bill. The vast amount of public money which your Treasury is accumulating will, in my opinion, be far more safe and secure in charge of the State Governments than in the keeping of the local banks. I am willing to confide five millions of dollars to the keeping of local banks, judiciously selected over the country, and under the provisions of this bill; that amount having been adjudged sufficiently large to answer all current demands upon the Treasury, aided by the current revenue of the nation after the 1st of January next. But, sir, I am not willing to confide an aggregate of forty or fifty millions of the public revenue—the whole sum of your nation's income, upon any terms of interest whatever—to the keeping and management of local and private banking companies, be they managed or owned wheresoever and by whomsoever they may. I do not believe that such an enormous amount of public money, thus distributed and deposited, would be secure. Sir, with your State Governments, with men immediately responsible to the watchful eye of the people, and interested only in promoting the general good by its use, it would be, to say the least, far more secure, and, in my opinion, perfectly secure. What more can gentlemen require? What more can the people require at our hands? This is the measure proposed by the Senate's bill now before the House.

Sir, I am influenced in coming to the conviction which I entertain against both the propriety and expediency of dividing this bill, by yet another consideration. It is this, sir: The use and distribution of the millions which are to be deposited under this bill will, in my opinion, be far more advantageously enjoyed by the people at large, by all classes of citizens, if confided to the care and control of the State Governments, than if confided to the management of private corporations. The one is interested and watchful in accomplishing the greatest good of the whole people; the others are ever actuated by their private advantage and considerations of individual gain. Sir, I do not conceive that it is practicable for local banks, however disposed, to accept this money, and use it to the extent of benefit to the public at large that it ought to be used, and to the extent that your State Governments, and the people acting through the State Governments, can and will use it. This is with me a very weighty consideration, and cannot but be so with others, who have a due regard in this matter to the business of the country.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I hope this great national measure will not be defeated by the action proposed to be had upon it. It is a measure which is called for by public sentiment—a measure which, if I were permitted to allude to the proceedings of the other branch of Congress, I might say, has been sent to us by an unprecedented unanimity on the part of that body. I am for it as a whole. It may be, and doubtless is, susceptible of amendment in some of its details. For all essential amendments to make it perfect, without destroying the system of keeping the public moneys proposed by it, I will cheerfully go. But all other changes of the bill I feel bound to resist.

Mr. MANN, of New York, said he did not rise to discuss the subject; and he hoped the House would not spend much more time in debating the preliminary measure. He then offered a substitute for the instructions of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. DICKERSON,] so as to direct the committee to report the first twelve sections of the bill as one bill, and the three remaining sections as another bill, with such amendments as the committee might think proper.

Mr. DICKERSON accepted this amendment as a modification of his motion.

Mr. ADAMS hoped the instructions would be withdrawn. Instructing a Committee of the Whole, he said, was incompatible with the object of going into the committee. It would confine them to the subject of the instructions; and he went on to show some deficiencies and discrepancies, which ought to be considered and amended in the first part of the bill.

Mr. PATTON said that there was no doubt about the propriety of the bill. He thought there was a great moral and political necessity for passing it; and it ought not to be trammelled to prevent that free discussion which it ought to receive. It was unusual to instruct a Committee of the Whole, and he could not perceive what extraordinary reasons there could be why the House was asked to adopt such a course. It had been said it was possible, and had been intimated to be probable, that the President would veto the bill. The House, he said, ought to act according to its sense of duty, without regard to the opinions of any other department of the Government; and he himself would not turn a hair's breadth from what he thought right, from any apprehensions or threatenings of what the Executive might do.

Mr. DICKERSON rose to explain. He said he did not know that the Executive would veto the bill. He had had no conversations with the President; nor did he mean to say that any one should be influenced by a knowledge of his opinions; but if he was opposed to a part of the bill, he thought the House ought to secure the passage of that part upon which there was no doubt.

Mr. PATTON said, if there was doubt of the constitutionality of a clause of the bill, it might be proper to strike that clause out; or, if the different parts related to totally distinct subjects, it would be a good reason for dividing the bill. He, however, thought they did not, and he could not see how the two propositions could be separated with any propriety. He thought that portion of the bill regulating the deposits as of the least value; it proposed very little alteration in the manner of keeping the public money from that now practically adopted by the Department; and he thought it ought to go to the committee without instructions, so that gentlemen could discuss and amend it.

Mr. VINTON thought the instructions, in either shape, ought not to prevail; and he went on to point out the embarrassment that would arise from introducing a bill in a manner so contrary to the rules into the House, and also of the inconvenience and delay in sending such a bill to the Senate.

The question having been divided, was taken first on the commitment of the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; which was agreed to.

The question being on adopting the instructions, it was divided, and first taken on the instructions to the committee to separate the provisions of the bill so as to report the first twelve sections thereof as one bill, and the remaining three sections as another bill. This question was decided in the negative, by yeas and nays, as follows:

The question being next on that portion of the motion making the bill the special order of the day for tomorrow at 12 o'clock, and every succeeding day thereafter till disposed of,

Mr. HESTER moved to amend the motion so as to make the bill the special order for the residue of this day; which amendment

Mr. DICKERSON accepted as a modification of his motion.

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved to amend the motion by striking out this day, so as to leave the motion in its original form.

Mr. HALL, of Maine, called for the yeas and nays on this motion, and they were ordered.

The motion of Mr. VANDERPOEL was agreed to: Yeas 113, nays 106.

Mr. DUNLAP moved to embrace in the motion the bill from the Committee of Ways and Means of this House, for the regulation of thede posites in certain local banks. Lost.

The motion of Mr. DICKERSON, as amended, was then agreed to.

BANK LOANS TO MEMBERS OF CONGRESS.

Mr. HUNT, by general consent, offered the following resolution; which was read:

Resolved, That a select committee be appointed, with power to send for persons and papers, to inquire whether any member or members of Congress have received any accommodation or facilities from any person or persons, bank or banks, in the employment of the Government, or not, in obtaining the use of the public money for the purpose of speculating in the purchase of the public lands.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, moved to amend the resolution by embracing the heads of Departments, or any officer of the Government; which Mr. HUNT accepted as a modification.

Mr. BOON said he hoped the resolution would be further modified, so as to inquire whether any member of Congress, &c., had borrowed money from the banks without paying interest for it.

Mr. LEWIS said he would have no objection to the resolution if there was any ground for a belief that any improper partiality had been exhibited by the deposit banks in their transactions with members of Congress; but he was averse to a general exploring expedition. He wanted information on the subject.

Mr. McKAY took a similar view. The adoption of the resolution amounted to a tacit admission that some members had received accommodations from the deposit banks for the purposes of speculation. This was a grave charge, and ought not to be countenanced without some ground to go upon. He hoped, therefore, that the gentleman would inform the House what was the object of the resolution, and the ground for it.

After some remarks from Mr. BOULDIN,

Mr. HUNT said that every member must have heard rumors, and seen intimations in the public prints, that certain members of Congress have had the use of the public funds in their private speculations. He did not pretend to be possessed of any more information on the subject than any other member. He thought some inquiry ought to be made in regard to the matter, and he had therefore submitted the resolution to the disposition of the House.

Mr. ADAMS said he could not vote for this resolution. If this committee was appointed, it must have judicial power, and it must be a sort of grand jury; and, in order to examine every member of the House, they must sit during the recess. In fairness and impartiality, they must summon every member before them. After all, what would it amount to? Suppose a member has borrowed money of a bank, with interest or without interest, of what consequence is it? There is nothing in it contrary to law. Suppose it be ascertained that some forty or sixty members have borrowed money of banks to buy lands; a voluminous document, costing some thousands of dollars, would be published to excite public odium against those individuals; and there the matter would end, unless, indeed, the gentleman from New York intended to follow up his motion by moving the expulsion of such members. He could not see that it would be sufficient cause for expulsion, for nothing was charged in violation of the laws of the land. The House must then be converted into a grand inquest on the subject, and the members accused must appear in their defence at the bar of the House, with their witnesses. Was this a position in which the members of the House wished to be placed towards each other? On the contrary, it was highly desirable that they should entertain towards each other the kindest feeling and respect.

Mr. LEWIS asked for some specification of the accusation. If there was any ground for it, he wished to know it.

Fortification Bill—Public Deposites.

[H. OF R.]

Mr. BOON said the banks were established for the public accommodation, and members of Congress had a right to borrow money from them, and to buy lands, as well as others. If any corrupt practices had prevailed, it was a different thing, and an investigation would be proper. But nothing of this kind had been alleged.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, advocated the adoption of the resolution at some length.

Mr. SPEIGHT said, for his own part, he had no objection to the adoption of the resolution; but, as the time of the House was precious, and as it wanted but a few minutes of the hour assigned for the House to take a recess, he moved the previous question; which was seconded.

The main question was ordered to be put, and the resolution was agreed to without a count.

The select committee was then ordered to consist of five members.

The hour of half past two o'clock having arrived, the House, in pursuance of a former order, took a recess.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. ADAMS obtained leave to offer a resolution directing the Clerk of the House to cause to be prepared a copy of the constitutions of the several States of the Union, embracing all the amendments thereto adopted, from the declaration of independence till the year 1789.

Mr. A., adverting to the convenience of such a book of reference for the use of Congress, said that no complete work of the kind had ever been published.

Mr. GRAVES objected to the publication of such works at the expense of the Government. Members who desired to possess such a compilation, might make it for themselves. He moved to lay the resolution on the table; and the question being taken, a quorum did not vote.

Subsequently the resolution was again taken up, a quorum having appeared.

Mr. CHAPIN moved to amend the resolution so as to include "the constitution of the United States and the articles of confederation;" which amendment was accepted by the mover.

Mr. HARDIN objected to the resolution, and said we had as well publish copies of the Federalist and other political works. He moved to lay the motion on the table; which was agreed to, 69 to 56.

FORTIFICATION BILL.

The House, in further execution of the special order of the day of the 26th of January, took up the engrossed bill making appropriations for certain fortifications of the United States for the year 1836.

The bill was read a third time and passed.

Mr. SMITH moved that the House resolve into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, upon the bill making appropriations for the Delaware breakwater, the bill making appropriations for the Military Academy of the United States, and the bill making appropriations for certain military and other roads.

After some conversation on the order of proceeding, in which it was urged that these bills were not embraced in the special order of the 26th January,

The CHAIR submitted the question to the House whether the special order had been executed or not; and the question was decided in the affirmative.

The House passed to the order of the day.

The bill amendatory of the act for the continuation of the Cumberland road, (to change the location of a part of it,) was read a third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill, Mr. CRANE spoke, at some length, on the subject, and was followed by Messrs. KINNARD, PEARCE of Rhode Island, BOON, MASON of Ohio, VINTON, and WEBSTER. The whole debate related to the proposed change of route in the bill.

Mr. MANN, of New York, rose amidst loud calls for the question. He said he did not intend to make a speech; but, as he was in favor of a straight route on this occasion, he moved the previous question.

At the suggestion of Mr. STORER that the House would agree to take the question, Mr. MANN withdrew the motion; and the question being taken on the passage of the bill, it was decided as follows: Yeas 79, nays 88.

So the bill was rejected.

The House then adjourned.

TUESDAY, JUNE 21.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

The House, at 12 o'clock, in pursuance of the special order adopted yesterday, resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. SUMNERLAND in the chair,) and proceeded to consider the bill from the Senate for "the regulation of the deposits of the public money."

Mr. HARRISON moved to amend the first section, so as to require the assent of the States to the establishment of agencies.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved to strike out all that part of the first section which relates to the establishment of agencies in the States.

After some remarks from Messrs. HARRISON and ASHLEY, the motion was lost.

Mr. McKAY moved to strike out the words "as banks of deposit." Lost.

Mr. VANDERPOEL moved to amend the fifth section, so as to provide that no bank should be selected as a deposite bank which shall issue any note of less denomination than ten dollars. Lost.

Several other amendments, of lesser magnitude, were moved and lost.

Mr. ADAMS moved to strike out, in the 8th section, the following words: "or the public money withdrawn therefrom." Lost.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Kentucky, moved an amendment, to the effect that the banks shall pay four per cent. interest on the whole amount of the deposits; which was lost.

Mr. DROMGOOLE moved to strike out the 11th section. Lost.

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved to amend the 13th section of the bill, so as to provide that the distribution shall be made in proportion to the representation of the people on this floor; and upon this motion he wished, he said, to be heard. But, at the suggestion of some gentlemen, he, for the present, withdrew it.

Mr. ANTHONY offered the following, as a substitute for the 13th section:

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the money which shall be in the Treasury of the United States on the 1st day of January, 1837, reserving the sum of five millions of dollars, shall be deposited with such of the several States, in proportion to their respective representation in the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, as shall by law authorize their treasurer, or other competent authorities, to receive the same on the terms hereinafter specified; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall deliver the same to such treasurer, or other competent authorities, on receiving certificates of deposit therefor, signed by such competent authorities, in such form as may be prescribed by the Secretary aforesaid; which certificates shall express the usual and legal obligations of common depositories of the public money, for the safe keeping and repayment thereof, and shall pledge the faith of the States receiving the same to pay the said moneys, and every part thereof, from time to time, whenever the same shall be required by the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purpose of defraying any wants of the public Treasury beyond the amount of the five millions aforesaid:

Provided, That if any State declines to receive its proportion of the surplus aforesaid, on the terms before named, the same may, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, be deposited with the other States agreeing to accept the same on deposit.

And provided, further, That when said money, or any part thereof, shall be wanted by said Secretary to meet appropriations made by law, the same shall be called for in ratable proportions, within one year, as nearly as conveniently may be, from the different States with which the same is deposited, and shall not be called for in sums exceeding ten thousand dollars, from any one State, in any one month, without previous notice of thirty days for every additional sum of twenty thousand dollars which may be required.

Mr. ANTHONY said, the proposition which I have had the honor to offer to the consideration of the committee, as a substitute for the thirteenth section of the Senate bill now before us, is one which I sincerely hope will meet with general approbation. This section provides for the deposit of the surplus revenue of the country among the several States of the Union, and embraces a question of vital importance to the people—a question in which every member of this House has a deep and abiding interest. We should, therefore, carefully deliberate on the best means to effect the object we have in view; and it should be our earnest endeavor, as far as possible, to harmonize and unite conflicting opinions; to obviate, as far as practicable, prejudices from every quarter; and, without compromising any principle, to modify and amend the bill in such manner that it may become the law of the land.

Mr. A. then proceeded to remark, that he considered the ratio of distribution adopted by the Senate contrary to the fundamental principles of our Government, whereby taxation and representation went hand in hand; and he therefore believed that representation and distribution should be in the same ratio. He had accordingly stricken out the "Senate" from his amendment, being satisfied that the relative proportion in the House of Representatives would approximate nearer to justice than any other mode of distribution which could be adopted, unless we resorted to a new enumeration. He was, however, willing to admit, that as some of the small States had large fractions, and others had rapidly increased, and perhaps doubled their population, since the last census, they would have some reason to complain that they did not receive a fair and equal proportion, by allowing them only their representative share.

He proceeded to discuss this question at some length, but at the suggestion of many of his friends, who were fearful that an adherence to this change would defeat the amendment in toto, he afterwards restored the "Senate," so as to make it correspond in that respect with the bill as it came to the House, remarking that if any other member should thereafter renew the motion to strike out the "Senate," it would receive his cordial support.

Mr. A. then said, the bill before the committee provides that the surplus money in the Treasury, on the 1st of January, 1837, shall be deposited with the several States in the nature of a loan, for which certificates are to be given by the States, subject to transfer and sale by the Secretary of the Treasury, "whenever it shall be necessary to meet appropriations made by Congress."

The substitute differs from the original section in this: that it authorizes a deposit of the money with the respective States, "to be safely kept by them; and the faith of the States is pledged to repay the same, when required by the Secretary of the Treasury, to defray the wants of the public Treasury." The committee will perceive that instead of a loan to the States, with authority to the United States to sell and assign the security, and thus transfer the debt to private individuals or corporate bodies, agreeably to the terms of the original section, the substitute merely deposits the money for safe keeping, to be used by the States receiving it, till required for the necessities of the General Government for national purposes. It avoids the necessity of resorting to a sale of State certificates to stockjobbers and speculators, as it fairly distributes the surplus throughout every member of our confederacy, taking their several pledges for the repayment, when called for, in moderate instalments.

Another difference in the two propositions is, that by the Senate bill, after a sale and assignment of those certificates, "they shall be subject to and shall bear an interest of five per cent. per annum;" but in the amendment they are to bear no interest whatever. This part of the amendment, I trust, will be acceptable to the committee, as it makes the States liable to the national Government alone for the payment of the principal sum deposited, and not subject, in any event, to pay interest.

The next point of difference is, that by the original section the "certificates are redeemable at the pleasure of the States issuing the same," whereas in the substitute the States are pledged to pay after notice is given by the Treasury Department that the money is required to meet appropriations. Should the necessities of the Treasury demand a portion of the distributed surplus to be restored to its vaults, if the States could redeem at pleasure, the only mode of replenishing the Treasury from this source would be by a sale of those certificates of deposit; hence arose the necessity, if that plan were adopted, to make them assignable, and to bear an interest of five per cent. per annum, after assignment; but as they, by the proposed amendment, are to be without interest, and are not transferable, it necessarily follows that whenever the money is needed to meet appropriations, for which there are not other funds in the Treasury, the States are bound in honor, as well as by their "legal obligations," to restore whatever sum is necessary, in proportion to the amount held by them respectively, upon due notice given by the Secretary of the Treasury.

These modifications and alterations of the 13th section make the bill what its title purports to be, viz: "To regulate the deposits of the public money." They place the common treasure of the people in the hands of their State representatives, to be applied by them to internal improvement, to education, and many other objects of great importance. By disposing of the money in this manner, it takes from the deposit banks immense sums which either lie unproductive in their vaults, or are loaned for purposes too often of hazardous trade, and sometimes of unwarrantable speculation. The whole community will be benefited by the distribution, as it will circulate through every section of the Union, while at present it is principally confined to the commercial cities, where the revenue is mostly received, and where the deposit banks are generally located. It will prevent extravagant expenditures and lavish appropriations of the public money, as every State will be interested in preserving that economy which teaches us to husband our resources, and not to squander them on works of doubtful utility. We shall learn the trite though true maxim,

"Nullus tantus quæstus, quam quod habes parcere."

The attention of the people of Pennsylvania was attracted to the subject of the surplus revenue soon after the election of the present Chief Magistrate. In his first annual message to Congress, on the 8th December,

JUNE 21, 1836.]

Public Deposites.

[H. OF R.]

1829, the President, in speaking of the situation of the financial concerns of our country, says:

"After the extinction of the public debt, it is not probable that any adjustment of the tariff, upon principles satisfactory to the people of the Union, will, until a remote period, if ever, leave the Government without a considerable surplus in the Treasury, beyond what may be required for its current service. As, then, the period approaches when the application of the revenue to the payment of debt will cease, the disposition of the surplus will present a subject for the serious deliberation of Congress; and it may be fortunate for the country that it is yet to be decided. Considered in connexion with the difficulties which have heretofore attended appropriations for purposes of internal improvement, and with those which this experience tells us will certainly arise, whenever power over such subjects may be exercised by the General Government, it is hoped that it may lead to the adoption of some plan which will reconcile the diversified interests of the States, and strengthen the bonds which unite them. Every member of the Union, in peace and in war, will be benefited by the improvement of inland navigation, and the construction of high-ways in the several States. Let us, then, endeavor to attain this benefit in a mode which will be satisfactory to all. That hitherto adopted has, by many of our fellow-citizens, been deprecated as an infraction of the constitution, while by others it has been viewed as inexpedient. All feel that it has been employed at the expense of harmony in the legislative councils.

"To avoid these evils, it appears to me that the most safe, just, and federal disposition which could be made of the surplus revenue would be its apportionment among the several States, according to their ratio of representation; and should this measure not be found warranted by the constitution, that it would be expedient to propose to the States an amendment authorizing it."

Pennsylvania having engaged in an extensive system of internal improvement, which required large sums of money to be raised for the purpose of conducting the expensive works under contract, and completing them with as little delay as possible, resorted to loans to meet the heavy annual expenditure which this magnificent project required. As every year added to the liabilities of the State, and the national Treasury would in a short time be relieved from the public debt, much solicitude was felt in relation to the disposition of the surplus which would accrue beyond the current expenses of the country.

The citizens of the "Key Stone" having assisted to elevate the present Executive to that station which he now fills with so much honor to himself and satisfaction to the people, received with heartfelt pleasure the message announcing his opinion "that the most safe, just, and federal disposition which could be made of the surplus revenue, would be its apportionment among the several States, according to their ratio of representation;" and although he, at the same time, expressed a doubt whether such a disposition was warranted by the constitution, and suggested that it would be expedient to amend it, to remove that doubt; yet the situation of Pennsylvania, with her accumulating debt, was such, that all parties concurred in the hope that these doubts would be removed when the time for distribution arrived, and that we should receive our share of the surplus revenue, and thus be relieved from a portion of the increasing debt which the improvement system had created.

Having, at the period to which I allude, been chosen by the citizens of my native State to represent them in another place, (the Senate of Pennsylvania,) I was among those who heartily responded to the sentiments of the President; and two of my colleagues on this floor [Mr. MILLER and Mr. MORRIS] assisted me in passing the following resolution, which, according to my recollection, received almost, if not altogether, the unanimous concurrence of that body:

"Resolved, as the sense of the Senate and House of Representatives, that as soon as the national debt shall be paid, the most equitable and just mode of disposing of the surplus funds which may remain in the Treasury of the United States, after defraying the ordinary expenses of the Government, and the payment of appropriations which may be made to objects of great national importance, will be by a distribution amongst the several States, in proportion to their representation in the Congress of the United States.

"Approved, April 2d, 1831.

"GEORGE WOLF."

The constitutional power of Congress to distribute the surplus funds of the Treasury among the States had not at that time been examined with that care and scrutiny which it afterwards received. Although the President had intimated its unconstitutionality, and suggested "an appeal to the source of power as among the most sacred of all our obligations," yet it was not till his veto of the land bill of Mr. Clay that his views on this constitutional question became generally understood. Since that period a difference of opinion has existed, and still exists, throughout the community, on this all-important subject; and I feel that it is wholly unnecessary to attempt its discussion on the present occasion. Let our object rather be to avoid difficulties and embarrassments of this nature, and pursue such a course as will be sanctioned by every branch of our legislative department. Let us steer clear of constitutional objections from any quarter, and adopt such provisions as will promote the welfare of the States, without affecting the wholesome action of the General Government.

The resolution of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, which I have read, reiterates and sanctions the liberal, patriotic, and enlightened views of the Executive of the Union, without expressing any opinion of the constitutionality of the measure. It cannot, therefore, be expected that I have so far forgotten the part I took in the passage of that resolution, as to be now opposed to a constitutional disposition of the surplus money of the Treasury. Every one must admit that it ought to be taken from the deposit banks and placed in the power of the people, to whom it properly belongs, and who can safely apply it to such State objects as will increase their wealth and advance their prosperity, and thus add to the strength and stability of the whole confederacy.

The next expression of public sentiment in Pennsylvania, in reference to the surplus revenue, will be found in the proceedings of our Legislature, when Clay's land bill was under discussion in this House during the session of 1832-'33. It was a subject which elicited the attention and addressed itself to the judgment of every legislator; one in which it became the duty of the representative to ascertain and proclaim the opinion and wishes of his constituents. On this absorbing question there was no mistaking the popular will; the same pervading sentiment existed throughout the Commonwealth that prevailed in 1831; and again we find the Legislature of Pennsylvania speaking emphatically, and with great unanimity, the same language that they had formerly used.

The proceeds of the public lands would, in a short time, be no longer necessary to defray our national burdens; and the question of distribution among the States addressed itself to their consideration; they accordingly embodied their sentiments in the following preamble and resolution:

"Whereas the period is fast approaching when, by means of the revenue arising from bank stock, the duties on imports, and the public lands, the national debt will be extinguished, and there will be a surplus in the national Treasury, after defraying the ordinary expenses of Government: And whereas the United States acquired their title to, and jurisdiction over, the public lands by the cessions of several of the States, made for the common benefit of the Union, and by purchase out of the funds of the General Government, and the said lands thus acquired form a part of the national stock, and furnish an important branch of the public revenues applicable to the relief of the public burdens: And whereas, on the extinguishment of the public debt of the United States, the revenues drawn from the sale of the public lands will be no longer required for the purposes of the General Government, and it is right and proper that they should be distributed among the several States: And whereas the distribution of the surplus proceeds arising from the sale of the public lands involves a question of national property and national policy, on which it is proper for the constituted authorities of the State to express an opinion: Therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, That, in the opinion of this Legislature, the proceeds of the public lands of the United States, when no longer required for the payment of the public debt, ought to be distributed among the several States of the Union, in just and equitable proportions; and any proper measure calculated to effect this object will meet our cordial approbation."

"Approved, 26th February, 1833."

This preamble and resolution were laid before Congress on the 1st of March, 1833, and on the next day the final question was taken on the land bill; and although the Pennsylvania delegation in Congress were not bound by this expression of the State Legislature, as they were equally the immediate representatives of the people, yet it is remarkable with what unusual unanimity the whole delegation (save one from the city of Philadelphia) gave their votes in favor of the bill providing for the distribution of the proceeds of the public lands.

At the next session the President gave his reasons at length in opposition to the bill, which he had been prevented from doing before, owing to the lateness of the session at which it passed. Whether he was right or wrong, it is not my purpose now to inquire, as the present plan of disposing of the surplus renders the inquiry wholly unnecessary at this time. Nor do I wish to be understood to say that I approve of raising money from the sales of public lands, or from a tariff on imports, for the purpose of distributing it among the States; on the contrary, I believe that the States ought not to look to the National Government for pecuniary aid; they should depend on their own resources to carry on their improvements and supply their several wants. But a number of causes have combined to swell the funds of the public Treasury to an extravagant amount, and the question naturally arises, what shall be done with the surplus beyond the immediate necessities of the country? If it remains dormant in the banks, its accumulation will embarrass trade and seriously affect the mercantile community. If loaned to individuals in the vicinity of the deposit banks, the benefits to result will at least be partial. If squandered on public national works, it would in all probability lead to a wasteful extravagance. The safest and most judicious course would seem to be, to deposit the excess with the States, and to provide that in future the revenues of the country shall not be suffered to accumulate beyond the wants of the Government.

I have referred to the proceedings of our State Legislature, and to the votes of my predecessors here, to show the cordial understanding that existed in favor of distribution, while the destinies of Pennsylvania were in the hands of those who were the warm and devoted friends of the present national Executive; but before I conclude, in order to show that all parties concur in these sentiments, let me call the attention of the committee to what has been done since the sceptre has departed from the democracy of our State, and been placed in hands in which, although I possess little confidence, and therefore pay but slight attention to their request, yet, as emanating from a majority of the State Legislature, it merits a proper and respectful consideration.

On the 15th of March, 1836, the following preamble and resolution passed the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and were transmitted by the Governor to the delegation in Congress:

"Whereas, by the official statements from the Treasury Department of the United States, it appears there will be an unappropriated balance in the Treasury, above the ordinary demands of the Government, subject to the action of Congress during the present session: And whereas it is presumed that the wisdom of Congress will not suffer the fund to accumulate in the Treasury, without devising means by which it can be usefully employed for the benefit of the people of this Union: And whereas some of our sister States deny to Congress the constitutional power of making internal improvements in the several States, while all seem to admit the power and propriety of distributing the proceeds arising, or which may have arisen, from the sale of the public lands, amongst the several States, subject to the control of their respective Legislatures: And whereas the proportion to which Pennsylvania would be entitled, should such distribution be made, would enable her to complete her public works, and establish a fund for the support of common schools, which would preclude the necessity of taxation for either purpose: And whereas it is the policy of our Government to guard against the increase of executive patronage, and especially against the accumulation of large sums of money in the Treasury unappropriated: And whereas a very large proportion of surplus revenue arises from the sales of the public lands, the joint property of all the States, which is regarded as a source of revenue which ought to be applied in the promotion of education, by establishing a system of common schools, to the purposes of internal improvement, or such purposes as will best promote the interests of the States, respectively: Therefore,

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in General Assembly met, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives be recommended, to use their influence to procure the passage of a law to distribute the proceeds arising, or which may have arisen, from the sale of the public lands, amongst the several States, in proportion to the number of members from each State in the House of Representatives of the United States."

Not content, however, with these instructions and recommendations in relation to the public lands, the same Legislature, only a few days since, at an extra session, again directed our attention to the distribution of the surplus revenue.

On the 16th June, 1836, resolutions were passed, from which I select those which have a particular reference to the subject before the committee. They are as follows:

"Resolved, That this General Assembly consider the proposition lately made in the Congress of the United States to invest the surplus revenue of the nation in stocks issued by the States, as a measure fraught with danger, calculated to give the Federal Government a power which, if wielded by corrupt hands, would be inimical to the liberties of the country in an eminent degree, and under all circumstances injurious. It may be properly characterized as one of those measures, 'in fiscal systems and arrangements which keeps a host of [commercial and] wealthy individuals imbedded and obedient to the mandates of the Treasury; and it would give to the Federal Government a decided influence in the councils of such States as it might be thought expedient to win to its purposes. It would foster and encourage a system of gambling and speculation in stocks, giving to the agents of the Government the opportunity of employing the public money to promote private interests, to reward corrupt favorites, and to acquire an interest among the community, leading to servile devotion to those clothed with the power of the General Government.

Public Deposites.

[H. OF R.]

Resolved, That our Senators in Congress be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to vote against any bill for investing the surplus revenue of the United States in stocks issued or authorized by the respective States, believing that the most safe, just, and federal disposition which could be made of the surplus revenue would be its apportionment among the several States."

Thus, Mr. Chairman, for a period of six years, whenever the subject has been agitated in Pennsylvania, we perceive a spowee! may I not say an overwhelming, expression of public sentiment in favor of distribution, whether of the proceeds of the public lands or other sources of revenue. This public sentiment, sanctioned and reiterated by so many Legislatures, it is my pride and pleasure to carry into effect, as far as my humble efforts will admit; and I do earnestly hope that the friends of the measure will unite with me and go for the proposed amendment. Unanimity is of the first importance in the present crisis. By adopting the proposition I have submitted, we may prevent opposition to the bill from any quarter, and this desirable object can only be attained by mutual concession and forbearance. The principles of distribution are not essentially changed, and the only important alterations are, that it makes the States depositories of the public money, instead of receivers on loan; that the certificates are not assignable, and bear no interest, instead of being subject to sale and transfer, and to the payment of interest after assignment; and that the money is to be restored to the national Treasury when required by the Government, instead of being redeemable at the pleasure of the respective States.

In a measure so deeply interesting to the country, we should not differ on minor points, if the principal object can be obtained. The situation of the nation is peculiarly embarrassing, because we have an overflowing Treasury, and the difficulty arises how to dispose of the money. Let us deposite it with the States in such manner that each may enjoy a share of its benefits—that each may be enabled to advance in prosperity and improvement with the other members of the confederacy:

"Grow with their growth, and strengthen with their strength."

These are the reasons by which I have been actuated in offering my amendment.

If a majority of the committee shall determine to reject the substitute, as a friend to the bill, I will still cling to its support, though I am fearful it will not become a law; but if the amendment be adopted, I feel confident that it will promote union and harmony in every quarter, and that the best, the fondest hopes of the friends of distribution will be realized. With these remarks, I submit my proposition to the consideration of the committee, and will cheerfully abide by the result.

Mr. SPEIGHT said he had heard it remarked that the amendment was proposed with a view of defeating the bill. Such was not the fact. It was offered in good faith, and went to obviate the objections of many members to the provisions of the bill, so as to secure their support. He would also appeal to the members of the large States not to press the amendment in relation to the representation in the Senate. It could make but a trifling variation of a few thousand dollars, and would give the large States nothing to brag of. He thought it would be the most important act of legislation of the session to pass the amendment, and he knew it would secure the votes of many persons now opposed to the bill.

Mr. HARDIN said, as the bill now stands, all States having ten members and under will be gainers by the bill. The States having ten members will, by the bill, receive one dollar and a half per head; if the amendment is made, all States having eleven members will have two dollars and a quarter per head. There were, he said, eighteen States having under ten members, and ten having over eleven members; and he thought the alteration would operate hardly upon some of the small States. After some observations upon the operation of the bill upon particular States, he thought it would, on the whole, operate as equally as any thing that could be devised. He had no great objection to the amendment, but he thought it better to take the original bill.

Mr. PEARCE, of Rhode Island, was in favor of the amendment, because he thought it would tend to prevent stockjobbing, which would take place in case the stock should be offered for sale by the Secretary of the Treasury. He referred to the amendment as respected the exclusion of the senatorial representation. He said the small States did not, in the House, stand upon an equal advantage, but in the Senate they had the greater power, numbering fifteen to nine in the representation; and if this provision had been made, as was right, with a view to the advantage of the small States, then it was not to be supposed they would give it up without discussion, and perhaps the bill would be lost, which he considered a much greater evil than the inequality of distribution. He then went into an examination of the effect of the bill and amendment upon several States, and thought it more proper to make the distribution upon federal numbers, according to the census of 1830. He thought, also, if some apparent injustice would be done to the large States by the original bill, still more would be done to the small States by adopting a different course.

Mr. P. gave way to permit Mr. ANTHONY to restore the words "Senate and," so as to remove the objection which had been raised; upon which Mr. P. took his seat.

Mr. MILLER, after some observations in favor of the bill, spoke of the different effect of the amendment, which would call upon the States to pledge their faith to pay the money upon the warrant of the Treasurer. He then adverted to the causes which had produced the surplus, and alluded to such a disposition of the public lands, and such a reduction of the tariff, as should prevent a recurrence of a similar state of things. He did not think any one could object to the proposition before the House.

Mr. VINTON moved to amend the amendment, so as to provide that the money should be called for by the Treasurer, only "for want of other money in the Treasury."

Mr. V. said, without the restriction, the Secretary of the Treasury might call for this money when there was still money in the Treasury, which he thought was not proper nor intended.

Mr. LEWIS said he was not in favor of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. VINTON,] because he considered the original amendment abundantly strong and guarded.

The question was then taken, and the amendment was lost.

Mr. MASON, of Virginia, said he was in favor of the amendment. He said it proposed to deposite the money with the States, subject to the draft of the Treasury, and such draft must be met in money, which made it purely a matter of deposit. The original bill created a State debt, which, if the General Government wanted the money, they must go into the market and sell, and it would forever after be irredeemable. He objected to this course, and thought the plan proposed in the amendment far better.

Mr. GALBRAITH was also in favor of the amendment. He was opposed to raising, in any way, a State stock, and he thought the amendment would render the bill more palatable to every portion of the country.

Mr. MERCER moved an amendment to the amendment, in order to provide for distribution, in proportion to federal numbers, according to the last census. Lost.

Mr. MANN, of New York, said he was reluctant to detain the committee, impatient as they were, but it was his imperious duty to oppose some of the provisions of the amendment. He held the principle of compromise in high respect, but he would not compromise the principles of the constitution. What were we about to do? To rack and destroy the principles of our confederation, and to consolidate the powers of the Government. The amendment was even more favorable to the States than the original proposition, for it gave the money, on deposit, without interest. He would not, without disregarding all sense of duty, support this compromise.

Mr. PATTON said he knew nothing about the compromise, who made it, or who was to ratify it; but he was unable to see any difference, in principle, between the amendment and the section as it stood in the bill. He should vote for the bill, even if the amendment should be adopted, seeing no more objection to one proposition than to the other.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said he should vote for the amendment, but not for the bill. But if the bill passed, as undoubtedly it would, by a large majority, he would rather have it passed in the form proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The amendment, it seemed to him, would be doing the thing in a little more direct form than the other mode proposed.

Mr. ADAMS took the floor; but, it being half past two o'clock, the committee rose, and the House took a recess till four o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The deposit bill (from the Senate) being still under consideration—

The question pending being the motion proposed by Mr. ANTHONY, to substitute his proposition for the 13th section of the bill, and Mr. ANTHONY having modified his proposition so as to retain the ratio of distribution proposed by the Senate—

After a debate, in which Messrs. ADAMS, GRANGER, SPEIGHT, and WISE, took part,

Mr. JARVIS moved to amend the amendment by inserting, after the words "United States," the word "unappropriated." Lost.

Mr. ANTHONY, at the suggestion of Mr. BRIGGS, modified his amendment by inserting the words "to pledge the faith of the State for the safe keeping thereof."

After a few words from Messrs. WISE and LOVE, Mr. ANTHONY's amendment, as modified, was adopted: Yeas 123, nays 50.

Mr. ADAMS moved to strike out the first clause of the eighth section, and supported the motion with some remarks. Lost.

Mr. MANN, of New York, moved to strike out the words "and Senate," from the section as amended, so as to cause the surplus to be distributed according to federal numbers.

Mr. M. said that it was with the deepest reluctance that he felt constrained to trespass upon the time of the committee for one moment; and he assured them that nothing but the responsibility of the vote which he was about to give, in common with every gentleman upon the floor, a responsibility which he deemed greater than had fallen to the lot of a representative of the people since the ever-memorable 4th of July, 1776, could inspire him with courage to rise up in this excited House and ask them to pause—to hear before they strike—to reflect before they act; because that action may affect, for weal or for wo, the welfare of our country, beyond the age in which we live.

I am (said Mr. M.) assured by every thing before me, by the very impatience of honorable gentlemen to divide the golden prize, that I am asking their attention when it is inconvenient for them to give it to me; yet their courtesy to me has thus far been such as will compel me to omit saying much that I have intended for this occasion, and to touch but briefly only a few points which I shall claim the right to illustrate more fully in the remarks I intend to submit through the press to my constituents. Mr. Chairman, (said Mr. M.,) I am informed that this substitute for the 13th section of the bill, as it came down from the Senate, is the result of a compromise among the friends of the administration upon this floor, and that it equally meets the views of many of its opponents. Under these circumstances, Mr. M. had examined it with a heartfelt desire to yield his assent to it if possible. He would sacrifice as much to the spirit of compromise as was possible for him in cases of disagreement; and, where no great principle was involved, would always freely and willingly surrender his poor opinion to the better judgment of his cotemporaries. But, sir, (said Mr. M.,) there is a point, beyond which to go becomes a crime against God and man; and he feared that we were now approaching that very point. No considerations of mere temporary advantage or inconvenience should have any influence upon us to violate the boundaries of the constitution, which is the panoply and shield of our Union. But I am told that this measure is merely to deposite the surplus revenues of this Government with the States, to be drawn for at pleasure as an ordinary deposite, and therefore is not liable to any constitutional objection.

I am aware, sir, (said Mr. M.,) that such is the form of the provision; but who among us does not feel and know that to this provision is annexed a mental (I will not say a fraudulent) reservation, that the money is never to be returned to our Treasury? The States are to be the recipients of your bounty, by a violation, as I intend to show, of the spirit of your constitution, under "false pretences." I am, sir, bound to speak boldly on this occasion, and call things by their right names. We are dividing the spoils of a vanquished friend, the constitution—the spoils of a vanquished country—among our allies, the States, to purchase and secure their allegiance and fidelity to that constitution which ourselves will have trampled under our unholy feet, until ere long it will cease to be a barrier to the accomplishment of any purposes which, to honorable members of this House, may seem necessary or expedient. Such has been the fate of other and perhaps all written constitutions; but the hopes of patriotism had, until recently, rendered ours immortal. Vain hopes! the patriot will exclaim, how often and how surely are they swept away! Sir, (said Mr. M.,) who does not know and feel that this measure is, and is intended to be, a distribution of the surplus revenues among the States, from whose people it has been drawn by taxation? It is nominally a deposite with the States, but it brings to my recollection the doings of the honest Quakers of Pennsylvania, who, in their colonial condition, were sometimes embarrassed by their principles when it was necessary to make appropriations to buy powder to carry on the war waged by the white man against the poor Indian. Their bill expressed the appropriation to be "to purchase bread, flour, wheat, or other grains;" under which, by construction, powder was purchased, as "other grains," without objection; and when they wanted cannon, they gave money to buy "a fire engine!" Now, sir, I have no idea, in this enlightened age, of resorting to such pitiful expedients of construction to escape the fair import and meaning of the constitution, which has given no power to this Government to collect money by taxation, to be returned to those from whom it is collected. Do the people desire us to levy taxes under the taxing power, and appoint and pay officers to collect the money, and pay these officers to return it back again? No answer can be necessary to this inquiry, as it is preposterous to suppose it. But I am told we have got the money, and cannot do any thing with it, except return it. Strange, indeed, must be our condition, if this be so. The common-sense remedy is to keep this money until your Government shall need it, and reduce your taxes to prevent drawing more from the people than is necessary for the support of Government.

Shall I be told that we are in a condition where our people cannot bear a reduction of taxes? If I am, I would not condescend to argue such a proposition for one moment. I proceed to allude to the probable consequences of this "dividing of the spoils;" and here, sir, we are only permitted to divine the future by the past. It appears to me, (said Mr. M.,) that you will destroy the balances which now happily exist between the General and State Governments, under the constitution, either, upon the one hand, by causing the States to become your beneficiaries, and servile dependants upon your bounty, like Roman provinces, with a sycophantic Governor, sent out from the corruptions of the Roman capital; or, on the other, of rendering the General Government too weak and feeble to accomplish the purposes for which it was created, dependent upon the will of the States, expressed by their representatives, always under the influence of a State cupidity, which denies to it all relief and support, for the purpose of increasing the revenues of their States, like the Government under the confederacy, after the declaration of our independence, and before the formation and adoption of the constitution. To prevent such a vibration in our political system, we must be careful to preserve the balances of that system. This latter consequence, I admit, is not so likely to happen as the former, because power begets power, and this Government is now, as compared with the States, all in all! The danger is towards consolidation of this Union under one great central Government, with dependent provinces, not unlike those of the Chinese empire. But, Mr. Chairman, (said Mr. M.,) time will not permit me to pursue this consideration of consequences, likely either presently or remotely to follow the adoption of this measure. We have, I fear, fallen upon evil times; yet I will not despair of the republic. We have passed safely through trials as dangerous as those now before us. Immediately upon the adoption of the constitution, the rage of unregulated and unrestrained speculation, under the auspices of the party then in power, found its way into Congress and into the Government.

The depreciated scrip issued by the Government to the army, for their dues, and to the public creditors, found its way, by great sacrifices of the people, into the hands of the public men of that day, together with bounty land certificates and other evidences of public engagement; and it resulted in the passage of the celebrated funding law of 1790, by which such scrip was funded upon certain favorable principles against the United States at six per cent., in favor, as is believed, of many persons who then held seats in Congress, and in their acquisition of large quantities of bounty lands beyond the Ohio. I do not mention this because I suppose there is at present a parallel between our condition and theirs, but because similar influences exist now throughout the country which may have their consequential effect here, and it has been supposed by some to have an influence in deciding the passage of this bill. I am told that public opinion requires this measure at our hands. I have, sir, (said Mr. M.,) seen no evidences of it; and when we review the important events of the last six months, we must hesitate before we conclude that public opinion has decreed in its favor. Gentlemen, I fear, are too much influenced by the opinions which surround the Capitol. When we assembled, it was supposed we were on the eve of a war with France, and the expectation was universal that all our revenues, and more too, would be swallowed up in that contest.

No intelligent citizen ever dreamed of division of the public revenues until after the month of February, when intelligence of the settlement of our affairs with that nation reached us. We then were engaged with the hostile Indians in Florida, and soon we had reason to apprehend the invasion of our territory by the Mexicans under Santa Anna, and then were involved in a war with the Creek Indians, which is now progressing almost unresisted by us, with unheard-of cruelty and success, on the part of those Indians. Under all these circumstances, to which the public mind has been constantly directed, few, but party politicians, having party objects to subserve, have expected or desired the distribution of the surplus revenues among the States. Honorable members will deceive themselves, and be mistaken, if they suppose that that great public opinion, which is alike the arbiter of the fate of the Government and country, has in any manner settled the question in favor of distribution.

But, Mr. Chairman, (said Mr. M.,) I am compelled to forego the extension of my remarks upon this branch of the discussion, and ask the attention of the committee to the ratio of deposit among the States established by this bill, for I will here call it deposit, so as to suit the ears of honorable members who have nervous sensibilities whenever I call it a distribution, (though I believe "it is rhubarb, call it what you will.") This ratio is so unjust that I should be recreant to the State which, in a very humble part, I have the honor to represent, if I did not here now enter my most solemn protest against it. It does not proceed upon the basis of population or popular representation, but upon the basis of the representation in the Senate as well as this House. It violates plainly and palpably the very principle upon which the revolution which secured our independence proceeded, that representation and taxation should go together; or, in other words, that the people could not be rightfully taxed without their consent, expressed through their representatives.

In accordance with this general principle, our constitution has provided that "all duties, imposts, and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States." It also provides that "no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken;" that is, "by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons." These provisions were introduced to insure a taxation as equal as may be upon all the States, and upon all the people of the United States. Now, sir, in exercising this taxing power, thus restricted, a surplus, as it is contended by those who favor this bill, has been brought into the Treasury, which it is estimated by some will amount, on the 1st of January next, to more than thirty-five millions of dollars, leaving at least thirty millions to be distributed. Sir, according to the principles of taxation laid down in the constitution, it is to be presumed that this sum has been contributed by the people of the several States in proportion to their representation in the House of Representatives, and in that proportion belongs to them as parties and partners in the confederation of States.

Public Deposits.

[JUNE 21, 1836.]

This act, sir, introduces a different ratio of distribution, and proposes to return the money to the States, not in proportion to the representation in the House of Representatives, the basis upon which it has been collected, but in proportion to the representation in both Houses of Congress. If we assume that the amount to be distributed will be thirty millions of dollars, the proportion raised upon each State upon the constitutional basis, and the proportion to be distributed to each under this bill, is shown in a table,* which has been prepared with, I believe, great care and accuracy.

The money in the Treasury of the United States is the produce of the sales of the national property and taxes, which, when direct, are, by the constitution, to be laid upon the States in proportion of their respective populations, as fixed by the census; and when indirect, are to preserve the great constitutional principle of the graduation of taxation, according to the representation, to be assumed to operate in the same way upon the States. Hence the support of Government by indirect taxation must be supposed to fall uniformly upon the people of the States. If New York contains one sixth of the represented population of the United States, she must pay one sixth of any given amount, say thirty millions, of direct taxes laid by Congress, and one sixth of the same amount of duties upon foreign goods imported into the Union. The fundamental principle of taxation being as is stated above, unless it is denied (as it is not supposed it will be) that the indirect taxation by duties is unequal, and in some sense unconstitutional, borne by the people and States, then the above conclusion must be regarded as correct. A surplus in the Treasury on the 1st January, 1837, is alleged. It is the result chiefly of duties on foreign goods. Supposing it to be thirty millions, the following table will show the amount which each State contributed to it, and the amount which the bill of the Senate, as amended by the committee, proposes to return to each State. The table is formed by dividing thirty millions by 242, the whole number of the House of Representatives, which produces 123,966.222242, or say 123,967, (to avoid a small fraction.) This multiplied by the number of Representatives of each State, gives the amount contributed by each State. Dividing thirty millions by 294, the whole number of Senators and Representatives, we have 102,040.240294, or say 102,041, (to avoid a small fraction.) Multiplying the last sum by the whole number of Senators and Representatives of each State, we have the amount which each State will get by the provisions of the Senate's bill. The two last columns show the gain and loss of each State, throwing out of view the loss common to all in the expenses of collecting so large a sum from the people, to be returned to them again.

Can it be doubted, sir, that in the collection and distribution of moneys in this manner, the purpose of the constitution, in attempting to equalise and fix the ratio of the public burdens, is palpably violated and defeated?

The State of Delaware, having one representative, has contributed one two hundred and forty-second part of the thirty millions, equal to $123,967; but as her Senators are taken into the ratio of distribution, she is to have deposited with her by this bill three two hundred and ninety-fourth parts, equal to $306,123; and she will receive $183,156 more than she has contributed to this fund. On the other hand, Virginia having contributed twenty-one two hundred and forty-second parts, equal to $2,603,307, will receive twenty-three two hundred and ninety-fourth parts, equal to $2,346,943, making a loss to her of $256,364. The loss of Pennsylvania, upon the same basis, will be $409,843; that of New York $662,958. The eight large States which lose by this ratio have one hundred and thirty-nine members upon this floor, while the eighteen smaller States, which gain, have but one hundred and three members. Thus the small States, having the power in the Senate, overcome the large States in this House having superior numbers. Now, Mr. Chairman, what are the restrictions of the constitution, which declare that all duties, taxes, and excises, shall be equal, worth, if, after raising money upon this basis, Congress may return (deposit) to one or more of the States twice as much as she pays? And what would be the use of adopting the federal numbers as the basis of direct taxation, if Congress, after raising money in that ratio, may return it to the States in a ratio arbitrarily adopted by themselves, and altogether different? It is palpable that by this process the provisions of the constitution, which were designed to make taxation equal on all the people of all the States, are, so far as this bill goes, rendered nugatory and of no effect. But, sir, the unconstitutionality of the object which this bill is intended to effect is aggravated by its injustice.

I have shown that in the distribution (deposit) of thirty millions of dollars, the State of Delaware will receive $182,156 more than she has paid, and Virginia will receive $256,364 less. The consequence is, that Virginia is taxed $256,364, not to support her own Government, nor to support the Federal Government, but to support the Government of Delaware and the other small States. For the same purpose, sir, New York will be taxed $662,956, and Pennsylvania $409,846, and Ohio $212,512.

Not only is this result most unjust in itself, but it is in palpable violation of the whole scope of the constitution, so far as it relates to the collection and disbursement of the public moneys; and it can readily be perceived that, by the operation of such a scheme, the people of the small States may in effect be relieved from taxation altogether, not only for the support of this Government, but for the support of their own Governments. In proportion to the increase of the tariff, and other taxes levied by Congress on the people of the United States, would their burdens be diminished by a return to them of a greater surplus, until the amount returned would be greater than the whole amount by them paid; and the larger States would in fact be taxed to support their Governments, make their roads and canals, and sustain all their systems of improvement and education. Important advantages were secured to the small States by the constitution, but this is not one of them. The large States agreed, by the compact, to contribute their just proportion for the support of the General Government; but they did not agree to be taxed to support the Governments of the small States, and all the expensive systems of improvement or education which they might think proper to adopt. To compel them to do so by any species of legislation is to impose upon them burdens which they did not agree to bear, and is, in my opinion at least, in direct violation of the spirit, if not of the letter of the federal compact. How any Senator or member of this House from the large States can reconcile his vote for this bill with his own sense of justice to his State or constituents, to his own conscience, under high and solemn obligations to support the constitution, I am utterly at a loss to perceive. It is said, I know, in justification of this ratio, that the population of the new States has increased since the census by which the last apportionment was made, and that as to them it does no more than justice. I admit that the eight new States may be entitled to an increased share, in consideration of their increase of population, equal to 10 or 12 per cent.; but I do not perceive the propriety of giving to the ten original small States such immense advantages as I have shown they will obtain, merely for the purpose of giving to those new States an increase. I will, sir, at the proper time, propose an amendment to the bill, to make a discrimination of 10 per cent. in favor of the new States, because I believe that justice to them requires it.

I know, Mr. Chairman, (said Mr. M.,) that gentlemen try to persuade themselves that this is a deposite with the States, and is therefore more safe than in the deposite banks. If I could be brought to believe this in good and honest faith, if I could be made to believe that it was even intended ever to restore the money to the Treasury, I should entertain less apprehension, though I would not then vote for the bill, because I would never consent to create the permanent relation of debtor and creditor, or of bailor and bailee, between the States and the General Government.

How and when, sir, is this money to be restored to our Treasury? Is it expected that Congress will compel the States to levy a direct tax upon their people, to repay it? Those who will candidly say they believe that the States will do so, must disregard all the known principles of human action. Congress will have a more ready means to replenish their coffers—by a new American system, by a new tariff of duties upon imports—and I wish honorable members from the South, who go for this bill, to remember that I now tell them plainly, that they will thereby bring upon themselves all the evils, imaginary or otherwise, of which they have lately complained so loudly.

They will have no just ground of resistance, and must surrender to the supreme law of necessity, which they will now establish. Let them not complain hereafter of such burdens, and I beg them not to admonish me any further of their strict construction and State right doctrines, nor of their hair-splitting distinctions upon constitutional law. Where, sir, are all our great defenders of the constitution? Have they disappeared from these halls, under the influence of gold? "Tell it not in Gath!"

Mr. MANN finally withdrew his amendment, at the request of Mr. MERCER and others, and gave notice that he would renew it in the House.

Mr. RIPLEY moved to amend the bill by adding to it sections regulating the management of the public lands, and providing that the land sales be suspended for five years.

The CHAIR decided that the motion was out of order, being incongruous with the bill.

Mr. RIPLEY said his purpose was not to defeat the bill, for no object was nearer his heart than to get the public money out of the hands of the deposite banks, where, he was persuaded, it was doing much mischief. Companies, and large companies, were constantly forming to purchase, with means derived from the deposite banks, that fair and fertile land which was the birthright of every American citizen. Could it be wished to throw this territory into the hands of a few wealthy proprietors, and to increase the price of it for actual settlers from $1 25 to $20 or $30 an acre? Twenty millions of acres were to come into market this fall, the whole of which would be thrown into the hands of the capitalists and favorites of the deposite banks, to the entire exclusion of the actual settlers, and of the industrious class of the community.

Mr. R. appealed from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. CAMBRELENG briefly supported the appeal.

The decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. RENCHER moved to amend the bill by adding the following section:

And be it further enacted, That if the stock held by the United States in the Bank of the United States shall not be sold before the 1st of January next, the money arising from the said stock, when sold, shall be deposited according to the provisions of this bill, to wit: one fourth part upon the sale of the said stock, one fourth part in three months thereafter, one fourth part in six months thereafter, and the balance at the end of nine months.

Mr. R. said he did not intend to detain the committee, but he wished to make a few remarks in explanation of the additional section which he proposed to the bill. It would be recollected by the House that, during the present session, Congress had passed a law authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make sale, at such time as he may think proper, of the stock held by the Government in the Bank of the United States. He did not doubt but that the Secretary of the Treasury would make sale of this stock before the 1st of January next, if it could be done advantageously. But he might not think it proper to make sale of the stock till after the 1st of January; and if this should be the case, then there would be at least eight millions of dollars over and above the five millions provided for in this bill, which would not be brought into distribution. The amendment proposed provides for the distribution of the proceeds of the bank stock, if sold after the 1st of January, in the same manner as it would be distributed under this bill, if sold before the 1st of January next. No money is to be distributed, except what is in the Treasury on the 1st of January, over and above five millions of dollars; and as this may not then be in the Treasury, he considered it important to provide for its distribution when brought in. It might make a difference of at least eight millions of dollars in the amount to be deposited with the States; and he hoped, therefore, the amendment would be adopted. He preferred that the States should have it, where it would be safe, and used for the benefit of the people, rather than placed in the State banks, where it might be unsafe, or improperly used. He could see no objection to the amendment, and hoped it would be adopted.

Mr. McKAY said the House had just passed a bill placing the whole power of the Government, in relation to the Government bank stock, in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury. There was, therefore, no necessity for the amendment. The stock would be sold and distributed of course.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOUBLEDAY rose and said:

Mr. Chairman: I wish to offer a very few remarks on that part of the bill which provides for depositing the surplus moneys in the Treasury with the several States of the Union. This is the first opportunity I have had of addressing the House during the present session; and differing as I do from many of my colleagues, I feel the more anxious to explain my views to the committee and to my constituents.

I am fully aware, Mr. Chairman, of the responsibility I incur by the vote I am about to give on this question. Never has a subject come before us more important or more embarrassing than this of disposing of the surplus revenues. Whilst the safeguards of private liberty remain, nearly all the good or ill the people can experience from our legislation will be by the imposition of burdens, and the disposition of the public moneys. I am not accountable—the friends with whom I act, the friends of the administration, are not accountable—for the great amount accumulated beyond the legitimate wants of the Government. I held a seat on this floor in 1833, when the tariff question was adjusted. I voted with the friends of the administration to reduce the duties prospectively, but rapidly, till the revenue should be brought down to the expenditures of the country. We were overruled by the ultra friends and the ultra opponents of the protective system, who, by acting together, could control at least one branch of Congress. To preserve the Union, we were compelled to assent to a measure which now clogs our action, and which, being claimed as a compromise, prevents our adapting our legislation to existing circumstances.

It must be quite evident that no measure will be adopted by this Congress materially to diminish the amount of money already in the Treasury; and unless our appropriations are extravagant, there will probably be some accumulations till the year 1840. The question arises, what shall we do with this money? I confess I can see no plan wholly free from objections. If we determine to leave it in the deposit banks for three or four years, they will feel authorized to use it as so much capital, and its safety will depend on the honesty of bank managers, and the prudence and success of their business operations. Being men, in these money-making times, some of them may be tempted to use it for their individual advantage; and even statesmen, now pure, may, in time, be drawn to share the profits. The public money will then be subject to all the contingencies of private speculation, and what is worse, will be a means of corruption more potent than any that has heretofore existed in this country.

To avoid such results, I would certainly vote for the most extravagant expenditures, if no better plan could be suggested. But ought we thus to waste the money earned and paid by the industrious classes? I think, sir, we should hesitate before we make that our only alternative. It is said, if this measure be adopted, the people, through their representatives, will hereafter refuse the appropriations necessary for national objects. It may be so, sir; but, on the other hand, confident I am, if it be not adopted, we shall rapidly run into a system of the most wasteful extravagance.

I have examined this bill with the more attention, because I have the misfortune to differ from many of my political friends, in whose judgment and patriotism I have great confidence. I hope they, also, will reflect and discriminate. They must perceive that the bill, as amended, provides, not only in form, but in fact, not for a distribution, but simply for a deposite of the public moneys. If it ever results in gratuitous distribution, it will not be by any action of ours. It can only happen, in case it shall be so decreed by the people, through their representatives hereafter to be chosen. To suppose the people are not to be trusted, because they may decide wrong, is to deny their capacity for self-government.

As respects the constitutional question involved in this bill, it is not necessary for me to say much. That it is as constitutional to deposite our surplus funds with the States, as with corporations created by the States, admits not of a doubt or cavil. Nor can I doubt that the State Governments will vest the money intrusted to their care as safely and advantageously for the people as either this Government or the moneyed corporations. And certainly if any profit is to be derived from a temporary use of it, when not wanted for national purposes, it might as well accrue to the States as to individuals or corporations.

There is one ground on which I would appeal to the friends of the administration. We have discontinued the United States Bank, as a dangerous institution, and determined to use the State banks, for collecting, transferring, and disbursing, the public revenues. This is peculiarly an administration measure, and one which has my hearty concurrence. Now, it must be plain that leaving money for three or four years in the banks will endanger its safe keeping. Some of the bank managers may make large profits by using the public moneys; others may experience heavy losses, causing bank failures. If a few of the deposite banks fail, the people will lose confidence in the present system, and in those to whom it owes its adoption. If a small amount only be left in the banks, as it will be frequently called for by the public, they will loan it out only for short periods, and losses will probably not occur, or if they do, the amount will be comparatively trifling.

These are a few of my reasons for supporting this bill. I should like to say much more, but do not feel justified in longer occupying the time of the committee at this period of the session.

Mr. BEALE moved to amend the eleventh section by inserting, after the word "quarter," the following: "and that no bank shall possess of the public money, at any time, for more than one quarter of the year, a sum greater than one fourth of its capital stock paid in; and that it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to make distribution or deposite of such excess in other banks, agreeably to the provisions of this act." Lost.

Mr. DROMGOOLE then moved to strike out the 13th, 14th, and 15th sections of the bill. Lost.

Mr. ASH moved the following, as an additional section: "And be it further enacted by the authority aforesaid, That it be recommended to the several States accepting of parts of the public money as aforesaid, to appropriate the same for the purposes of education." Lost.

Mr. McKAY moved to amend the eleventh section by inserting, after the word "Treasurer," the words "and other public officers." Lost.

On motion of Mr. BRIGGS, the committee then rose and reported the bill, as amended, to the House.

The Speaker having resumed the chair, the bill was then taken up in the House.

Mr. MERCER then renewed the amendment which he had offered in Committee of the Whole, namely: to strike out, "in proportion to their representation in the Senate and House of Representatives," and insert, "in proportion to their respective federal numbers, according to the last census."

On this motion Mr. MERCER called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered.

Mr. VINTON said that if no amendment had been made to the bill, he would have been content to let it
